Mr. Robert McCrindle (Brentwood and Ongar): My approach to the Bill is different from that of other hon. Members who have spoken. I should like to start by extending a general welcome to the Bill and in the process to pay tribute to the building societies for the service that they have given to both lenders and borrowers over a long period. In the mind of the ordinary person, they have brought about a perception of integrity and probity. It is only fair to say that a number of financial institutions have been rather less successful in that regard. However, it is now time to update the basis upon which the building societies operate, to allow them to make a greater contribution to solving the housing problems and to enable them to operate wider financial services than they are permitted to do at present. The underlying caveat to all that is that they should be permitted to do so in fair competition with others.

Speaking as a building society investor and an erstwhile borrower, I welcome a good many aspects of the Bill. By a tidying-up process, I hope that we can look forward to such improvements as an end to early redemption penalty clauses, as I believe they are called. Such clauses, it seems to me, make the transfer of a mortgage more difficult, and make flexible lending just that little bit more difficult than it need be.

Speaking as the parliamentary adviser to the British Insurance Brokers Association, an interest which I now readily declare, I think that the provision of all financial services by the building societies which they are now being enabled to engage upon should be subject to the same stringent controls as is the rest of the financial sector.

It is significant that we are debating the Second Reading of the Bill on the same day that the Financial Services Bill has been published. I think that it is crucial that the same level of protection be extended to the consumer when the building societies are enabled to move into the insurance broking sector. I believe that the very trust which people have placed in building societies, and to which I referred at the beginning of my speach, tends to lead to an assumption of expertise which in my experience is not always present in insurance at the average branch office of a building society. I very much accept and welcome the development of organisations providing a range of financial services and, in the interests of the consumer, I hope that the House will agree that they must be subject to appropriate regulation in relation to the individual services.

With regard to insurance services, the only regulation current in operation which places considerable responsibilities upon practitioners is the Insurance Brokers (Registration) Act 1977. In the proposed financial services legislation, self-regulatory organisations are to be created, which, if anything, will toughen the requirements under which insurance broking is undertaken. Under the Bill, it appears that the building societies are not to be subjected in this field of endeavour to the same level of consumer protection that is now expected of the Insurance Brokers (Registration) Act, or that will be expected of them if and when the Financial Services Bill is enacted.

Can the Minister tell me why the Green Paper proposal that new insurance services should be subject to the existing regulatory regime for insurance broking—that is to say, the provisions of the Insurance Brokers (Registration) Act — has been dropped? I wonder whether the very high repute in which the building societies are held will tend to lead people who now are likely to purchase insurance to a greater extent through their local building society branch to expect a level of consumer protection which is not necessarily involved in the Bill as drafted. I look closely at the proposals in the Bill for protection of building society investors. Unlike some of my hon. Friends, I take no exception to what is proposed, but it seems to me that the level of protection offered to customers in the ancillary services into which the building societies are now being encouraged to move is less substantial than the protection offered to those who place their money only as investors in the building societies.

Mr. Ian Stewart: My hon. Friend is suggesting, I think, that there would be less supervision on building societies carrying out functions for insurance agents and so on than there would be on others in the same market. That is not the case. Building societies would be subject to the same provisions of the Financial Services Bill as anyone else.

Mr. McCrindle: That is a good assurance to have. I have to confess that I have not had the opportunity which my hon. Friend clearly has had to wade through the 165 clauses of the Financial Services Bill. If he is giving me the assurance that, after both Bills are enacted, an insurance broker and a building society offering insurance broking services would have to provide the same level of consumer protection to the customers, that is the assurance which I am seeking. If that is what he is telling me—he appears to be indicating assent—a good deal of the concern that I have been expressing can, indeed, fall away. What I seek is fair competition, adequate control, appropriate expertise and proper redress. If those exist when insurance is purchased through a broker, and if my hon. Friend is telling me that they will similarly exist when insurance is purchased through a building society acting as an insurance broker, that is reassuring.

Mr. Christopher Hawkins: I do not know whether I am correct, but from what I have been told, I believe that the Financial Services Bill does not cover people buying private insurance for a house or motor car. My hon. Friend might like to bear that in mind when accepting the assurance.

Mr. McCrindle: Yes, indeed. One of the things that I noticed—indeed, it was the basis of my intervention in the Minister's speech—is that, although it is a happy fact that there is to be no conditionality in relation to the provision of a mortgage—in other words, a building society will not be allowed to require a customer to place an insurance through the insurance broking subsidiary of a building society—there is no such undertaking in regard to the other areas into which the building societies are being encouraged to move.

I have to say to my hon. Friend the Minister that, although I welcome his intervention, which allays some of my anxieties, there remain some areas in which the fair competition for which I have called seems to be not entirely to the fore. In this area, amendments may be expected in Committee.

I wish to draw to the attention of the House a remarkable omission from the Bill. Nowhere in its pages can I see any reference to the creation of an ombudsman. A noticeable development in recent years in several spheres of financial services is the evolution of the office of an ombudsman. In insurance there has been an ombudsman for a considerable time, and I pay tribute to its enormous success. There is to be an ombudsman in banking also. If I have a choice of effecting my mortgage through a building society, a bank or an insurance company, it is remarkable that in two cases I am to have access to an ombudsman, but in relation to building societies I am not. I wonder whether some consideration might be given to the desirability of this system. It appears to be here to stay, it has now been proven, particularly in insurance, and it is now trusted. That is why it is being extended to banking, and I believe that building society customers should have the same right.

I repeat that, in general terms, I welcome the Bill. My single reason for addressing the House was to see whether the same level of competition was being encouraged on insurance being sold through insurance brokers, through insurance broking subsidiaries or through building societies. I am grateful for the partial assurance that my hon. Friend the Economic Secretary has given, but there are still points to be covered, to which I shall return in due course.

Mr. Ken Weetch (Ipswich): The Bill contains few surprises because all the principal issues in it have been well canvassed over a long period in both Government policy and discussion documents and in two recent speeches by the Economic Secretary to the Treasury.

The Bill is long overdue, and for a number of reasons. In the first place, building societies have long outgrown their current legal framework. The Act that governs them is the Building Societies Act 1962. There was nothing new in principle in that Act, because it was based on the same set of principles as the Building Societies Act 1874. Now, in 1985, even in terms of self-help, we are a world away from what society was nearly 100 years ago.

In the second place, the market in which building societies have had to operate has changed because the current financial market place is much more fiercely competitive than ever before, both in the supply of mortgage finance and in the competition for savings. In addition, the structure of financial institutions has altered. Until now, there has been a highly structured system with clear lines of specialist demarcation. We now see many more multi-purpose financial conglomerates emerging. All this has been aided and abetted by the Government's policy on fiscal neutrality between financial institutions. The world has altered and therefore the Bill, which will be on the statute book before summer, is long overdue.

One of the reasons why I look as I do is that I have read every building society debate that has taken place in the House since 1874, and they all have one thing in common. I am sorry to say it, but building societies have always been regarded with a completely uncritical eulogy in which I do not join. I agree that they have done wonders for home ownership, and all credit to them for that, but for far too long they lived in a sheltered world where the only attention that they wanted was of that uncritical eulogy. It was a closed world in which directors did not need, and were not equipped with, entrepreneurial skills of any kind. They were also a self-perpetuating oligarchy with well-used procedures of co-option from among golf club cronies. They usually reserved their energies to keep new blood off the board. I have fully assessed that close interest. In the past, the Anglia and the Nationwide, to name but two, manipulated the rule book to keep genuinely elected members off the governing body, and thereby made a mockery of mutuality.

For many years, the cartel set borrowing rates and lending rates and boards sat comfortably in between. For a good many years, any rocking horse could have been a director of a building society—all they had to do was to avoid financial risks and to keep the books straight. In the cases of the Grays building society, the Wakefield building society and others, the directors did not even have to do that, so weak were the financial procedures.

That is a matter of history, and I make no comment on it. The building societies failed to use their considerable financial clout on behalf of their customers because they connived in and underwrote some of the worst professional restrictive practices in the housing market. However, that is history, times change and the more modern generation of managers and directors have, to their great credit, tried to come to grips with the modern world.

What are we saying about the Bill? Subject to the detailed process of scrutiny and amendment in Committee, the Bill should be supported in principle, because its major aim is right. It is to allow building societies, subject to proper safeguards, to provide a greater range of services for their members, and that is a correct strategy. It is also prudent to do this while keeping the building societies' purpose in the main stream of mortgage finance and owner-occupation.

The legislation is not concerned with what the Government, the bank or the building society directors want. What the punters want is the main point at issue. Building society members want and would welcome an expansion in the range of services. Over the years, as I have gone down to my constituency surgery every Saturday I have seen the queue of people waiting for money transmission services in front of the building society grow and grow. Many people want more money transmission services in building societies.

Building societies have the capacity and confidence of the public that enables them to develop such services. Many consumers look forward to the opportunity of having a package of housing services from under one roof. However, I must say a couple of words of warning to the Government. At this stage of the argument the warning is one of principle that the caution that they have rightly used may be overtaken by events in a rapidly changing financial world. I am speaking particularly about the merger provisions in the Bill and the controversial question of building society takeovers, and even more particularly about the takeover of small building societies by larger ones. The matter could go even wider if public limited companies are formed and normal commercial company practices are not followed.

I was pleased to hear the Economic Secretary offering some additional safeguard. At least he is prepared to do so. The implication of what he said was that he would speak further on these issues in Committee. The last thing that we want to do is to unleash any speculation that would make small building societies pawns in a financial game. That would be bad.

Building societies have always had a deserved reputation for soundness, respectability and public confidence. We do not want the seemingly sleazy edges of current City financial morality to invade sections of the building society movement. Are the safeguards in the Bill adequate? Outside the House there is a lot of doubt about that.

East Anglia is the home of small building societies which have a few branches but which have a lot of local knowledge and flexibility. They do a great service for the local communities in the difficult area of accumulating savings. My hon. Friend the Member for Thurrock (Dr.

[Mr. Ken Weetch]

McDonald) used the quotation which I intended to use from the Financial Times of 7 December when the deputy general secretary of the Building Societies Association, Mark Boleat, warned that there were predators in this area of activity. Many smaller building societies in Britain are worried about the future state of the movement. I quote from a strongly worded letter from the Ipswich building society, which is one of the smaller building societies:

> "It will give access to the register of members to any other building society and this we consider will create a dangerous situation. It may well be that where a small society has high reserves it would enable the much larger society to make offers to members of bonuses as an incentive for a merger and one can see a situation quickly arise where no matter what restrictions are placed on the type of takeover that they would be insufficient to provide any safeguard."

I emphasise to the Minister that that same warning would be given by most smaller societies in Britain and I hope that he will take it seriously. Does the Minister have any vision of the future shape of the building society? Has he any idea of what he wants it to be? It is not in the interests of the building society movement to be dominated by a small number of large societies. It would be unhealthy and would reduce the competitive framework of the movement.

The building society framework should have as much variety as possible. I am not averse to some building societies converting themselves into public limited companies. If we do not try that form of organisation, we shall never know whether it has any advantages. Some societies could remain firmly rooted in the mutuality principle whilst other large societies could evolve new ideas. Some societies—not very many, I hope—could evolve into public limited companies.

The building society movement will run into difficulties right from the start because it is entering a new area of financial management of which it has had no experience. It will be difficult, in the short run, to recruit the financial expertise to cope with the new skills demanded within the new areas of risk that some societies will undertake. Is the Minister optimistic that the building society movement will be able to recruit the necessary expertise as it enters into engagements and activities in Europe? Will such recruits be able to undertake this type of business successfully, especially in the short run? There are doubts about that.

I pay tribute to the registry and the current registrar for the improvements in supervision and control which have been brought about in recent years. I have been a Member of Parliament for 11 years and in that time I have taken a close interest in the registry and how it supervises building societies. There have been occasions when its supervision has been amateurish and not of the professional standard to which we are entitled. I hope that the new commission will be adequately funded and that it will not be a dustbin where all the old lags can find jobs. I hope that the registry will be a highly professional and commendable organisation when dealing with new areas where there will be new problems. The investors' protection scheme will need considerable improvement.

It is encouraging that the Minister has been given a fair wind for his Bill on Second Reading, but a difficult voyage lies ahead in Committee.

Sir Hector Monro (Dumfries): It is a pleasure to follow the hon. Member for Ipswich (Mr. Weetch) after his thoughtful and interesting speech, based on much historical research.

It is good to know that he gives the Bill a general welcome. However, the hon. Gentleman's overall criticism of building societies being out-of-date is unfair. Many of the societies have competent management. I agree that among the 190 building societies there are bound to be some black sheep. The dramatic fall in the number of building societies in the past 10 years from over 400 to 190 may be due to the disappearance of those societies which, in the view of their members, were not well managed. The hon. Gentleman asked how many building societies we would have but that is anybody's guess. The rate of decline in the number of building societies has dropped, and I should be surprised if the figure did not settle down.

I declare an interest in a building society and I certainly welcome the Bill. It pays a warm tribute to the building society movement, which is one of the successes of the century and which has brought home ownership to millions of people. It is right that the Government should move forward with the Bill. Societies should have an opportunity to evolve and adapt to rapid financial changes and the Bill enables them to move forward much faster than under present legislation.

In introducing the Bill, my hon. Friend the Economic Secretary to the Treasury showed the value of detailed consultation. My hon. Friend has worked very hard in the past two years and he has met many societies and the Building Societies Association. For this reason we now have a Bill that has received general welcome throughout the House.

The Bill has four main themes. The first is the removal of many restrictions on lending. The second is a widening of the range of services to bring in Europe, cheque cards, insurance, and the management of land and houses, which will bring the societies into a much closer relationship with the housing associations. We should commend the building societies that have made a special effort to provide accommodation. For example, Abbey National has done much restoration work in Edinburgh. Other societies throughout the United Kingdom have done much to raise the standard of building and show what can be achieved with competent management. The third theme is a strengthening of the safeguards within which building societies will operate. The fourth gives new rights to members and the opportunity to play an active part, which I am sure will raise the eyebrows of many building society managers.

Those are all highly commendable objectives. There is no doubt that, with a Bill of 120 clauses and schedules, the Committee stage will be a gargantuan task. However, the welcome that it has received so far should mean that the Committee stage will not be intolerably long, although many matters are bound to be discussed.

One matter that causes some anxiety is the freedom for market competition. Any competition with the banks must be seen to be fair. Building societies and banks will operate in the same market, yet the building societies will be restricted at first to using no more than 5 per cent. of their total assets. I know that the figure is likely to be increased to 10 per cent. in the foreseeable future, but even that is too low. Perhaps on reflection the Government will consider starting at 10 per cent. and working up to 20 per cent. Only then would we reach something approaching fair competition. If we do not have such competition, a bull point of the Bill will fall by the wayside.

The freedom to convert to company status is likely to occur only rarely. I do not envisage a flood of applications to change from society to company status, unless the restrictions on the societies are far too tight for them to operate in the changing world of the 1990s. The Government recommend a procedure in the Bill, but the major societies believe strongly that the voting requirements for their millions of members are unrealistic. If that is the only route to company status, surely a simple majority of two thirds of the investors and borrowers in a society would be more appropriate than the complicated system in the Bill.

The key clause deals with the freedom to manage, because the key to a successful building society is the quality of its management from the top down to the counter staff. Many societies have introduced computers, cash dispensers and different business management processes, but at the end of the day building societies thrive because of the personal service that they provide to their customers. That management skill must not be put at risk because of a little coup dreamed up at an annual general meeting, where a small group of members could elect someone unsuited, unqualified and lacking in experience. Management could be at risk if we accepted the proposal in the Bill for a minimum investment of £100 and the support of 10 other members to nominate a candidate. Those figures should be substantially higher—perhaps £300 and 50 members—so that no inexperienced or bizarrely qualified candidates can be nominated or elected.

I welcome the Bill and hope that it progresses quickly through Committee. But during its passage and in the future, we must remember that the Government must continue their economic policy with the prime purpose of keeping down inflation. If they do, we shall have lower interest rates, which the building societies want. After all, lending for house purchase is their prime objective. The lower the interest rates, the more likely they are to achieve that objective.

Mr. Jim Craigen (Glasgow, Maryhill): As the hon. Member for Dumfries (Sir H. Monro) said, this is a sizeable Bill. He may be over-optimistic about the time that it will need in Committee, because it is a big Bill about a movement that has had a large influence in the shaping of the social condition of our citizens and the housing conditions of our communities. I agree with my hon. Friend the Member for Ipswich (Mr. Weetch), who is not known for his uncritical approach to building societies, that we must overhaul the current legislation. However, I am wary about the methods and means of doing that and the likely outcome of some changes.

Like most hon. Members, I am a borrower and an investor in a building society, and, with my right hon. Friend the Member for Halton (Mr. Oakes), I should declare that I am an honorary vice-president of the Building Societies Association. That post is not financially remunerated.

With the hon. Member for Dumfries, I hope that the importance of mortgage interest rates will be highlighted in Committee. The liberalisation of existing building societies legislation should offer the prospect of cheaper mortgages. It is not simply a matter of improving arrangements for house purchasers; at the same time, we must help members of building societies by the extension of services available.

On classes 2 and 3, I part company with the hon. Member for Dumfries, because I am worried that liberalisation may result in an exodus of resources for house purchase in the United Kingdom as against the availability of such resources in Europe and elsewhere. I can understand people wishing to go to the Continent because of our unemployment problem and our general economic climate. But I hope that not too many holiday homes and retirement homes will be financed from building society deposits that might otherwise go to the regeneration of our inner cities and to the fulfilment of the hopes of those who simply wish to purchase properties in the United Kingdom. The European Community directive on the harmonisation of mortgage credit is forcing the Government in a certain direction. However, I am wary about the exodus of funds from the United Kingdom. The Economic Secretary to the Treasury referred to the primary purpose of building societies and suggested that the legislation will lead to diversification. But the primary purpose of building societies is to encourage home ownership. I hope that that primary purpose will not be deflected becauuse some societies believe that they can get a higher return on capital by investing in high risk areas. If too much speculation of that kind takes place, the Building Societies Commission will be very busy.

I share the misgivings of the hon. Member for Rutland and Melton (Mr. Latham) about the rationalisation of building societies. In some circumstances, larger societies can provide larger services on a more economic scale if they are well managed, but there is nothing to prevent smaller building societies from providing an excellent service for their members. This is a remarkable period. We are living in a takeover society. Private sector takeovers now occur on a very considerable scale, but they do not help to improve the productivity of industry. They merely increase the profitability of some of those private companies that are engaged in takeovers. I hope that competition will not be squeezed because of rationalisation and the considerable cannibalisation of existing building societies.

I know what has been said by all the leading lights about mortgage interest relief. That is not a matter for this legislation, but the availability of mortgage interest relief creates the general climate in which building societies operate. The Fowler reviews of housing benefit, the cuts that are to be made in social services and the pressure that the Government have exerted on rent levels have swung the balance very much against those who, perforce, have to rent property. Instead of exhibiting fiscal neutrality, the Government constantly display fiscal partiality in favour of the home owner.

It is right that those who pay the standard rate of income tax should be eligible for mortgage interest relief. However, it is quite wrong that those who pay a higher rate of income tax should benefit above that from mortgage interest relief. If the Government were to move in that direction it would reduce house prices and thereby increase the opportunity for people to purchase their homes. The Government may find that their social security policy leads inescapably to the logic of doing away, over a five or 10-year period, with mortgage interest relief for those who pay higher rates of income tax.

My hon. Friend the Member for Ipswich referred to the accountability and control of building societies. I need not, therefore, deal with that point, apart from saying that the Building Societies Commission may have to spend more time dealing with the small building societies simply because the larger building societies have larger audit departments. Although many building societies began life as local societies in, say, Halifax, Woolwich or East Anglia, their activities now spread from Lands End to John o'Groats. That leads to special problems about mutuality. It also leads to the problem that shareholders may be unable to attend the meetings of public limited companies held in London or elsewhere, although they would like to take part in them.

The Government have published a Green Paper on home improvements. I am glad that it relates only to England. I hope that the Secretary of State for Scotland has forgotten all about publishing a Green Paper on home improvements in Scotland, because I do not particularly like the contents of the Department of the Environment's Green Paper. My impression is that the building societies were not involved in the Green Paper consultations. I hope that the Parliamentary Under-Secretary of State for the Environment will dispel that misapprehension.

The building societies have a considerable role to play in the regeneration of the inner city areas. I hope that the development of partnerships between building societies and local authorities for the regeneration of the inner cities will be encouraged. People do not simply buy their homes; they buy a stake in their community. They are concerned about their immediate environment as well as about a roof over their head. Therefore, it is important that the building societies should be able to play a full part in helping communities to improve the environment. Home owners should feel proud of their environment.

Will the Under-Secretary of State say why Scotland is excluded from the provision for conveyancing services in clause 101? Scottish lawyers need to be watched just as much as do English lawyers, so I hope that the Under-Secretary will refer to that point.

Reform and overhaul of the legislation that governs building societies is now overdue and the Committee stage will be crucial. We must ensure that the right kind of development is encouraged and that social conditions and housing standards are improved. We must beware of some of the fashionable distractions that have emerged from certain quarters. They seek to divert resources that ought properly to be invested in bricks and mortar and in the environment.

It is all very well that the building societies should be able to do this, that and the other, and it is all very well that we are blurring the distinctions, but there is much to be said for knowing that a building society is a building society and not a bank, a financial society or something else. There comes a point when the distinction becomes so blurred that nobody is very clear about what is meant. During the Committee stage we shall try to pin down the Government in order to ensure that what emerges is better than what we already have.

Mr. John Watts (Slough): I was concerned, before the publication of the Bill, about the basis on which building societies would be allowed to undertake conveyancing work. I feared that a conflict of interest could arise if an employee of a society was also allowed to undertake conveyancing work on behalf of the borrower from the society. I am pleased that building societies are to be permitted to compete for this work, but it is right that they should be excluded from undertaking conveyancing for those who borrow from them. The right hon. Member for Halton (Mr. Oakes) asked where a conflict of interest could arise, and his hon. Friend the Member for Great Grimsby (Mr. Mitchell) pooh-poohed the idea that any conflict could possibly arise.

After a lengthy meander along the Cornish country lanes, I found myself in agreement with the hon. Member for Truro (Mr. Penhaligon), who made the valid point that if we were not careful the package could be so comprehensive that the most vulnerable in house purchase might never receive any truly independent advice at any stage.

Mr. John Mark Taylor (Solihull): Does my hon Friend accept that advice is seldom of the best or the most impartial or most helpful if it comes from someone who is at the same time lending the money?

Mr. Watts: My hon. Friend makes a powerful point. The right hon. Member for Halton wondered where a conflict could arise. He said that the building society and the purchaser had the same interest in establishing good title to the property, and he described that as self-evident. I immediately began to wonder about the terms of the mortgage advance—the point raised by my hon. Friend the Member for Nottingham, North (Mr. Ottaway), who referred to the severe penalties which some societies impose for the early redemption of mortgages.

Does the right hon. Member for Halton or the hon. Member for Great Grimsby believe that a solicitor employed by a building society would point out to a borrower that the terms on which he was being offered the loan were onerous and that he should consider looking elsewhere? That is only one example—I am sure that I could think of others — where a possible conflict of interest could arise. The Bill gets the balance right on that point.

I did not intend to concentrate on the question of conveyancing. Like my hon. Friend the Member for High Peak (Mr. Hawkins), I welcome the Bill because it permits building societies to make an even greater contribution to the development of a property-owning democracy in Britain. The creation of such a democracy is a long-standing Conservative objective. It has been a slogan from the 1950s onward. The Conservatives, since being elected in 1979, have done the most to turn that dream into a reality for hundreds of thousands of people. We need look no further than the right-to-buy legislation to realise the truth of that. Nearly 900,000 new home owners have moved from council and other public sector tenancies into home ownership. I welcome the further proposals for extending or improving the right to buy to the sale of flats.

The concept of a property-owning democracy does not centre solely on home ownership. The programme of privatisation and the encouragement of wider share ownership are also important in this context, and a provision of the Bill will allow building societies from their high street shops to offer some facilities for the sale and purchase of shares. That is a further welcome improvement, although it is a small part of the Bill.

There is no doubt that home ownership remains central to anyone's idea of what a property-owning democracy is about, and policies that encourage the further growth in home ownership are in tune with the wishes and aspirations of the vast majority of our citizens. It is interesting to note that since 1979 the level of home ownership has risen by 1·5 million, including those who have become home owners under the right to buy. Continuing to provide further means of promoting wider opportunities for home ownership should remain at the forefront of our housing policy.

While there has been enormous and commendable progress in facilitating the conversion of council tenants into owner-occupiers, there has been a gap in the total strategy, for the right to buy is not of itself a comprehensive home ownership policy. The gap exists because there has been no effective help available for those not privileged enough to enjoy a public sector tenancy which they can convert into home ownership—people who do not have the means of getting their foot on to the first rung of the ladder of home ownership.

I concede that the figures for the growth of home ownership outside the public sector show that there are still substantial numbers of individuals and families who are able to move into home ownership without any further assistance. That is not to say that it is easy for them or that they can do it without accepting a period of financial hardship. It was ever thus. No doubt most hon. Members have been through those early years of bearing the heavy burden of a mortgage.

My concern is for those who aspire, with the vast majority of their fellow citizens, to home ownership but whose incomes are too low to finance a conventional house purchase—those who find home ownership just outside their grasp at every stage. As their incomes and savings rise, so do the prices of houses, which are always just that bit ahead for them ever to turn their aspiration into a reality.

One of the best solutions for that group, for whom conventional purchase is difficult, is the further development of shared ownership. I speak from personal experience about that, from my six years as leader of the London borough of Hillingdon, where in 1978 we inherited a building programme of 900 houses and decided that our priority was to extend opportunities for home ownership. We offered those houses under construction for sale, with priority to our existing tenants and those on the waiting list who wished to become home owners, and we gave the option of shared ownership.

Over half of those houses were sold on shared ownership terms. The scheme was so popular that queues began to form outside the civic centre in Uxbridge two or three weeks before the date on which the properties were to be released. To avoid the difficulties and hardships of such long waits, we moved to a balloting system—ballots not for mortgages but for houses—as the only equitable way of determining who should benefit from the limited supply of houses that were available under the scheme.

We found almost without exception that purchasers opted to buy the maximum that they could afford. Even though we allowed a minimum of a 50 per cent. stake in a flat or as low as a 30 per cent. stake in a house, people bought the maximum that they could afford. They did not look on shared ownership as a means of paying a minimal premium to get themselves into rented housing. They showed that they wanted to become home owners, and that scheme—part buy, part rent—enabled them to achieve it.

Shared ownership schemes continue to be offered by some local authorities and building societies, but on nothing like the scale that is needed to meet the potential demand. I was sorry to see the demise, because of lack of funds, of the do-it-yourself shared ownership scheme, which operated on a pilot basis a few years ago. It is right that the priorities for public sector housing investment should be improved maintenance and improvements to bring properties up to a better standard, not necessarily in new build or shared ownership, although those are imaginative schemes. I would hold a slightly different view if it were essential that funding had to come from the public sector, but that is not the case.

The Bill makes a major contribution to the development of shared ownership by empowering building societies to participate fully in such schemes. I hope that societies will take full advantage of their new powers, thus extending opportunities for home ownership to a large and new market of potential home owners.

Slough has a housing shortage that arises as a consequence of its economic success. Our unemployment rate is only 6·8 per cent.—the ninth lowest in the country. Skill shortage is the major problem facing companies in Slough. In a recent survey, 82 per cent. of local companies reported difficulties in recruiting skilled labour. Skill shortage is acting as a brake on the further economic growth of companies in my constituency. Slough has had skill shortages in the past. The traditional solution has been to import skilled labour from other parts of the country, but that solution is no longer available, principally because of constraints on housing.

The wider availability of shared ownership schemes and index linked and equity mortgages provided by the Bill could provide substantial help for unemployed skilled workers from other areas who are at present prevented from seeking available jobs in Slough and in other parts of the Thames Valley because of their inability to find a house to rent or to buy. I have in mind especially those who face the substantial gap between the value of a house in, for example, Newcastle and the price that they would have to pay for an equivalent or smaller house in my constituency. Shared ownership is one way in which that problem could be overcome. It could facilitate moving to where the jobs are and where business needs those skills. That would be good for business and for the unemployed.

It is right that the Bill establishes at the outset a limit on the proportion of lending in the non-traditional areas. I welcome the fact that the Building Societies Commission has the power to raise the ceilings. I hope that my right hon. and hon. Friends on the Treasury Bench will not be slow to amend the legislation, should that prove necessary, when we have had some experience of the legislation in practice. I believe that such amendments could be necessary, because shared ownership will become an increasingly popular form of tenure for first-time buyers and for those who are forced to move round the country for employment reasons.

By increasing access to home ownership a substantial new market will be opened up for house builders. Far more opportunities could be created under that scheme than through the old-fashioned and discredited policy of pumping more and more money into public sector housing.

The Bill provides for the hopes and aspirations of thousands, if not millions, of would-be home owners to be met by the private sector through the magic of the market.

Mr. Peter Pike (Burnley): The hon. Member for Slough (Mr. Watts) referred to the shortage of housing in his constituency. That is not a problem in Burnley, where there is a surplus of housing stock in the private and the public sectors. That does not imply that we do not have a housing problem — insufficient finance has created one. The growing divide between the north and the south is illustrated by the empty housing stock. So many people are leaving the area, as they did in the 1930s, because of the lack of employment prospects.

I shall follow the general tone of the debate. Most hon. Members have broadly welcomed the principle of the Bill. However, like many hon. Members, I have reservations about aspects of it. Unfortunately, unlike some hon. Members, I will not be able to serve on the Committee because I am already serving on the Standing Committee that is considering the Gas Bill. However, I shall be closely watching the progress of the Bill. I intended to consider it on Report and on Third Reading. I believe that some changes are needed and I would support some of the changes that have been proposed, but I would be unhappy if other changes were made in Committee.

I accept that building societies need to make changes and it is important that they should meet the demands of the customer. I accept that there is a need for building societies to move into the area of unsecured loans. I am not averse to the 5 per cent. limit in the initial stages, which has the ability to rise to 10 per cent. Many hon. Members may forget how recently high street banks went into unsecured lending. When I first left school and worked in a bank more than 30 years ago, most banks did not lend on an unsecured basis. The Midland bank, for which I first worked, was the first bank to introduce personal loans. I recall that when the Midland bank went into personal loans, which was the biggest growth area of unsecured lending—long before the days of credit cards —the other banks frowned upon that departure and the financial institutions in the City condemned it. Noticeably, the other banks rapidly had to follow the example set by the Midland and made personal loans available.

The need for a limit to be fixed does not arise from the fact that building societies would get into financial difficulties, because they will have to consider carefully any application for unsecured loans. My worry is that, if too much money is used for unsecured lending, there will not be enough funds available for their main function—extending home ownership and assisting people to buy their own home.

My constituency has a long tradition of building societies, which is one reason why home ownership in Burnley is well above the national average and above the figure of 64 per cent. that has been mentioned this afternoon. Building societies have had a long tradition of service to the country and they have played a major role in extending the growth of home ownership. That is shown clearly in my constituency. Until two years ago we had the headquarters of the Burnley building society of which we were very proud. Many people in Burnley regretted the merger of that society with the Provincial building society to form the National and Provincial building society at the start of 1984.

Indeed, many people were opposed to that merger—for two reasons. The town became known throughout the nation from the advertising of that society. The building society, along with Burnley football club, promoted Burnley throughout Britain.

Mr. John Mark Taylor: Would the hon. Gentleman's constituents have objected to that amalgamation if the new building society had been called the Burnley?

Mr. Pike: I am sure that the people of Burnley would have been much happier if it had been named the Burnley and Provincial, the Provincial and Burnley, or some such name. The people of Burnley were opposed to the merger and may well have been tempted to vote against it for that reason, but people in other parts of the country would not have done so because they viewed that change in the same way as people will view this Bill. In other words, they were most concerned about the stability of the building society and the features that we all wish to protect, which we hope will be adequately safeguarded by this legislation.

The Burnley building society was known to the people of the town as the Burnley and they regarded it as their bank. Many people in northern towns do not have bank accounts. It is only relatively recently that people have begun to open accounts with the joint stock banks.

The position of the Burnley building society also highlights the problem of non-agreed mergers with which the Bill deals. If that merger had not been voted for by the members of both societies, it would have been wrong for it to be forced through. I have strong reservations about the proposal in the Bill that gives draconian powers to override the wishes of the people whether it be in relation to a relatively small building society or not.

My hon. Friend the Member for Ipswich (Mr. Weetch) made the point that East Anglia has a large number of local building societies which, like the Burnley, have a fine local tradition. The same applies in many other parts of the country. If people do not want a merger, there should be no way in which it can be forced through.

We need a Bill which will ensure the safety, security and stability of building societies. We must make sure that the Bill protects the interests of the members, whether they be borrowers or depositors. We must also protect the interests of the staff. There is sometimes a reluctance to remember that the staff's interests must be taken into account. We must be mindful, at a time of technological change, that staffing requirements in building societies are changing rapidly. We must be aware of their concern in that direction.

Given the changes that have taken place in building societies over recent years, it is surprising that, when one looks at adverts, whether in newspapers, on hoardings, on television or in the windows of the building society, one rarely sees share accounts being promoted as share accounts. One sees "liquid gold" accounts, accounts combined with a credit card and higher interest accounts. The different building societies have a wide variety of names to choose from. I am a little worried as to why the share account appears to have been demoted. Certainly it has been played down.

I hope that, as has already been mentioned, when the Bill is passed arrangements will be made for a building society ombudsman. There could well be a need for such a person. The insurance industry has had one for a number of years. Banking is to have one and that has been relatively recently announced. I hope that that will be considered as the Bill progresses. If such an ombudsman were recognised by all the building societies and had real authority in resolving disputes, it would take a lot of work away from the commission and enable the commission to concentrate on its most important task—the supervision of societies. That is important.

I am worried about the views expressed by the Abbey National building society. I have strong reservations about the prospect of a building society changing to a public limited company. It will completely change the concept. Just as I spoke against the Trustee Savings Bank Bill, so I have the same opposition to this principle. Building societies have grown on a mutual basis for many years, and that should not be changed. However, if that provision goes through, it will mean that building societies can be taken over by any bank. I am aware that Citibank of America has said that it is looking for 350 outlets in Britain and a public limited company building society could well provide the outlet that it wants.

The voting requirements need to be strong. My objection to the Abbey National's proposal, and the reason why I would if anything want to go even further than the Bill proposes, is that it wants a simple two-thirds majority. Certainly I support the proposal in the Bill rather than that of the Abbey National, which I could not accept. We need the type of safeguard which would give not only investors but also borrowers a vote. I would welcome that, because they have a right to be involved.

On the question of the freedom to manage and the requirement of deposits for people who stand, I accept the figure of £100 in the Bill. I would not want to see it go up to £250, the sum that the Abbey National is talking about. We must have democracy there. My hon. Friend the Member for Ipswich referred to the self-perpetuating system in the past. We do not want to move in that direction.

The staff have strong reservations about the Bill. I met the Federation of Building Society Staff Associations which represents the majority of building society staff. I believe that the Halifax and the Leeds Permanent building societies are not in it, but most of the other big building societies are. It recognises the need for change. Its members wished to make the point that they are not Luddites and they accept that the Bill should go through.

One aspect that the federation would particularly like to see included in the Bill relates to matters affecting staffing and the future of societies. It believes that some consideration should be given to include compulsory consultation, without the power of veto for the staff of building societies. I always support the view that the staff of any organisation should be consulted. I shall be consistent and say that that is a fair point, and I hope that it will be taken into account in Committee. If there is any way of providing such a safeguard, I would welcome it.

I generally support the Bill and will seek to ensure that the safeguards that are in it remain and, if anything, are strengthened. I hope that the one or two points on which I have reservations will be dealt with satisfactorily.

8.8 pm

Mr. John Mark Taylor (Solihull): Any debate which calls into question the immortality of the Lord Chancellor is bound to be a nourishing and interesting one. When it also quotes from none other than Clive Thornton, it is clearly a wide and catholic debate, too.

My remarks will not be uncharitable to the building societies. This is no time for being uncharitable, least of all to an organisation which has made a great virtue of borrowing short and lending long. Indeed, it has made a great success of an admittedly privileged and dominant position in a particularly historic market. After all, building societies lend in fairly safe circumstances—with belt, braces and form-fitting trousers, one might almost say. Usually they lend with the security of 105 per cent. or more of the amount of money that they lend, and with the benefit of a mortgage protection policy for which the borrower has to pay, secured by a valuation for which the borrower also has to pay. When we recall that building societies have enjoyed, by statute, certain historical privileges regarding taxation and stamp duty, it is not difficult to see how they have reached their dominant position in the home loans market.

Building societies have been able to benefit greatly from high interest rates. With the dominant position of the societies, usually the home buyer reconciles himself to a society's terms. There is not much variation between one society and another. It is no more than Hobson's choice for the borrower who buys his home. He is consoled, as has been said, by tax reliefs which make him less discriminatory, in looking at the interest rate that he has to endure, than the customer on the other side of the building society's activities, the depositor, who discriminates very keenly as to the institution with which he places his money. It is because building socities have been able to lend money expensively that they are correspondingly able to attract deposits by high interest rates.

Therefore, without being unfair, one can say that the societies have thrived on a high interest rate regime. In the process they have taken a considerable amount of money out of the economy. Of course, they have helped people to become home owners. One would not doubt the virtue of that for a moment. It would not be stretching anyone's credulity too much to say that if any hon. Member had the good fortune to acquire a few thousand pounds that he had not expected—perhaps through the death of an elderly aunt in Australia—and had the choice of investing that money in an engineering company in the midlands or putting it in the Halifax building society, it would not take him long to decide.

There is an absence of symmetry in the workings of building societies. They can offer very good terms to depositors while at the same time lending money quite expensively to borrowers. That absence of symmetry is also shown when interest rates rise. When that occurs, the person who has borrowed money on a mortgage finds that his interest rate rises immediately and automatically, whereas the person who has deposited funds with the society often finds that, to participate in the new higher rate, he has to give notice, close his account and open a new one.

The role of the building societies—certainly in the 1970s, when house prices climbed so dramatically—is one more reason from the recent past why most fair-minded people will welcome the Bill, and welcome reform within the building society movement. In the 1970s, as many of us remember rather painfully, building societies were still operating on a basis which was such that at one stage in the year they were starved of cash, while at another time they would be bursting with funds and lending uncritically on an inflating property market which they were actually helping to inflate. It is like a shallow tray with liquid in it: if it is tilted a little one way, all the liquid goes to the other end. The system governing building society rates was not them a very discriminating instrument. I think it has improved in recent times.

There are now so many building society branches that some of the high streets in our constituencies are heavily peopled with them. It is a mortmain on the freehold on each of those individual sites. In many constituencies, the high street is decreasingly owned by local people and increasingly owned by institutions from outside the town, with no prospect of those sites ever going back into local private ownership.

The building societies have indeed come a long way from their collectivist origins. Many changes have taken place during that long journey, and we are due for a review. The Bill is a substantial one and a serious attempt to carry out a comprehensive review. I welcome it.

8.15 pm

Mr. William Cash (Stafford): This is, in a sense, a rather nostalgic occasion for me. My family have had much to do with the building society movement in the past century. The Abbey National building society was founded by my great-grandfather, William Cash, and his cousin, John Bright. But we now have to move into the 20th century.

I welcome the Bill. It provides an opportunity, in an intelligent and good framework, to ensure that the young people of tomorrow — and, I hope, those of the immediate future—will be able to get access to funds, which they have had some difficulty in doing. It is of the greatest importance that young people should be able to acquire homes for themselves. The Bill should go a long way towards helping them so to do.

My first point concerns competition. I raised it when the Administration of Justice Bill was going through the House last year. We could be moving into a situation in which we have effectively four main clearing banks which control a series of services, many of which are set out in the Bill. Incidentally, the Bill has to be read closely with the Financial Services Bill, which was released today and forms a kind of kaleidoscope of legislation in this field.

There is no definition of investment in the Bill. That is extraordinary, as there is an extensive definition of investment in the Financial Services Bill. I should be grateful if the Minister would consider that point.

I am slightly concerned about clause 32(2), which enables the Treasury, by order, to vary the power to provide services

"by adding to or deleting from it any description of service or any provision or by varying any description of service".

Will the Minister consider whether that is going too far? Will he let us know in due course exactly what is intended by it? As it is related to financial services, it would seem that the Treasury would have the power to extend to almost anything the services that a building society could provide. I shall be grateful for some indication of the direction in which the Minister thinks that the power is likely to be used.

Clause 86 relates to the transfer of business to a commercial company. The 20 per cent. restriction — given that there is the power to do the conversion — should be much more easily obtained than by the 20 per cent. rule that is being imposed. Given that building societies are to be enabled to do it, I have some reservations as to whether the cost is justified in the circumstances.

The press note that was published on 6 December says that comments to the Treasury are invited by the end of January. I understand, therefore, that that is part of the consultative process of Second Reading. I ask the Minister if he will look at the matter. I understand the reasons for including the 20 per cent. rule, but I feel that if it is to be done it will be done at great expense by a few of the building societies and I wonder if it is as important as has been claimed.

I wish to refer again to the subject of competition. When I was studying the material for the Administration of Justice Bill 1985 I came across a speech by Sir Gordon Borrie about the provision of competition in conveyancing. He said that it was important to have an element of weed killer that he would liberally supply, if given the opportunity, to make sure that there was competition in the provision of conveyancing services as and when provided by the main institutions. As we move into this new era of competition between the banks and the building societies, I ask the Minister to make sure that we do not end up with the banks having such a stranglehold over the system that the consumer at large finds that without that dose of weed killer he is faced with cartels which have a tremendous amount of monopoly power in terms of land tenure, stock jobbing, insurance, brokerage, estate agency and conveyancing services. I am concerned that there might appear to be competition but, although justified in international terms, from the consumer's point of view there is a near monopoly.

Perhaps the Minister will have an opportunity to explain those matters in Committee. I welcome the Bill and I look forward to hearing the Minister's comments.

8.22 pm

Mr. Peter Viggers (Gosport): Like many right hon. and hon. Members this evening, I must declare an interest in this matter, although it is a negative interest. If it were a theatrical performance, the programme note would carry an item that read "Mr. Viggers appears by courtesy of the Portsmouth building society."

I join other right hon. and hon. Members in praising my hon. Friend the Economic Secretary to the Treasury for introducing the Bill and for all the work that I know he has put in in the many months since its gestation began. He has taken great care in consulting many people, building societies and others, and it is a great tribute to him that most of the debate has been criticism of points of detail. Broadly speaking, the Bill has the support of both sides of the House.

I support the modernisation and liberalisation of the building society movement, but I am concerned about three clauses. Clause 84(2) gives a building society access to the list of members of a building society which it may wish to acquire or merge with. I am concerned for several reasons that another building society should have access to a target building society's list of members. The list has considerable commercial value. Larger societies might try to pick off smaller societies for various reasons. The new commission will have the power to regulate the reserves of societies and it may be that a society which has insufficient reserves will find it an attractive proposition to approach another society that has more adequate reserves in an attempt to merge.

Some hon. Members have referred to rationalisation in building societies. It has been pointed out that the number of building societies has reduced from 400 to 190 in 10 years and it is likely to reduce further. I quote from Mr. Peter Birch, the chief general manager of the Abbey National building society, who was interviewed on television on 8 December 1985:

"there are far too many Building Societies — in some High Streets there are 25 Building Society Branch Offices. The number of societies must reduce dramatically in the near future"

There will clearly be a desire on behalf of some managers of building societies to merge with others and I think that the reduction in numbers in the past 10 years has shown that building societies are receptive to mergers. I do not think that it would be a good idea to open the door to contested mergers.

Unfortunately, I have some experience of a contested takeover, not among building societies. I am the director of a small oil company. By oil company standards "small" means about £70 million market capitalisation. We were subject to an aggressive takeover about a year ago. It took about £500,000 of legal fees, accountancy fees and circulars to beat off that unwelcome takeover bid. That did not include the cost of any advertising. We must think of the problems that would occur if one building society were to approach another and seek to merge with it against the wishes of the target building society. The money deposited by investors in the building society would be used in a contested bid. That is not what the money is there for.

My hon. Friend has taken great care to build restrictions into the Bill which will prevent building societies from being taken over. I respect the fact that he has included a provision so that the members of the target company have to pass a resolution in terms of borrowers and depositors. There are restrictions on the minimum number of people who can vote in the meetings of the building society to approve a merger and so on. My argument is that we do not want to be involved in that area at all.

Mr. John Fraser: I wonder whether the hon. Gentleman will explain something that has always mystified me. Why do smaller building societies — I think the Portsmouth building society is one of them — tend to place their mortgages through brokers who take commission from borrowers and tend not to use panel solicitor arrangements? That increases the cost to borrowers. Why is that more prevalent in smaller building societies than large ones? Is that one of the things that they are sensitive about in relation to takeovers?

Mr. Viggers: The hon. Gentleman is an experienced Member of the House and, I think, a practising solicitor. I think that he is probably in a better position to answer that than I am. I cannot speak on behalf of the smaller building societies with whom I have no connection other than that which I have disclosed. The smaller building societies with whom I have had discussions and who have informed me of their position appear to be extremely successful in their rate of growth and in the service that they provide to their customers and depositors. Other than that, I cannot answer the hon. Gentleman's question.

My second concern is clause 82. It is a question born of interest rather than a concern of substance. Borrowers are to be given voting rights for the first time in the Bill. It is interesting that that should be the case. I cannot see that a borrower from a building society should have any more right to vote over the future of the building society than a person who has an overdraft from a bank. One may think that a borrower from a building society is in a more stable position than a person who has an overdraft at a bank. However, the average mortgage lasts approximately seven years, whereas a bank customer is usually there for life. It is a staggering fact that a young person is more likely to get a divorce than to change his clearing bank. Therefore, there is more stability in overdrafts than in borrowing from a building society.

Mr. Christopher Hawkins: That figure about the average mortgage lasting seven or five years is an illusion because that is how often, on average, people move. They then take out another mortgage or transfer the mortgage to another house. The building societies continue to quote that figure and it is terribly misleading.

Mr. Viggers: I accept my hon. Friend's point. I do not have any figures, and I do not know whether any hon. Member has, as to the number of people who return to the building society which they were previously with. I suspect, as my hon. Friend said, that they frequently return to the same building society. I accept his point.

My third point relates to my anxiety about clauses 11, 12 and 18, which refer to the restriction of the building society's right to lend on premises which are defined as "for a person's residential use".

The inter-relationship between those clauses means that a mortgage can be granted on freehold and leasehold estate, provided that it is not more than £60,000 to any one borrower or limited company. The restriction is intended to apply so that not more than 10 per cent. of the amount lent by a building society will be for premises other than those which are for the residential use of the borrower. To find the definition of "residential use of the borrower"

we have to go to other clauses.

The question then arises whether premises are exclusively owner-occupied. In areas such as that which I represent there are many guest houses, rest homes, hotels, flatlets, bed-sits, and shops to which loans are made. It may be that 40 per cent. of those premises are not occupied exclusively by the owner. Large parts of those premises are in common use. I am worried that building societies might be unduly restricted if they have to make 90 per cent. of their loans on premises which are occupied exclusively by the owner. Will my hon. Friend consider that point, which has been made in writing? I hope that he will take it into account in Committee.

Mr. Conal Gregory (York): This is the first entirely new legal framework for the building societies movement since the Building Societies Act 1874, and it is right that it should be debated at some length today. Much has changed since then, with societies wishing to extend their range of services. In considering the Bill, the House is modernising and strengthening the operations of societies, including the establishment of a Building Societies Commission and a new statutory investor protection scheme.

I fully support extending investor choice, commensurate with adequate safeguards. The conversion procedure should allow those societies which wish to develop beyond the present legislation to evolve to the benefit of their members. However, we should not lose sight of the raison d'etre of the building societies, which is to facilitate the purchase of homes. Everything else is ancillary. Widening the package of services to include estate agency, valuations and survey work may be helpful, but it may be a grey area where there is a conflict of professional loyalty between service to the society and those seeking funds.

The management of residential land and the operation of services in other European Community states can be seen as useful adjuncts to the societies' overall role.

Building societies have greatly assisted individuals and families to become home owners. They serve about 25 million people. It is right, therefore, that the Bill restricts 90 per cent. of lending to owner-occupiers with first mortgages. After all the Conservative party encourages saving and investment, fosters home ownership—now about 62 per cent. of the population—and promotes improvements in housing standards.

I believe the members of the Building Societies Association to be honourable, and I am proud that Yorkshire is the home of no fewer than 11 such societies —seven giants in the form of the Bradford and Bingley, Halifax, Leeds and Holbeck, Leeds Permanent, National and Provincial, Skipton and Yorkshire; and four fine, if smaller, societies: Barnsley, Beverley, Scarborough and Sheffield. All 11 of those Yorkshire-based societies give greater protection to investors than other non-association building societies by Government designation as eligible for trustee investment status, and by being members of the Building Societies Association's investors' protection scheme.

However, there are 32 building societies nationally which do not belong to the association. I seek assurances from my hon. Friend that investors will be adequately safeguarded. Some of the societies have sizeable liabilities —the Century with over £6·1 million, the Foresters with over £1·7 million, Kidderminster Equity whose liabilities exceed £2·7 million, Louth, Mablethorpe and Sutton with over £3·3 million, Merseyside with over £2·7 million and Thrift with over £9 million. Three societies in the group are based in Yorkshire—the Capital and Counties of Sheffield, Kirklees of Dewsbury, and the Ecology of Keighley which has some admirable aims in revitalising older property. The liabilities of all those non-association members exceed £60 million. Those societies include some with enticing names such as the British building society, the County of London building society, and the United Kingdom building society, and, one might add, the Immigrants building society which might well appeal to ethnic minorities.

Investor protection under the Bill must be more beneficial than that of the association which is less than 100 per cent. The Bill suggests a level of protection of only 75 per cent. That is much less than should be acceptable to those who entrust their savings to the building society movement. Why should less than 100 per cent. be set in statute?

On the plus side for investor protection, I welcome the hope that societies that are currently outside the scheme will come within the range of the Building Societies Commission and safeguard funds deposited with them.

Whilst I have drawn my hon. Friend's attention to the need to protect the investor through the full range of institutions that seek the status of a building society, the greatest omission from the Bill is in respect of protection for the borrower. I give three telling instances. The first is the differential rates of interest, the second is portability, and the third is penalty clauses.

On differential rates of interest, the societies are quick to respond to market forces for investors but slow for borrowers. There is such a wide turn that societies could assist by reducing their management charges which are about £1·19 for each £100 of assets managed.

With regard to portability, societies should not make it difficult for borrowers to transfer their mortgages. Portability is an important factor in job mobility. Penalty clauses should be outlawed. For example, societies should not seek to impose three months' penalty interest if a mortgage is redeemed within three years of its commencement.

Whilst the authorisation regulations ensure that building societies have to maintain a minimum liquidity ratio for trustees' funds, clause 19 does not continue that requirement, but it sets an upper ceiling. There is no minimum reserve ratio as presently set out.

It will surprise many inside and outside the House that societies have allowed their liquid assets to rise to about one-fifth of total assets—20 per cent. plus. That is excessive. It goes beyond a reasonable buffer level of, say, 8 per cent., but the Bill permits an increase to 33·5 per cent. If the primary role of building societies is to assist home owners, their funds should be invested substantially in bricks and mortar.

I echo the warmth expressed already for the friendly and helpful attitude of building societies' staff. I know that those in York are held in high regard and enable many citizens of all ages to have a solid stake in a property-owning democracy. More competition and freer financial services will benefit all who seek to own a roof over their head and build up a small nest egg for the future. The Bill takes us further towards those objectives. I commend it to the House.

Mr. Tim Smith (Beaconsfield): I welcome the Bill, as far as it goes. I congratulate my hon. Friend the Economic Secretary on the work that he has put into producing it over the last two years.

The Bill is really the product of an agreement between the Treasury and the Building Societies Association. As a result, I find it unduly cautious and unduly conservative. Of course, no one should underestimate the major contribution that building societies have made to home ownership, but I am always a little suspicious when people get up, one after the other, and tell us just how wonderful something is, and when they are generally euphorically ecstatic about it.

The myth that building societies are the only institutions that could contribute to home ownership was destroyed quickly when the clearing banks moved into that market four or five years ago. As I said in an intervention, they are now very big in that market and service a large number of people. Therefore, it is not only the building societies that are making a major contribution.

Today, the financial services market is changing rapidly, and building societies are well placed to take advantage of the growth and the proliferation of financial services. That growth has, in part, been stimulated by the Government's policy initiatives on the extension of share ownership and on personal pensions, all of which is to be welcomed. The building societies are well placed because of their branch network and their prime positions in many high streets.

If we allow building societies to compete, they will do so on an equal basis with the clearing banks. For too long, the clearing bank cartel has been left untouched. At the top end of the market there is fierce competition for business. The Americans are falling over themselves to lend to the likes of ICI. But at the bottom end of the market there are four stodgy old clearing banks with little to choose between them. It is the small business man who is the loser. Of course, he is partly to blame because, when he asks to borrow money, he is so frightened of being turned down by his bank manager that the last thing that he asks about is the rate of interest.

What bank ever rang a small business man and offered to lend him money? What clearing bank employs people as salesmen? For too long the clearing banks have had it too cosy. As a result, the cost of borrowing is far higher for the small business man than it need be.

There are only two solutions to the problem—first, the clearing banks should be broken up, or, secondly, they should be subjected to more rigorous competition. I cannot envisage any Government agreeing to breaking up the clearing banks. Indeed the Labour party wants to nationalise them, so competition would be completely eliminated. The solution must be more competition. However, effective competition can be provided only by institutions that already have a branch network. In practice, it must be the building societies.

The Bill is too restricted to allow that to happen. That is because of the deal to which I referred between the Building Societies Association and the Treasury. The association is unduly cautious because most building society general managers have never worked anywhere other than in a building society and are frightened of radical change.

One man who does not fit that category is Mr. Peter Birch, the chief executive of the Abbey National building society. On the competition point, he says that societies have to compete with their hands tied behind their backs. The Abbey's total assets are about £20 billion. The 5 per cent. restriction means that it will be limited to lending no more than £1 billion unsecured, rising to £2 billion. That sounds a great deal of money, but we need only look at the clearing banks' figures to put it into perspective. Mr. Birch believes, and I agree, that the 5 per cent. and 10 per cent. figures should be doubled.

Then there is the question of incorporation. My view is that the Bill should require all societies to incorporate and become subject to banking supervision within 10 years of the passing of the Bill—that is by the end of 1996. We could then do away with the two separate bodies of law and the two separate regulatory structures designed to regulate two groups of institutions that should, in due course, be competing as equals.

Mr. Birch does not go as far as I would. He simply states, and I agree, that the proposals for voluntary conversion are so restrictive as to be unachievable. In particular, the proposal that 20 per cent. of depositors should vote for incorporation is wholly unrealistic. The Halifax would need 1·5 million votes in favour and the Abbey National would need 1·6 million votes.

We must remember that votes are not weighted as they are in companies. If I have £1 invested in a building society, I have one vote. If I have £20,000 invested, I still have only one vote. It is an absurd voting structure.

Mr. Christopher Hawkins: Why?

Mr. Smith: That is self-evident. Building societies have millions of investors and they must treat them all as equals. They must send out millions of copies of the annual report and accounts. Most people do not put their money into a building society because they want a copy of the report and accounts, because they want to make the building society accountable, or because they want to participate in the reserves. They do so because they want security for their money.

The voting structure is nonsense. We could overcome the problem of incorporation if we recognised that large depositors should have more say than someone who invests 50p. The system is a nonsense. Only a tiny majority of depositors actually take any interest in the affairs of the society in which they invest. They do not invest to become members of the society; they are probably not aware that they are entitled to shares in the reserves. They invest for security, accessibility and convenience.

I once went into a building society and asked for a copy of its annual report. The counter clerk had no idea of what I was talking about. The return had to be obtained from head office. That is how often investors ask about a society's affairs and that is how much interest they take in the society. Therefore, why are we intending to make it so difficult for societies to incorporate?

In a relatively protected business environment, building societies have been a great success. They have marketed their limited but expanding range of services effectively. Their high street branches are much more attractive and inviting than those of the clearing banks. This Bill offers a great opportunity to allow them to take on the monolithic clearing banks. If they are to succeed, as Mr. Birch said, they must not have their arms tied behind their backs.

Mr. John Fraser (Norwood): Like other hon. Members, I must declare an interest as a borrower and a lender, and, of course, as a solicitor. It is only right that I should declare the latter. My hon. Friend the Member for Great Grimsby (Mr. Mitchell) is not here, but some matters involving solicitors evoke great passions. It is almost as though Mr. Eddie Shah had undertaken to do his own journalism, and also to sub-contract for others as well.

I can quite understand why these matters will be debated with great passion. There needs to be an occasion on which that single issue can be discussed by the House. There needs to be an opportunity to vote on that issue alone. The issue has been raised not only by my hon. Friend the Member for Great Grimsby, but by other hon. Members.

[Mr. John Fraser]

I have to make a second declaration, which is not one of interest but one of affection and love. Like many other hon. Members, I am a fan of the building societies, and even more so of the principle of mutuality and of the non-profit making structure that building societies represent.

Of course, building societies are not without their blemishes, although it is very difficult to find many serious blemishes on their record during the past couple of hundred years. Even when blemishes have arisen, the movement has rallied round. For example, it did so when the South London building society was at risk; the Woolwich building society assumed its obligations and came to the rescue. In broad terms, the building societies have fulfilled the functions that they set out to fulfil when they were formed 200 years ago. They provide finance for housing at reasonably cheap rates.

It is worth while reflecting for a moment upon the success of building societies. On the whole, they have been efficient organisations. I have found them personal and free from the mystique and fear that the banks impart to people wanting to borrow money. They do not engage in the excessive pontificating and remuneration associated with the top bankers. The building societies' operating margins have been extremely keen compared with other private sector lenders and Government organisations. Above all, the building societies have been patriotic. I agree with the Economic Secretary to the Treasury that building societies exist to provide housing in the United Kingdom. Broadly speaking, they should continue to fulfil that function.

I have recently been in correspondence with a bank, although I do not know why it circularised me. I opened a letter one day in which one of our leading banks told me that I should now invest in Germany and in German growth. I dropped it a note about patriotism, which I assume it dismissed. The following month I received another note from the bank telling me to invest——

Mr. Penhaligon: In Japan.

Mr. Fraser: The hon. Gentleman is correct; he must know which bank I am talking about. The same bank is fairly heavily committed in Argentina and I do not suppose that there are many countries in which it would not put its money if it thought that it was possible to turn a penny for its shareholders.

I do not wish to spend time castigating the banks, but there is a strong distinction between banks and building societies. The banks, because they think it is in the interests of their investors and their shareholders, are ready to push their money into any part of the world, without morals or remorse. The banks believe that it is their function to make the maximum profit by any form of operation and the bank rate tribunal some years ago revealed the full depth of these operations.

In contrast, the building societies are patriotic bodies —partly because the law does not allow them to be anything else. I hope that the building societies continue to provide the £100 billion for investment that is largely sunk in Britain. If there is a choice between providing money for people who are badly in need of housing, whether in Brixton, in the constituency of my hon. Friend the Member for Glasgow, Maryhill (Mr. Craigen) or in any other area, providing money for jobs or lending money to buy second homes on the Costa del Sol, I would want the money to be invested in Britain, in our future and our jobs. No aspect of building societies legislation should weaken the building societies' long-standing tradition of investing in this country.

Building societies are proof that the profit motive is not the only motivating force. They have shown that social ownership in a competitive environment can be a roaring success. That has been such a success that the building societies have written their own White Paper — the Government did not write it—for reform. That is why the Bill is before the House today. The last thing I want to see is the building societies turning into a capitalist institution modelled on the banks. I admire, and the Opposition want to preserve, the principle of mutuality, based usually on one person, one vote. We would like to add to that principle the principle of accountability.

If there is to be any change, there should be legislation to make the banks into mutual organisations rather than to turn the building societies into public limited companies. I welcome the Economic Secretary's comments about the greater accountability of building societies to their members.

The Opposition are wholly opposed to the proposal that building societies should be able to convert themselves into public limited companies. The Treasury proposals are very much constrained. Massive constraints are built into the idea that a building society can convert into a public limited company. I realise that the clause relating to that is a dummy clause. I hope that the Government, like a baby growing up, will throw the dummy away and remove the proposal to convert to public limited companies. I have some reservations about the practices of some of the smaller building societies, but it would very much divert the energy of the building society movement if it were to start becoming involved in contested takeovers. There is a good case for dropping those provisions.

It is suggested in the building societies' document of February 1984 that the movement should be able to lend overseas, especially to EEC countries. I think that it would be a pity if that were to happen. It would be a drain on investment. There is enough money pouring out of Britain already to invest in industry elsewhere without the building societies joining the queue.

As I understand it, it is proposed that the building societies should be enabled to invest comparatively small sums in subsidiaries, which will then raise funds for lending on the purchase of property outside the United Kingdom. If that is done by a subsidiary which raises its funds locally—there can, of course, be a link with the United Kingdom society—that is all right. If it means a flood of funds leaving the United Kingdom, I am opposed to it.

I do not believe that it is necessary for building societies to place their mortgages via brokers. It should not be necessary for a borrower to have to pay a broker. He will have to pay the broker for finding a mortgage with one of the smaller building societies and, in effect, he will pass on a substantial commission to the broker on the arrangement of life assurance. A society's lending policy should be open and known and not a vehicle for others to make a profit out of the house purchase transaction, which is not necessary.

We need a strong consumer voice in the running of building societies. In the past, this has asserted itself through the National Consumer Council. There have been changes in policy, so that borrowers now have a choice of insurer for their fire insurance. A good deal of pressure has widened the system of panel solicitors, which has reduced the cost to the borrower.

I want to see a strong consumer voice on the Building Societies Commission. I understand that it is intended that there should be between four and 10 members. When the Minister replies, I hope that he will tell us how many of the members will be consumer representatives.

There is no need to be afraid of an open discussion between the Building Societies Commission and the building society movement about the development of building society policy. For instance, the commission and the movement should not be afraid to ask building societies about their redlining policy. I know that that policy has diminished considerably and that societies such as the Abbey National have done a great deal to help in the purchase and renovation of properties in the inner cities. However, I hope that the consumer members of the Building Societies Commission will press for openness of building society policy on lending in the inner cities, which were called redline areas. I hope also that they will encourage building societies to develop policies that bear on the categories of borrower, so that there is a fair spread of lending covering those at each end of the income range. I trust that the spread will include lending to those from different ethnic origins and to women as well as to men. Much more information should be provided to members as well as consumers.

I hope that building societies can be encouraged to take a public view on their proposals for unsecured lending. I understand the societies' argument that, if they are to run current accounts and guarantee cheque systems, there is always the risk that someone may run into overdraft and need to have unsecured lending provision. On the other hand, for building societies to lend as much as £20 billion unsecured, for purposes unassociated with housing, would be a great departure from the traditional role of building societies, and one that I would regret.

I should like to see the societies using their powers for unsecured lending—which is limited to 5 per cent. of their lending — for top-ups on repairs, for example, when someone is short of money, cannot afford to repair his home without borrowing and does not want to go through all the formalities associated with a further advance. Unsecured lending could well be used for other forms of housing expenditure instead of using that provision for entering into competition with the banks.

The hon. Member for Beaconsfield (Mr. Smith) wants to see the building societies with the shackles taken off as the big competitors of the banks. That is a perfectly honourable aim. If I had to choose between the building societies having the shackles taken off to provide more money for housing and the building societies having them taken off to provide more competition with the banks, I know where the Opposition's priority would lie—in the provision of housing.

We believe that legislation should codify the best voluntary standards to protect investors. It is wrong to have a doctrine of equality of misery with the banks. The guarantee to investors should be at least 90 per cent., and preferably 100 per cent., which would make the large building societies more careful about the activities of those who might be at risk.

At the moment, building society lending is almost exclusively for owner-occupation. We should not be too starry-eyed about this, because the Bank of England calculated in one bulletin that about half the money that was being lent for the purchase of homes was leaking into other forms of financing, such as for use in borrowers' businesses, in trading up to get the advantages of capital gains and in purchasing consumer goods. One must not make too light of this. There has been a series of commentaries on this matter, including "Faith in the Cities" and the reports of the Duke of Edinburgh, and even commentaries from building society organisations. There is concern about the use of subsidised money which is not going primarily in the provision of housing but is being fed through the system of house mortgages for other purposes.

There is an overwhelming demand for private housing to buy, which is being satisfied by the building societies movement, but the overwhelming need, as opposed to the overwhelming demand, is for low-cost housing to rent, or to buy, or for mixed tenure. I should like the building societies to put more money into meeting the overwhelming need for housing as well as the demand for funds simply for house purchase. In some ways, the Bill does not go far enough in giving the building societies movement flexibility to lend for different kinds of tenure.

I am not certain that it is right to restrict building societies to 90 per cent. lending for class 1 assets when they could be lending or investing more money in, for example, shared ownership schemes. They could put their money into many other types of schemes—for example, for the purchase of property for the elderly. Many elderly people want to get out of their large houses, to realise their capital and move to a combination of renting and purchase so that they can release some of their capital for their old age. I should like building societies to encourage such an operation. I want them to put money into shared ownership schemes and towards housing to rent. Within the primary purpose of providing money for housing, I think that building societies may be too restricted in the percentages laid down for lending for house purchase.

Improvements and repair are another aspect where we could do with some experimentation in the way in which building societies help housing. The repair and improvement policy is in an absolute shambles. Because of the way in which housing investment programmes have been cut, many local authorities, whether Labour or Tory —there is no longer any political distinction between Labour and Tory authorities — have had to cut their house improvement and repair programmes arbitrarily. That is to the great distress of many individual house owners and, in the long term, is to the disadvantage of our housing stock.

It might be a good idea if the Government were to look at ways in which the building societies — I am not excluding the local authorities in any way—might help a great deal more in housing repair and improvement rescue operations. Some subsidy might be channelled through building societies. They are well equipped to react quickly to borrowers' needs. We have these new powers to provide for unsecured lending. I am sure that is worth exploring at a time when there is a virtual famine of money available to the poorer owner-occupier for housing and repair. Many of the Bill's provisions will help the building societies to compete with the banks for housing funds on fairer terms. As a result of the Bill, I hope that even more money will flow into the provision of housing, which is still one of the country's greatest needs.

In so far as the Bill fulfils those purposes, we welcome it. In so far as the Bill contains aspects which may weaken the general thrust of the building society movement, we should examine them carefully in Committee. With those reservations, we support the Second Reading of the Bill.

9.5 pm

The Parliamentary Under-Secretary of State for the Environment (Sir George Young): The debate has been a little like a mortgage—it has lasted somewhat longer than was envisaged at the outset—but it has been a good one, and bodes well for consideration of the Bill in Committee. My hon. Friend the Economic Secretary and I have made notes of the detailed points raised in the debate.

Hon. Members have shown considerable allegiance to small local building societies and have spoken of them in affectionate terms normally reserved for their football teams. I shall say a word about smaller societies later.

The Opposition motion says

"That this House declines to give a Second Reading to a Bill".

There seems to me to be a slight discrepancy between that and what the hon. Member for Norwood (Mr. Fraser) said in his closing remarks—indeed, what every Opposition Member said, apart from the hon. Member for Thurrock (Dr. McDonald). I think I can say without distorting the facts that, almost without exception, Opposition Members welcomed the broad thrust of the Bill and the general principles behind it, although, of course, with reservations about one or two aspects that will be examined in Committee.

I thought that the speech of the hon. Member for Thurrock was a rather conservative one. The reality is that the building societies now operate in a changing world. The legislative framework which may have been right 100 years ago is no longer appropriate. If we are to harness the energy and resources of the building societies in the ways explained by the hon. Member for Thurrock, we must look at the framework and modernise it. There was a general consensus, I think, that the Bill proposes a package of sensible measures that will enable those objectives to be achieved.

My hon. Friend the Member for High Peak (Mr. Hawkins) was anxious that the traditional role of the building societies should remain. As I believe he knows, at least 90 per cent. of their business will be devoted to their traditional function of mortgage loans for house purchase. I give him the assurance for which he asked on any necessary changes to the conversion procedure. I commend him on his successful campaign on index-linked mortgages. I think that he is right to juxtapose the measures in the Bill giving access to index-linked mortgages with the existing entitlements under the right to buy. It may well be that a number of local authority tenants, when they re-work the sums, will find that with an index-linked mortgage they are better off buying council houses with a discount than remaining tenants.

The right hon. Member for Halton (Mr. Oakes)—one of the many vice-presidents of the Building Societies Association who spoke in the debate—made what I thought was a realistic contribution. He outlined what was in it for the building societies. It is of course the case that the Building Societies Association has welcomed the Bill.

There was quite a lot of debate on unagreed mergers. An unagreed merger is one that is unagreed by the board, not by the members. If one is to follow the principle of mutuality, which is control by the members, it is right that decisions about the future of a society should be taken by the members. As the law now stands, a building society board can effectively veto any merger proposal it happens not to like simply by refusing to circulate the proposal to members. This may be for reasons that are in the narrow interest of the board rather than in the broader interests of the society as a whole. I do not see why building society boards should be accorded this privilege.

That having been said, we recognise the fears expressed by hon. Members which reflect the concern of the smaller societies. Without some safeguards, it might be possible to abuse the procedures. The new merger procedures in the Bill embody a few safeguards. For example, no small society can merge with a much larger one without the consent of at least 20 per cent. of those eligible to vote. My hon. Friend the Member for Beaconsfield (Mr. Smith) said that that was rather a hurdle to overcome, particularly in the larger societies with a fluctuating membership, and limits will be placed on cash bonuses to members, so preventing one socieity from buying off the members of another with large payments from its own reserves. At the moment, there are no such restrictions, so that will be an additional safeguard.

My hon. Friend the Member for Ludlow (Mr. Cockeram) made a point about the costs of the annual report and drew an analogy with bank depositors, who are not entitled to receive an annual report. I am sure that he will recognise that the analogy is not fair, because a bank depositor is not a member in the sense that a depositor in a building society is.

The hon. Member for Truro (Mr. Penhaligon) suggested that the Government did not have much serious legislation to get through the House and had produced a 207 page Bill to keep Ministers, the House of Commons and civil servants happy. He said that he did not know why we were introducing the Bill. I suggest that he rereads in Hansard tomorrow the speech made by my hon. Friend the Economic Secretary. It sets out clearly what the problems are in the building society movement and how one needs an up-to-date framework to tackle some of the problems that remain in housing. I assure the hon. Gentleman that Ministers, Back Bench Members and everybody else have enough work to do without, just for the hell of it, engaging on a rather comprehensive exercise just to fill what he may see as a gap in the legislative programme.

My hon. Friend the Member for Brentwood and Ongar (Mr. McCrindle) made some points about early redemption penalties and the ombudsman, and we shall have a look at that. The hon. Member for Ipswich (Mr. Weetch) asked what perception the Government had of the future of the building society movement. In the moving peroration to his speech, my hon. Friend the Economic Secretary set out how we see the building society movement developing.

The hon. Member for Glasgow, Maryhill (Mr. Craigen) echoed an aspiration that we all have, that of cheaper mortgages. There is a tradeoff here between cheaper mortgages and the availability of mortgages. For the past few years, there has been no mortgage famine such as that which we used to have, although the price may have been the slightly higher mortgages. Speaking as a housing Minister, I would prefer to see the ready availability of mortgage funds, albeit at a slightly higher price, than the famines that we used to have at a slightly lower price. The hon. Member for Norwood asked about the exodus of funds and recognised that my hon. Friend had dealt with this in his opening speech. It is our contention that money sent overseas should be raised overseas.

We are now in the consultation period of the Green Paper on improvement grants. We are absorbing the comments that were made on it, such as those made by the Building Societies Association, which has responded. Scottish conveyancing is under consideration. As the hon. Member for Norwood will know, the system in Scotland is different from ours and for that reason it is not appropriate to be dealt with in the same way.

My hon. Friend the Member for Slough (Mr. Watts) demolished the arguments put forward by the hon. Member for Great Grimsby (Mr. Mitchell). I am sorry that the latter was not here to listen to what my hon. Friend said about the real conflict of interest that can emerge when a building society solicitor also acts for the chap who wants the mortgage. He gave one example of a problem that might well crop up with the loan. The borrower might be better advised to go to another lender. It is not the case that the building society's solicitor would so advise him because he has a duty to his employer. The solicitor would have to divulge to his employer anything that might affect his willingness to make the loan, so the client might feel inhibited about seeking confidential advice about the change in his financial circumstances. There is a genuine issue about the conflict of interests over which the hon. Member for Great Grimsby slightly glossed.

The hon. Member for Burnley (Mr. Pike), like other Labour Members, welcomed the broad principle of the Bill and my hon. Friend the Member for Stafford (Mr. Cash) asked some difficult questions. He asked what services would be covered by the Bill and said that he could not find that information in the Bill. My hon. Friend the Economic Secretary, who knows the Bill backwards, advises me that schedule 8 will give the answer.

With regard to the investor protection scheme, we are increasing statutory protection, but it is open to the building societies and the BSA to continue the existing level of protection if they so wish. There is no detriment in what we are proposing. For the first time, investors with building societies will have the protection of a similar statutory scheme which depositors with banks enjoy. The BSA does maintain a scheme on a voluntary basis and it shall be free to continue that. The 100 per cent. protection is not the same protection as that which is given to bank depositors and one has to put them on the same basis.

The point was raised about the disclosure of a list of members in a disagreed merger. The Bill is clear on this. A list of members can be disclosed only for the purpose of circulating merger proposals and not for recruiting people to societies or any other purpose.

The hon. Member for Norwood seems to have a reputation with the banks as someone with a high disposable income ready to be invested in Japan, Germany or anywhere else. I must say that no one on this Bench receives letters from clearing banks inviting him to invest in this country or elsewhere. There is a slight inconsistency in what the hon. Gentleman said about being in favour of mutuality and yet against conversion. Conversion can take place only if the society members wish it.

Finally, I wish to comment on the housing aspect of the Bill which is my ministerial interest. The Bill gives building societies an opportunity to own and develop land as a commercial asset. This will enable them to offer a form of entry into home ownership which has been both effective and popular—shared ownership or buying in stages. Until now, shared ownership has been achieved through housing associations or local authorities. Building societies have been involved in many of these projects as providers of finance. In future, they will be able to play a more direct role as the owners of the residual rented portion of the house. They will also be able to provide accommodation for rent which the hon. Member for Norwood was anxious they should do.

Index-linked mortgages provide scope for housing associations to obtain funds on terms which allow repayment to start low and increase over time by reference to an index. This matches their income from increased rent on shared ownership schemes. I hope that the good link between building societies and housing associations will be developed.

As Minister with responsibility for housing, I have taken special interest in such services, which play an important role in stimulating renovation work which otherwise might not be carried out. Two days ago I opened a new project in Gloucester which had been put together by the neighbourhood revitalisation services arm of the National House-Building Council and with the active co-operation of a local building society. Building societies have played an important part in these schemes, but there have been restrictions on what they are able to do. They have not been able to offer agency services. This Bill will enable them to do this. Anyone who has an interest in urban area housing will welcome these new powers.

We want to encourage the building societies to become much more closely involved in the revitalisation of our run-down council estates. Several societies are almost actively helping in this area by providing finance both for the redevelopment of estates and mortgages for the new owner-occupiers. In the Wirral, the local authority has teamed up with a builder and, with finance from a building society, tackled a council estate's rotten core. That area has been transformed and there has been a dramatic spin-off effect on the rest of the estate.

We want to see much more similar work with the building societies taking a prominent, active role on run-down estates. The Bill gives building societies the flexibility they need to do so. The building society movement has a unique status in this country, both legally and in the public mind. They are rooted in their mutual tradition and they take their social responsibilities seriously. But they have a responsibility to act prudently, and we do not want building societies to act as social agencies at a loss. But our proposals sit well with their traditional activities. They have been associated with housing associations and housing trusts and will be able to do much more by setting up subsidiaries as housing trusts, which they cannot do at present. We want to do more to simplify house buying. Again, the Bill makes a contribution to that, because the societies will be able to offer estate agent, surveying and valuation services, which will benefit house buyers and sellers.

The Bill will bring many benefits to housing. Home ownership will be made easier for many. New efforts can be put into solving the many problems of our inner cities, and we can do all of that without altering the traditional image of the building societies. We are building on an enviable reputation—substantial achievements for many years—and I believe that the founders of the societies would be pleased with the new opportunities that we are offering.

[Sir George Young]

Legal Aid

9.20 pm

The Solicitor-General (Sir Patrick Mayhew): I beg to move,

That the Legal Advice and Assistance (Prospective Cost) Regulations 1985 (S.I., 1985, No. 1840), dated 28th November 1985, a copy of which was laid before this House on 2nd December, be approved.

I understand that it will be for the convenience of the House if I deal at the same time with motion No. 5 on the Order Paper:

That an humble Address be presented to Her Majesty, praying that the Legal Advice and Assistance (Amendment) (No. 2) Regulations 1985 (S.I., 1985, No. 1879), dated 3rd December 1985, a copy of which was laid before this House on 5th December, be annulled.

The regulations are much more valuable than they are simple. To explain the affirmative resolution, I must say something about the other two associated sets of regulations. The subject of the affirmative resolution, the prospective cost regulations, alone does no more than establish an initial upper limit of £90 on the work a solicitor may undertake on his authority in some cases where people are arrested and held in custody. They must be taken together with the other two sets. The Legal Advice and Assistance (Amendment) (No. 2) Regulations 1985 make several important improvements for suspects in police stations. They make those improvements in the usual conditions for green form advice and assistance, and they provide most of the framework for the two-tier system that was announced last July. The process is completed by the Legal Advice at Police Stations (Remuneration) Regulations 1985, which also prescribe forms and rates of remuneration. Hardly less intregal is the Legal Aid (Duty Solicitor) Scheme 1985, in which the Law Society has made arrangements for a 24-hour duty solicitor scheme. All four documents form part of a complete system and are fully interdependent. They represent one of the most significant developments in legal services for years. For the first time, special arrangements will be made for legal advice at police stations.

The right to legal advice for suspects already exists in the judges rules, but they have not been fully satisfactory and will be withdrawn. The police have been under no obligation to inform suspects of their rights, and only the tiniest proportion of suspects seems to have known about them or chosen to exercise them. That is why the Philips Royal Commission recommended a clearer and safeguarded right. But it understood the possible resource implications of that and suggested that it should be confined to suspects who had been held for six hours or more.

When the Police and Criminal Evidence Act 1984 comes into force on 1 January next year, it will fundamentally change the present position. All those who were arrested will have a statutory right to advice. They must be informed of that right and how it might be exercised. They must sign their custody records to acknowledge that that has happened and to note their decision. Except in cases of urgency, the police may not interview further, once advice has been requested, until the client has seen a solicitor, if one is available.

The code of practice confers a right to advice for all those who are voluntarily helping the police. The code was approved by the House on 5 December. Both the commission's research and pilot studies conducted by the Law Society suggest that about 20 per cent. of suspects will now seek legal advice. What is more, the tighter timetables that the 1984 Act imposes on the police by virtue of section 40, review of custody, mean that many of these requests will arise out of normal working hours.

The Act therefore includes powers for the Law Society to make arrangements for a 24-hour duty solicitor scheme. That will operate through the committees which already run duty solicitor schemes in magistrates courts. When a suspect is told of his rights, he will be told how to get a solicitor. If he opts for the duty solicitor, the police will telephone the commercial regional telephone service which has details of the duty solicitors in the region. The service will be responsible for finding a duty solicitor for the area and contacting him with details of the request. That should ensure that duty solicitors get to the police station within the timetables. The solicitors and others who under the duty solicitor's directions will work under the scheme will be selected for relevant experience and general ability to advise at police stations. The framework for all that is contained in the society's scheme.

Three factors have weighed in the preparation of the scheme. First, only about a third of suspects, on the basis of the society's pilot schemes, will ask for a duty solicitor. The others will ask for their own, and we have sought to avoid limiting freedom of choice. Secondly, we have had to make a number of improvements in the legal advice and assistance scheme — the green form scheme — to take account of the special circumstances at police stations. Thirdly, there is the need to secure value for money. The Lord Chancellor has had to consider the availability of Government finance, and all the competing claims upon it, and to ensure that the funds which are available are used effectively and without waste.

May I first take the two-tier provisions. Under the standard green form provision, a solicitor may undertake work to the value of £50 on his own authority without obtaining the permission of the legal aid committee, but if it appears likely that more than £50 will be required he must obtain a prior extension from the Law Society before proceeding. The new regulations therefore provide a new upper limit of £90 when a solicitor is advising a suspect who has been arrested in connection with a serious offence —an "arrestable offence" in the language of section 24 of the 1984 Act. That means, putting it broadly, where a sentence of imprisonment of five years or more can be imposed.

In such a case, a solicitor may need to give prolonged advice. He may also need to be present for a substantial period. The upper limit can accordingly be extended retrospectively where urgency is required in the interests of justice. But the Lord Chancellor is firmly of the view that it would not be right to make this exceptional provision for every case. For offences other than section 24 offences—the lower tier cases—the standard green form cost limit of £50 will apply, and it may not be exceeded.

On the basis of the society's pilot schemes, this amount should, very broadly, allow a solicitor to visit the suspect in the police station and provide the average period of advice that is required in cases of all kinds where average travelling costs apply. Of course, in the case of either tier it may be possible for the solicitor to give advice over the telephone. There are a number of further improvements to the usual green form conditions——

Mr. Alex Carlile (Montgomery): The hon. and learned Gentleman has just mentioned the provision of advice over the telephone. One can envisage many cases in which advice might be given over the telephone by a solicitor to a client in a police station. However, will the hon. and learned Gentleman assure the House that facilities will be made available in police stations to enable suspects to talk in complete confidence, and without supervision by police officers, to their solicitors? If they cannot be provided with that facility, it is quite useless for them to talk to their solicitors over the telephone.

The Solicitor-General: I am sure that it is desirable that suspects should be able to talk in confidence to their legal adviser. I shall draw the hon. and learned Gentleman's point to the attention of my noble and learned Friend the Lord Chancellor.

There are a number of further improvements to the usual green form conditions, and they are important. The green form means test and the contribution provisions will not apply; applications by telephone will be permitted; the society's prior approval is normally required if an application is taken direct from a child, but that will not be necessary here; and a case can be handed from a duty to an own solicitor or vice versa. Those important improvements apply to cases in either tier and whether a duty solicitor or the suspect's solicitor is requested.

I will not go into many details of the remuneration arrangements for police station work, which are contained in the regulations, but it may be helpful if I comment on the basic structure. A duty solicitor will be given a standby payment of £60 for 24 hours, or pro rata. Any work that he may do in that period will be paid for at scale rates under the regulations, but, however much he does, he will never get less than half the standby pay in addition.

He will be paid at the rate of £27 an hour, for all work, except that out of normal office hours, and that will be enhanced in upper tier cases by one third to £36 an hour. A flat fee of £10 is introduced for advising over the telephone, together with a charge of £1 for routine telephone calls — for example, to the telephone service or to establish contact with the client. Where necessary, accommodation costs will be met.

The provisions for own solicitors are more similar to the existing general green form arrangements. They will be paid at the rate of £27 an hour for giving advice and £17 an hour for travelling and waiting. The same telephone fees will be available. Both kinds of solicitors will receive travelling expenses to and from their client.

The expression ABWOR — assistance by way of representation — applies to many of our constituency cases. Both duty and own solicitors will be involved in advising and representing suspects in connection with hearings before magistrates' courts for warrants of further detention. Again, these are important improvements on the standard conditions for assistance by way of representation.

Legal representation will always be necessary and the usual requirement for prior approval of the representation by the society will not apply. Nor will the means test requirement apply, nor the contribution liability. The usual remuneration for this work will be paid, except that duty solicitors who do it out of usual office hours will be paid rates enhanced by one third.

These arrangements are a systematic and workable fulfilment of the Government's undertaking to provide an effective right to legal advice, balanced against our need to bill the taxpayer only with what is necessary. But this is a new area and we must be ready to adjust the scheme if, in the light of experience, that seems necessary. The Lord Chancellor has undertaken to keep it under review. I believe that in no other country will such extensive rights for the individual be available, and I commend the regulations to the House.

Mr. Nicholas Brown (Newcastle upon Tyne, East): It is right that the House should debate the regulations and the Opposition prayer together. Indeed, it would have been difficult for us to have debated them separately because they inter-relate. The Solicitor-General helpfully took the House through that inter-relationship, and I shall not repeat much of what he said. I agreed with the emphasis that he placed on the importance of the new procedures that will be adopted at police stations.

Our objections are specific, and I would not like it to be thought that we objected to the 24-hour duty solicitor scheme as a whole. The regulations establish an initial limit of £90 on certain work which may be undertaken under the new 24-hour duty solicitor scheme, and separately there is established a limit of £50 on the amount of work that may be undertaken with volunteers, and by "volunteers" I mean people who are at police stations helping the police with their inquiries but who have not been arrested.

The 24-hour duty solicitor scheme had its origins in the Police and Criminal Evidence Act 1984. That Act took up some recommendations from the Philips commission. Whatever the Opposition's reservations to that Act, we strongly support the 24-hour duty solicitor scheme. Our prayer is directed solely at the capping of the amount of money which will be paid for certain categories of work. I appreciate that the Lord Chancellor has said that his mind is not closed on that issue. In that context I welcome the research that is to be undertaken by the Home Office into the functioning of the scheme and, in particular, into the different categories. The implication behind the Lord Chancellor's statement and the Home Office review is that the Government are willing to reconsider the issue on the basis of practical experience. I take comfort from what the Solicitor-General has said tonight on that.

As I said, our objections are solely to the establishment of ceilings on certain types of work. We are not objecting to the rates of payment and certainly not to the scheme itself. We have several specific anxieties. The first has already been touched on. The private telephone conversation with the solicitor which is envisaged in section 58 of the Act should be an administrative matter. The Solicitor-General said that he was sure that it is desirable. It is a bit more than desirable. I think that it is a legal right, although I am willing to be corrected if that is wrong.

I am sure that in a case such as drunken driving—an obvious and perhaps seasonal example—it is envisaged that advice will be given over the phone. I do not see why in the average drunken-driving case a solicitor should go to the police station. I am sure that a telephone call would be appropriate. But the right facilities should be provided for genuinely private conversations in police stations between the detained individual and his solicitor. I hope that the Solicitor-General can say something more than that it is desirable. The House is entitled to know what arrangements are being made to ensure that that will be the case. I have not seen the inside of many police stations, but I suspect that many do not have facilities for members of the public to make private telephone calls, yet that is something to which they are entitled.

However, the main thrust of our objective concerns the two-tier arrangement and the anomalies to which it gives rise. In particular, a real conflict must be posed for a solicitor who is advising a volunteer. What advice has the Solicitor-General for the solicitor who is with a client helping the police with their inquiries in a police station on a complex matter when the £50 limit on the work allowed by the scheme has been reached? There are only a limited number of options. The solicitor could encourage the police to arrest his client so that he could continue to be paid, but that does not seem desirable. In many cases it will almost certainly not be in the client's best interests, in the interests of justice or even, taking the Solicitor-General's point, in the Treasury's interest.

Alternatively, the Solicitor-General could advise the solicitor to say that the time is up, the money has run out and that if he is not going to be paid he will go home. What advice would the Solicitor-General then give to a solicitor who was charged with professional misconduct or even sued for negligence? I know that most solicitors would not take that attitude. They would stay and see their professional duties through. But there is clearly a conflict because nobody likes to do work for which he will not be remunerated.

If the solicitor did go, what would happen if the police then introduced new points? Would it be possible for the detained individual to make another telephone call and perhaps call the solicitor out again after he had just arrived home or perhaps call another solicitor out? Alternatively to those pretty objectionable possibilities, the Solicitor-General could advise a solicitor to work on for no pay on the swings and roundabouts principle. In other words, the cost of doing that work for nothing would have to be borne by the solicitor's other work. That does not seem to me to be a fair or acceptable alternative.

I have had put to me the case of a solicitor who spent six and a half days with a client of no personal wealth who was helping the police in a fraud case. The client was not arrested. It was obviously not in his interest that he be arrested, nor was it in the police interest. The police interest was to get to the bottom of the case. Yet the solicitor involved, under these rules, would be paid only £50.

In many cases what is proposed here is more restrictive than what happens now. I am thinking in particular of cities such as Birmingham where the local branch of the Law Society operates a much praised voluntary 24-hour scheme. It fears that this will be destroyed and be replaced by something less effective.

In addition, there must be a fear that the most vulnerable people in our society—the mentally retarded, those who do not speak English very well, and young persons — may not be effectively advised under the present scheme. The Confait case is one that is always quoted in this context. The point is that volunteers, who were completely confused, were misled into making false confessions. There is surely at least a case for taking volunteers in more serious cases out of the lower tier, and similarly to do the same for vulnerable categories of people such as the mentally deficient.

I do not always find myself in agreement with the Law Society in legal affairs debates, but I have never argued that it should not be consulted in matters of this kind. The Law Society has objected most strongly to me and to my hon. and learned Friend the Member for Aberavon (Mr. Morris) that the Lord Chancellor announced the two-tier basis of the arrangements in July 1985 without prior consultation with the Law Society. Given the emphasis that the Attorney-General put on consultation with the society during the course of the Adminstration of Justice Bill, I looked forward to hearing the Solicitor-General explain why the Law Society did not have to be consulted about these regulations.

There is widespread concern in the profession about the practical workings of the 24-hour scheme. In theory it is to be operative on 1 January 1986, but I have to put it to the Solicitor-General and to seek a specific assurance that the scheme will be operative in the north London area. The Home Secretary promised, on the Second Reading of the Police and Criminal Evidence Bill, that the Government were going to put public money where their mouth was. We are asking for neither the money nor the mouth, although the former Home Secretary often encouraged Opposition Members to do just that.

It is our contention that a modest reappraisal of the regulations would not only facilitate the better administration of justice but would specifically lead to a more effective use of resources, because the effective intervention of a solicitor at the early stage of an inquiry should assist in reducing the acquittal rate.

I conclude by quoting from the introduction to the guidelines for solicitors prepared by the Law Society's criminal law committee, entitled "Advising a suspect in the police station". In the section headed "Serving the public interest" it says:

"A solicitor's presence and advice will assist the truly innocent to give an account of their activities under suspicion and help to relieve them of pressures which can induce false confessions and cause miscarriages of justice. A solicitor will advise the guilty of the weight of evidence against them and, if they be truly guilty, of the substantial mitigation advantages of admitting guilt at the earliest opportunity, of assisting the recovery of stolen property, and of clearing up outstanding inquiries. The presence of a solicitor in the police station means that justice is better secured for the individual; it also leads to savings in police, court and judicial time so that quicker and more economical justice is secured for the community at large."

Mr. Alex Carlile (Montgomery): The introduction of a national duty solicitor scheme is very welcome. However, unfortunately it is under-funded. The Solicitor-General, quite apart from his physiological dissimilarity to Scrooge, has only just escaped summoning up the ghost of Christmas past by his undertaking that the scheme will be kept under constant review. I greatly welcome that observation, which he made a little earlier.

There are going to be clear anomalies because of the two-tier nature of the scheme. The fact that a person is helping with inquiries does not mean that he is not in serious trouble. People frequently help the police with their inquiries, as the quaint phrase goes, then find themselves being charged with murder, serious fraud, arson and so on.

In my view, it is clearly wrong that the solicitor who is asked to advise a person helping with inquiries under the duty solicitor scheme should be able to claim only at the lower rate. Even the higher rate is inadequate because it is intended to include the travelling time taken by solicitors who often live some distance from the police station.

One of the problems that police forces, particularly in the larger cities, have sometimes experienced is that when solicitors have been asked to come to the police station in the night it is in fact only the shabbier clerks of the dingier solicitors who have been prepared and detailed to do it. Welcome though the scheme is in general terms, I fear that the financial limits imposed will lead to the shabbiest clerks of the dingiest solicitors continuing to go out in some areas.

The scheme as funded will depend for its success not upon reasonable remuneration to the solicitors, because that is not available, but upon the good will of solicitors and the interest which solicitors around the country have already shown in duty solicitor schemes. We have already heard the voluntary scheme in Birmingham mentioned. There is a real fear that not only in Birmingham but in Portsmouth, Southampton and other less well known and smaller places existing voluntary schemes will be replaced by something worse as a result of these regulations.

In the Second Reading debate on the Police and Criminal Evidence Act 1984 the then Home Secretary said that arrangements were needed for solicitors to be available at all times when legal advice might be sought. That was welcome, but I fear that the Government have not completely fulfilled their promise to put public money where their mouth is. They have put some money in, but the mouth still has a substantial void.

I am particularly concerned about telephone advice. As I said earlier in an intervention, there will be many cases in which it would be unnecessary for a solicitor to turn out from his home in the middle of the night and attend a police station to give advice. However, if the telephone advice scheme is to be truly effective there must be an assurance that in all police stations facilities will be provided for private calls to be made by suspects to their solicitors.

Above all, the practice of eavesdropping on those calls must not be adopted. We know that in the past, sometimes legitimately, police officers have eavesdropped on cell conversations between prisoners. That has often provided proper and powerful evidence in the case against those prisoners when they go to trial. It is very much to be hoped that the police will be discouraged from eavesdropping on telephone calls because there is a danger that, even if the eavesdropping does not come out in court, conversations between suspects and their solicitors, which should have the stamp of confidence, would become a subterfuge for obtaining evidence about the matter under investigation.

The Solicitor-General: I am grateful to the hon. Member for Newcastle upon Tyne, East (Mr. Brown) and the hon. and learned Member for Montgomery (Mr. Carlile). They lost nothing in content or cogency by being succinct. The hon. Member for Newcastle upon Tyne, East began with a welcome for the scheme. I entirely understand the reasoning that lies behind the prayer. The Opposition welcome a duty solicitor scheme and their anxiety relates to the various matters that he mentioned.

[The Solicitor-General]

Privacy in a telephone conversation in which a solicitor is giving advice is desirable. I am reminded that section 58(1) of the Police and Criminal Evidence Act 1984 provides that a suspect arrested and held in custody

"shall be entitled, if he so requests, to consult a solicitor privately at any time."

It is therefore important that there should be no eavesdropping. That was mentioned by the hon. and learned Member for Montgomery. Anxiety about that matter should not appear to be dismissed. My noble and learned Friend the Lord Chancellor is aware of it. Solicitors are already advising clients satisfactorily over the telephone. Nothing will change with the regulations except the number of occasions upon which that will happen. The right to consult a solicitor privately is for the first time enshrined in a statute and eavesdropping would be a contravention of that right. I am pleased that the matter has been raised.

Vis-à-vis the two-tier system, the hon. Member for Newcastle upon Tyne, East asked what will happen when the £50 limit in lower tier cases is reached. A solicitor's duties have always been limited by the extent to which he is retained. There is no question of his being in breach of professional duty if he withdraws when the limit is reached. Naturally, a solicitor will wish to do his best. In a case such as that which has been described, a solicitor will know the time in which he has to seek his instructions and give his advice.

In the case of someone who has not been arrested and who is at the police station as a volunteer, the solicitor can always put the matter to the test by inviting his client to say that he wishes to leave the police station. That then puts the police to their election as to whether to arrest.

I was asked whether volunteers should be taken out of the lower tier. There are some misunderstandings about the position of a volunteer in those circumstances. He has not been arrested. Sometimes it is not clear whether the offence of which he is suspected falls within the upper or the lower tier. I do not believe that the advantage of the provisions under the regulations relating to someone arrested for an offence that comes within the upper tier are necessary in respect of a volunteer.

There is a clear distinction between a case which has progressed as far as an arrest and one which has not. There is no need for upper tier advice. It is often wholly unclear in such cases whether an offence is involved and, if so, what. The vital element which makes it clear which tier is involved is therefore missing.

The undertaking of my noble and learned Friend the Lord Chancellor to keep the working of the scheme under review is relevant to that point, and we shall see how it develops. No one is supposing that the present form shall, in every instance, be regarded as having been set in concrete, or anything like it.

As to the question of consultation, the scale of the problem was not known until we had had the research on the pilot schemes carried out by the Law Society over last winter in Birmingham and Kettering. That became available towards the end of the first quarter of this year. Although the Lord Chancellor announced the decision in July, we have been prepared to listen sympathetically to further proposals from the Law Society, and have been greatly helped by its suggestions.

I was asked to give an assurance that the scheme would be in operation in north London on 1 January. If the regulations are approved, the framework for the scheme will be completed. The telephone service will be ready and the Law Society has briefed the committees throughout England and Wales on the steps that they need to take. Now we must look to the profession itself — that is where success will lie—to use the framework provided.

I understand that the first signs are that the profession is showing itself willing to join the rotas. I very much hope that that will be the case. It would be a very great shame, especially in the light of the Lord Chancellor's assurance, if solicitors—especially with their honourable record in many voluntary schemes — were to hold back from joining in the rotas. I am confident that that will not happen.

The hon. and learned Gentleman said that the scheme was under-funded. That is all very well, but the original estimate was £6 million. That appears sadly to have been rather low. The Law Society now estimates the costs of the scheme to be £23 million in a year, which is by no means chicken feed. One could always say that we could spend more, and indeed we could. But we must ensure that the taxpayer is not given a bill for more than is necessary. We must see how we get on.

I do not believe that it will be the shabbiest clerks from the dingiest solicitors who take part in the scheme. That does not do justice to the way in which the profession deals with its responsibilities under the voluntary schemes. I do not believe that that is the way that it will happen under the present scheme.

I think that I have dealt with the question of confidentiality and with the other points raised during the debate.

This is really not a scheme and these are not regulations that put one in mind of "A Christmas Carol". I would refer to them as "Great Expectations".

PETITIONS

Sunday Trading

9.58 pm

Mr. David Amess (Basildon): I beg to ask leave to present a petition on behalf of my hon. Friend the Member for York (Mr. Gregory). My hon. Friend organised the petition together with ministers of all the York churches — Roman Catholic, Anglican and Non-Conformist. It has been supported by 3,263 of my hon. Friend's constituents, and gathered together over just three Sundays. After the Christmas recess, more petitions on behalf of my hon. Friend will be presented.

While accepting that there are certain restrictions regarding Sunday trading that should be clarified, the overwhelming view in York is that the essentials of life, such as urgent medical prescriptions and mobility through petrol sales, should continue, but that, basically, Sunday should be retained as a day of family life set apart from the rest of the week, and including worship. Together with my hon. Friend the Member for Welwyn Hatfield (Mr. Murphy), I support the sentiments of the petition.

The petition reads:

To the Honourable the Commons of the United Kingdom of Great Britain and Northern Ireland in Parliament assembled.

The humble petition of Mr. Conal Gregory MP and the citizens of York, sheweth that whilst acknowledging the need for the removal of the present anomalies in the Sunday Trading Laws, we urge that Sunday remain a day of worship, rest and relaxation for the benefit of family and community life.

Wherefore your Petitioners pray that your Honourable House reject the need for any other deregulation.

And your Petitioners as in duty bound will ever pray, etc.

To lie upon the Table.

Dog Fighting

10.2 pm

Mr. Conal Gregory (York): I have the honour to present to the House a petition on dog fighting. Dog fighting rightly raises real concern, and my petitioners seek to show that this cruel activity is inadequately discouraged under statute law. The petition was organised by Miss H. E. Redshaw of York and carries 47 names and is addressed to

The Honourable the Commons of the United Kingdom of Great Britain and Northern Ireland in Parliament assembled.

The humble petitioners sheweth:

(1) that under the protection of the Animals Act 1911, the penalties for causing or procuring animals to fight are not commensurate with the barbarity of such illegal cruelty.

(2) that there is no restriction on the importation, sale or advertising of dogs favoured by those involved in dog fighting.

Wherefore your Petitioners pray that your Honourable House will take all such measures as lie within their power specifically

(1) to substantially increase the penalties for those convicted of causing, procuring or assisting the fighting or baiting or any animal. (Protection of Animals Act 1911, section 1*(c)*.

(2) to introduce mandatory disqualifications of ownership and custody of any animal for those convicted of such offences.

(3) to ban the importation, sale and advertising of Pit Bull Terriers

(4) to prohibit the advertising of any Bull Dog's 'fighting qualities', 'gameness' or other descriptions which might attract dogfighting enthusiasts.

To lie upon the Table.

Greenbelt (Hertfordshire)

Motion made, and Question proposed, That this House do now adjourn.—[Mr. Maude.]

10.4 pm

Mr. Richard Page (Hertfordshire, South-West): I thank my hon. Friend the Under-Secretary of State for coming to answer an issue that has generated a great deal of enthusiasm, heat and anger in my constituency and in the other Hertfordshire constituencies. I would like my hon. Friend to imagine that I have beside me, as I know I have in spirit, all the other Hertfordshire Members. I am pleased to see a more physical manifestation in the shape of my hon. Friend the Member for Welwyn Hatfield (Mr. Murphy).

The subject of the debate is of concern not only to hon. Members for Hertfordshire, as other hon. Members have approached me and offered their support. Councils from outside Hertfordshire have written to ask me to support their interests over the green belt.

I do not intend to deal with the history and justifications behind the creation of the green belt. Regular consultations take place as part of that process, and in January 1985, the Hertfordshire structure plan review consultation document was published. The document was generally well received. There was strong opposition from the housing and construction industry, which believed that the review of the county structure plan needed to make provision for at least a further 12,500 to 22,000 units.

For this and a variety of other reasons, it was felt that further consultation should take place, and that took place in April of this year, on the new development options. It concerned incremental and major growth, all of which involved taking considerable acres from the green belt for housing development. The people of Hertfordshire were asked for their views on the building of about 72,500 homes in the county before 1996, an increase of 20,000 on the figure that was put forward earlier in the year. There has been a high level of response to those consultations and to date replies have been received from 336 groups and 1,072 individuals. All but about 50 have been against the proposal. Of the 50 who have written in in support, most have expressed qualified support.

In addition, the individual Hertfordshire Members have received representations directly themselves. I have been inundated by concerns and queries from my constituents, especially from those living in the village of Bovingdon, which is in the heart of my constituency. I understand from the consultation document that there is the possibility of about 700 homes being constructed there. If the proposal were implemented, it would destroy the environment and the character of the village. In the end, I had to beg my constituents to stop writing to me on the issue, especially from Bovingdon. I contacted the parish council and asked it to tell everybody that I had the message and that I would be supporting what they were saying, which was that 700 homes should not come into the area.

In addition, I consulted the two district councils, the borough of Dacorum, and Three Rivers district council. The Dacorum council resolved that it was not satisfied that the levels of dwelling provision contained in the new issue consultation document had been adequately justified and requested

"the county council to make a thorough examination of the Department of the Environment and the SERplan household forecasts, taking into account the importance of maintaining inner city policies.

That it would be opposed to further development in the green belt as currently defined and would seek to maintain a policy of containing developments within urban areas.

Finally, to inform the county council that the location of any further development should be established by the borough council through the local planning process."

That was a clear-cut and unequivocal reply to the new consultation document.

Three Rivers district council was concerned to resist the efforts to nibble at the green belt and was worried about pressures that might flow from circular 14/85, headed "The Green Belt", and circular 15/84, headed "Land for Housing". There are obvious conflicts in the advice that is given in the two circulars. Three Rivers council is concerned especially about paragraph 4 of circular 14/85. I shall not go into the paragraph in detail, but it seems to avoid the realities. It points the way to the development of the white line, which in turn will bring it hard up against the urban edge, which in turn will produce greater pressures to re-draw the green belt. The routeing of the M25 through my constituency will inevitably create the temptation to make it the natural limit of permissible development. That is of concern.

I hope that the House will excuse the pun, but I do not believe that the green belt should be set in concrete for ever. There must be a little flexibility. Allowance should be made for building lines to be straightened and for sensible and regional density infillings, but not to the level suggested. It is possible that 2,000 of the 20,000 homes for Hertfordshire will be located in Dacorum. People chose to live in south-west Hertfordshire because of the environment. Many people say that more development should be permitted to allow local people the chance of getting a home. Unless there was a vast increase in planning permission, the cost of land would not decrease substantially to allow that wish to be fulfilled. I do not believe that I have been elected by my constituents to see my constituency covered in tarmac and concrete.

I do not blame those in the housing and construction industry for seeking permission to build more houses. They have a business to run. Of course it is easier to build on a greenfield site. In the past few months, we have heard much about the state of our inner cities. We have had the panoply of the Church of England putting pressure on us to do something about the inner cities. In anything to do with development, it must be the duty of authorities to restore, renovate and rebuild the inner cities rather than develop the greenfield sites. I point as a hopeful sign to the redevelopments on the docklands. We can build on that example.

I return to the question of flexibility and the idea that there can be some tolerance around the edge of the green belt. I have a suggestion. I know that it is not new and I put it forward without having consulted either of my two local councils, so I might be out of order with them. I suggest that there could be merit in considering the idea that, while housing development should be concentrated in the towns, the rate of housing development in rural areas should not be allowed to exceed the rate of 0·5 per cent. per annum of existing housing stock. This could be administered through and by local district councils. I know that this was not approved in 1979 by the Secretary of State because of representations by district councils on that structure plan, but I believe that it would give flexibility to local councils and might merit reconsideration.

I understand that the results of this consultation process will be considered on 13 January by the county planning committee, which will look at a draft structure plan to put to the Secretary of State. I sincerely hope that the county will firmly reject the idea of adding another 20,000 homes to the original January 1985 plan.

I should like my hon. Friend the Under-Secretary of State to confirm the Government's support for the green belt, to enable me to reassure my constituents. I should like him also to reassure my constituents in Bovington that they will not see 700 houses springing up beside their homes. I should like to take back some reassurance to my two local councils, so that they know that the Government are firmly behind them when planning matters are considered and large inroads into the green belt are proposed.

The Parliamentary Under-Secretary of State for the Environment (Mr. Richard Tracey): May I first congratulate my hon. Friend the Member for Hertfordshire, South-West (Mr. Page) on tabling this motion on the Adjournment debate. I also welcome the attendance of my hon. Friend the Member for Welwyn Hatfield (Mr. Murphy). There has been a good deal of concern about pressures for development and the future of the green belt in south-west Hertfordshire and, indeed, in other areas. I welcome the opporutnity to set out the Government's position. As a Member of Parliament with some green belt in my constituency in Chessington, Surrey, I am pleased to be able to speak in the debate.

Green belt policy in England has been one of the most successful planning initiatives since the war. Unlike some other planning ideas, it has not been affected by changes of fashion which might have sought to re-interpret its objectives and the means of achieving them. Successive Governments have continued the original policies in essentially the same form.

The policy on green belts was first set out in a circular in 1955, and it remains the same today. The importance which the Government attach to green belt has been confirmed in several recent circulars. The essential characteristic of green belts is their permanence. The Government's policies are aimed at defining detailed long-term boundaries so that they can be fully protected from unsuitable development.

This Government have a particularly good record in moving towards this objective. An area of 4·5 million acres, which is roughly the size of Wales, now lies within the green belts around London and our other big cities. In 1979, when we came to power, the green belt picture was patchy, to say the least. It depended upon the application of a hotch potch of old development plans. Under half of it had been fully approved. Since then, in just six years — and it is a shame that there are no Opposition Members present to hear this—all the rest of the green belt land has been formally approved by this Government.

The green belt around London now extends to 1·2 million acres, an area greater than the whole of Hampshire. There is a green belt around Nottingham and Derby of over 200,000 acres. An extension around Sheffield and other south Yorkshire towns has added 800,000 acres. The west Midlands green belt now covers 650,000 acres and the Tyne and Wear green belt has been more than doubled to 200,000 acres. All this represents significant progress, for which the local authorities concerned can share the credit.

Within green belts, as elsewhere, each planning application has to be decided on its merits, but there is a general presumption against inappropriate development. My hon. Friend illustrated that well in his speech. Inside a green belt approval should not be given, except in very special cirumstances, for the construction of new buildings or for the change of use of existing buildings other than for a very limited range of purposes. We would all accept that clearly some development does take place in green belts. They are not intended to be museums, so for example development for agricultural or recreational purposes may be appropriate and, as my hon. Friend pointed out, in towns and villages within green belts some strictly limited infilling or rounding off may be acceptable.

The Government's concern to protect green belt land is part of a wider policy of protecting and enhancing the environment, including national parks, areas of outstanding natural beauty and conservation areas. But we must also ensure that there is an adequate supply of land for new development, for industry, for housing and for other needs. Our future prosperity and quality of life depends as much on sustaining a strong economy as it does on protecting our heritage. These objectives are not incompatible, but they do require careful planning and sensible development control.

With this in mind, the Department's circular on green belts issued in July last year reaffirmed our commitment to the long-term protection of green belts and gave advice to local planning authorities on defining green belt boundaries. We want to ensure that detailed boundaries are clearly defined, so that people can see exactly what areas are included in the green belt. Once those boundaries have been defined, we are anxious that they should be altered only in exceptional circumstances.

The Government's aim is to ensure that as much new development as possible takes place within existing urban areas. I give this assurance to my hon. Friends. We have, for example, asked local authorities to ensure that full and effective use is made of land within urban areas for housing. In some cases, good housing can be provided by converting or improving existing buildings without the need for any new land. There is also scope for building on neglected, unused or derelict land. We have also reminded local authorities that full use should be made of potential sites and existing premises in urban areas for industry. This emphasis on the full use of urban land can help to promote economic and social regeneration in older urban areas. It can also assist the preservation of agricultural land and conservation of the countryside and maximise the use of existing infrastructure.

We should not be too pessimistic about the scope for meeting present housebuilding requirements from land in built-up areas. Preliminary analysis of recent data from the ordnance survey suggests that nearly half the land being used for housebuilding is coming from previously developed land, including land already in residential use, or from other vacant land in built-up areas.

My hon. Friend suggested that housebuilders should have their attention directed to the city centres. He will be pleased to hear that only last week my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State encouraged housebuilders to concentrate more on the development of small infill sites which were popular with clients and were more acceptable to those already living in the area. He welcomed the House Builders Federation's announcement of an impartial investigation, to identify ways of overcoming the obstacles to housebuilding in the cities.

The Government have developed a range of policies to encourage development in urban areas. Since 1979, some £1,900 million has been channelled through the urban programme into thousands of projects intended to encourage enterprise, improve the environment and pilot new ways of tapping voluntary effort and meeting the needs of ethnic minority communities. More than £300 million in new private sector investment has been attracted into the inner cities through urban development grant. We have introduced land registers to identify areas of land in public ownership that could be put to better use.

Earlier this year, city action teams were introduced in the major inner city conurbations to pull together Government programmes, which are aimed at stimulating local economies. They look after programmes worth £270 million a year. Some 25 enterprise zones are now operating in the United Kingdom. They have created and safeguarded thousands of jobs, largely by easing restriction on business development.

Our derelict land programme is particularly important. The use of derelict land grant to create development sites out of run-down urban land helps to stimulate economic activity and to ease the pressure to find building land in the green belt. The Government have greatly increased the resources available for reclamation through derelict land grant. In 1979-80 this stood at £23 million. This year it was initially £76 million. We have just increased it to £82 million.

We have also changed the way in which this money is spent. The main priority for derelict land grant is to improve our towns and cities, by opening up new areas of attractive. Clean modern development, making them better places in which to live and work, and more attractive to private investment and private housing. This is how to create jobs and prosperity. We have increased more than tenfold the amount of grant going to inner cities and have encouraged the reclamation of land for housing, commerce and industry. Six years ago only 6 per cent. of this reclaimed land was used for housing or commerce. Now it is 60 per cent.

My hon. Friend is concerned that large-scale significant housing development may be permitted in the green belt in south-west Hertfordshire. I understand his concern. He has in mind proposals for additional housing provision included in a consultation document issued in the autumn as part of Hertfordshire county council's draft structure plan review. This is a purely consultative document produced by the county council. It has made it clear that it is in no way committed either to the principle of accommodating more housing growth in Hertfordshire, or to any of the individual proposals in the document.

When Hertfordshire county council has considered all the responses to its consultation, it will be for the council to decide what to include in the final proposals that it intends to submit to my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State for his approval early next year. When its proposals are submitted, there will be an opportunity for objections to be made to the Secretary of State. Before reaching his decision on the proposals, the Secretary of State will take into account all the representations received, and may decide to hold an examination in public. I can assure the House and my hon. Friend that all representations received will be carefully considered before any decision is reached on the review.

My hon. Friend referred in his excellent speech to proposals for development at Bovingdon. I assume that the proposal to which he refers is one on which the public have recently been consulted as part of the structure plan review. I do not know whether this proposal will form part of the county council's final proposals to the Secretary of State. If it does, it will of course be carefully considered by my right hon. Friend. At the time proposals are submitted to the Secretary of State my hon. Friend will have an opportunity to make representations to my right hon. Friend about the county council's proposed alterations to the structure plan.

My hon. Friend has criticised those who say that, if there were more residential developments house prices would fall and, consequently, local people would be able to afford them and to remain in the area. This is a difficult issue. House prices are determined by a number of factors of which land availability is only one. I have no reason to believe that an increase in housebuilding in Hertfordshire would necessarily lead to a fall in house prices. If prices were to fall in any area, there could be no guarantee that the houses would be bought by local people.

I was interested to hear my hon. Friend's suggestion that local authorities should be given a tolerance—I believe that was how he described it—which would allow them to develop 0·5 per cent. of the green belt each year if they wished. Our present policy on the control of development in the green belt allows local authorities the proper flexibility, which is preferable to the application of more rigid rules.

As I said at the beginning of my speech, I am grateful for this opportunity to spell out in some detail the Government's commitment to the green belt. As I said, I have some green belt land in my constituency. I hope that I have reassured my hon. Friend on the matter before he starts his Christmas recess.

Question put and agreed to.

House of Commons

Friday 20 December 1985

The House met at half-past Nine o'clock

PRAYERS

[MR. SPEAKER in the Chair]

PETITIONS

Chief Inspector Brian Woollard

9.35 am

Mr. Austin Mitchell (Great Grimsby): I wish to present a petition

To the Honourable the Commons in Great Britain and Northern Ireland in Parliament assembled. The Humble Petition of Chief Inspector Brian Woollard of the Metropolitan Police.

Sheweth

That as a Detective Chief Inspector in the Metropolitan Police Public Sector Corruption Squad of the Company Fraud Department, I was engaged in investigations into, inter alia, corruption in the Permanent Miscellaneous Street Properties (P.M.S.P.) contracts for the renovation and decoration of street properties of the London Borough of Islington. When these inquiries began to indicate a connection between corruption and Freemasonry, I was removed from the inquiry, then from the Company Fraud Department and the Criminal Investigation Department, by officers who were themselves Freemasons. As a result of my transfer to the Uniformed Branch in April, 1982 my career has been effectively shelved. All attempts to complain about this treatment, to secure the renewal of the inquiry by an investigation entirely independent of the Metropolitan Police, or to rectify the injustice to myself and my own career prospects within the Police Service, whether made to the Commissioner of Police, Home Secretary, the Parliamentary Commissioner for Administration and Prime Minister, have merely been referred back to the officers against whom the complaint was made in the first place. There is no provision for any genuinely independent review of complaints from within the Police Service and no independent inquiry free of Freemasonry associations . . . has been proposed—

Mr. Speaker: Order. I am sorry to interrupt the hon. Gentleman, but he should summarise the petition and the material allegations in it.

Mr. Mitchell: I come to the burden of the petition:

All other means of redress have been exhausted since February 1982 to the present date and my only hope for protection and redress, therefore, lies with Parliament itself.

Wherefore your petitioner prays that your Honourable House will institute an independent inquiry into his case, his treatment by the Metropolitan Police and the frustration of his inquiries and career by the influence of Freemasonry and make provision for the introduction of an independent complaints procedure for internal complaints within the Police Services for England and Wales, so that complaints by serving members and those conceived to have been constructively dismissed, shall not be frustrated by the senior officers against whom complaint is made.

The petition is signed by Brian Woollard.

When all else fails, it is the responsibility of Parliament to provide justice. Chief Inspector Brian Woollard has waged a gallant campaign to secure it and I hope that the House will provide it.

To lie upon the Table.

Social Security Reform

9.38 am

Mr. Alfred Dubs (Battersea): I wish to present a petition on behalf of 2,000 or more residents of my constituency and others who live or work in the London borough of Wandsworth. The petition has my full support and that of my hon. Friend the Member for Tooting (Mr. Cox), but, alas, it does not have the support of the hon. Member for Putney (Mr. Mellor). The petition says:

We believe that the measures proposed in the green paper "Reform of Social Security" are an affront to the principle established by Beveridge, of the prevention of poverty by paying benefit as of right without a means test.

We protest that the abolition of payments for special needs; including heating additions for the elderly, disabled, sick and young will force poor families further into poverty.

We deplore the proposed cuts in housing benefit, the abolition of the State Earnings Related Pension Scheme and the withdrawal of maternity grant, death grant and widows allowances.

We call on the Government to withdraw these proposals and introduce new plans to develop the social security system for the benefit of all by redistributing wealth away from the rich.

To lie upon the Table.

Consumer Protection

Motion made, and Question proposed, That this House do now adjourn—[Mr. Sainsbury.]

9.39 am

Mr. Greville Janner (Leicester, West): I am grateful for this opportunity to debate the operation of consumer protection legislation regarding insurance contracts and so to draw the House's attention to the state of the law and to how it is working to remove rights from people who take out insurance just when their need for cover is greatest.

I shall discuss the operation of the law in general and then speak of the case of Mr. Tony O'Shea, the young disabled man from Birmingham whose life has been wrecked by Lloyd's, and who is a constituent of the hon. Member for Cannock and Burntwood (Mr. Howarth). This is not a party political matter but one of humanity, justice and decency. The hon. Member for Cannock and Burntwood and I have worked together on this case. The hon. Gentleman is in the Chamber and I hope that he will catch the eye of the Chair.

The law states that every contract may contain exclusion clauses but, thanks to the Supply of Goods (Implied Terms) Act 1973 and the Unfair Contract Terms Act 1977, exclusions that are unreasonable are generally void. The 1973 Act deals with the sale of goods and the 1977 Act covers the supply of services, not least insurance. Thanks to the strength of the insurance lobby, however, insurance contracts are excluded from the purview of the Act, so exclusion clauses in insurance contracts remain as binding and effective as they ever were, however unreasonable, unjust, unfair and unconscionable they may be.

There is an ancient rule that, in insurance contracts as opposed to all others, the person who wants the insurance has a duty to inform the insurers of any facts that they may find material when deciding whether to grant insurance and, if so, on what terms. Thanks to the so-called "doctrine of material non-disclosure", if a person does not disclose what the insurers regard as a material fact, then when a claim is made the insurers can say, "You did not tell us." It is no answer for the insured to say, "I paid my money. You never asked me. There was no question about it." He can be ruined as a result of not answering a question that he was not asked.

That wicked rule, that evil doctrine, has been denounced by a series of commissions, but it remains in force. Reputable, decent and honourable insurers do not in general rely on their rights in exclusion clauses, and still less on the archaic and wicked doctrine of material non-disclosure. I regret to inform the House that Lloyd's, that famous and once so honoured name, has seen fit to rely on such a clause, as I shall detail.

Exclusion clauses in insurance contracts remain valid and effective. It is the Government's duty, and especially that of the Minister for Consumer Affairs, to warn the public of these dangers. When entering an insurance contract, the public should be aware that every clause in it will be effective, irrespective of whether it is fair, reasonable or just. It is irrelevant that the clause might be totally incomprehensible. The fact that it is not possible to get insurance on any other terms is also irrelevant.

If one of my constituents goes on holiday over Christmas and takes out travel insurance, as like as not the travel agent will take out the policy and the insured will not see the form. If there is a claim and the insured has not revealed previous travel claims, however long ago and even though he has not been asked, the insurers are technically entitled to repudiate liability. Of course, decent insurers would generally not do that, but I regret to tell the House that I have had to take up a series of such cases on behalf of constituents.

People have been literally on the verge of destruction as a result of insurers relying on this doctrine, which should have been repealed long ago—the doctrine that an insurer, but nobody else, can rely on an exclusion clause. The insured person is meant to inform the insurer of any material fact, or any fact which the insurer might regard as relevant. In practice, the doctrine is entirely on the side of the provider of insurance. I am surprised that successive Governments have allowed that doctrine to remain effective.

The need for the Government to warn people is made plain by the tragic case of Mr. Tony O'Shea, aged 34, and a sufferer from spina bifida, who built up a small business as a craftsman making jewellery in Birmingham. He had only one blemish on his character—many years ago he was charged with receiving a stolen camera. He was convicted, having pleaded not guilty, and he maintains to this day that he was innocent. In any event, he was not asked about that when he obtained insurance from Lloyd's.

I have a copy of the proposal form with me. There is no question asking, "Have you any previous convictions?" I believe that Mr. O'Shea did not fill in the form but that it was completed by brokers and signed by him. There is one wrap-up sentence which runs:

> "Are there any other circumstances within your knowledge or opinion not already disclosed, affecting or likely to affect the proposed insurance?"

The answer is "No," because Mr. O'Shea thought that the question was irrelevant—a belief with which I agree.

Disaster struck. Mr. O'Shea's workshop was opened and cleared out. Some £40,000 of stock was stolen. Not surprisingly, he asked the insurers to pay. I suspect that the House will be disgusted to learn that, relying on the doctrine of material non-disclosure, Lloyd's of Lime street, London EC3M 7HL — that once so honoured name in the insurance world — saw fit to repudiate liability. That act was brought to the attention of the hon. Member for Cannock and Burntwood. I learned of it through the BBC programme "Watchdog" and its Mr. Allan Sharpe, to who I pay tribute. He published the facts, and Lloyd's have seen fit to report him to some BBC committee for so doing. I applaud and salute the programme for bringing these facts to my attention and to that of the public.

I took the normal step in the circumstances and spoke to the top person in the insurance organisation. Almost always, the chairman or managing director says, when such facts are brought to his attention, "OK, we made a mistake. I am sorry. Let's put it right. Legally we may not have to, but morally we do. We will pay ex gratia." In this case, the insurers offered the derisory sum of £10,000—less than 25 per cent. of the actual loss—and said, "Go away." I spoke to the chairman and to the deputy chairman of Lloyd's—Mr. Coleridge. At first, he did not know much about it, but he looked into the matter and said that it was a matter not for him but for the chairman, who was away.

I then spoke to the chairman, Mr. Peter Miller, whose name is not now unknown to the House. This morning's debate is not concerned with those major scandals that have been raised in the House in recent weeks, but this individual disaster is just as important and far more poignant that the alleged major frauds. As ancient wisdom has it, "When you save one life, you save the world." Certainly, when you wreck one life, you destroy one world. The person doing so should be held up to hatred, ridicule and contempt. That this hateful, ridiculous and contemptible doctrine has been used by Lloyd's to destroy the life of Tony O'Shea is a nastiness that is not the result of mere bureaucratic bungling, but a carefully contrived, designed and deliberate act of destruction of which Lloyd's and all those connected with it should be deeply ashamed. I hope that, as a result of the debate, Lloyd's may yet change its mind and restore life and hope to Mr. O'Shea.

I have a letter from Mr. Peter Miller, the chairman of Lloyd's, saying that he has now discussed the matter with the junior deputy chairman. Mr. Miller said:

"Lloyd's has a jealously guarded reputation for its determination and willingness to pay legitimate claims."

When I spoke to Mr. Miller, I asked whether he was suggesting that dishonesty was involved in Mr. O'Shea's claim. I am pleased to inform the House that the police are quite satisfied that the robbery that deprived Mr. O'Shea of everything was genuine and that there was no dishonesty by Mr. O'Shea. Lloyd's is not alleging that there was any dishonesty on his part. I told Mr. Miller that if it were alleged, he should say so, and give Mr. O'Shea the opportunity to clear his name and to sue Lloyd's. If Lloyd's does not allege dishonesty, it must pay the claim. Lloyd's may be in the right legally, but morally it is wrong.

Lloyd's is saying that, although it is not alleging dishonesty, it is refusing to pay the claim by relying upon the antique, wicked, evil and ancient doctrine of material non-disclosure. Lloyd's deserves the evil publicity that I hope it will receive for the disgraceful way that it has handled Mr. O'Shea's claim.

In his letter, Mr. Miller attempts to justify non-payment on the ground of material non-disclosure. He refers to the "Watchdog" programme and complains that "Watchdog" did not put Lloyd's side of the case. I do not believe that there is another side to the case. It is simply a matter of Lloyd's saying, "This is a jeweller's claim. This man has a criminal conviction from years and years ago, and although it is nothing whatever to do with this claim, which is an honest and proper claim brought by a disabled young man who has built up his business, we will not pay it."

The underwriters, without in any way admitting liability, made an inadequate offer, and Mr. Miller says that it is a matter for them. If it is, I call from this House on all underwriters in Lloyd's to try to wipe out that blot on the good name of their institution by demanding that the chairman should either change his decision or resign, together with the senior deputy, the junior deputy or any other responsible officer who has been party to this terrible decision.

The chairman said in his letter:

"it is apparent from a review of the matter that underwriters have behaved both properly and reasonably."

Properly in law—probably yes; properly in morality—no; reasonably and fairly—certainly not. He said:

"I do not feel it appropriate to intervene in this matter."

I suggest that it is now for the Government to intervene, that it is for the Minister to intervene, that it is for the underwriters to intervene, that it is for the public to intervene and that this is a scandal of proportions as great as those of the major frauds now being alleged in this House. The fact that it strikes down only one individual in no way reduces the scope of the wickedness involved.

The law stands. I undertake to seek to introduce a Bill to change that law. It may be a long campaign, but I shall introduce that Bill this Session. We cannot call for a change in the law while taking part in an Adjournment debate, but we are entitled to say, "This law is bad, this is what it does, this is how it has destroyed a life, this is how we can ruin the lives and the Christmases of countless honest decent assured people." We call on the Government at least to join in denouncing the way in which Lloyd's has used the law in the case of Mr. Tony O'Shea.

Mr. Gerald Howarth (Cannock and Burntwood): I congratulate the hon. and learned Member for Leicester, West (Mr. Janner) on so ably securing this debate today, and also on his persistence in a matter that I know is close to his heart. I know that he has shown great tenacity when developing his argument over the years.

My constituent, Tony O'Shea, will be grateful not only for the hon. and learned Gentleman having spent so much time this morning alerting the public and the House to the circumstances surrounding his case, but also for the way in which the hon. and learned Gentleman has sought to help him.

The key to the case is the 1979 conviction, when Mr. O'Shea was found guilty of handling stolen goods. That sounds a very serious crime, but we should consider what lies behind it. The fact is that a good customer of Mr. O'Shea's came into his shop and said, "Things are a bit hard at the moment and I am trying to raise a bit of dough. I have a camera, which is not very expensive, which you might like to buy." Mr. O'Shea bought the camera for £70 for his own use, and not to sell to anyone else. He was not trying to make a quick profit. He purchased that camera to replace his own Instamatic. He later discovered that he could have purchased the same second-hand camera for £45.

It is upon that conviction that the whole case hangs. It does not hang upon the events surrounding the robbery on the night of 8 March 1984, when £41,000 worth of stock was stolen. Robbers entered Mr. O'Shea's home and, knowing him to be disabled and therefore unable to defend himself, took his keys from him at knifepoint. Who is to blame him for surrendering the keys? I suspect that many able-bodied Members would have done the same, let alone were they afflicted with Mr. O'Shea's disability.

Yet it is not because of the events surrounding that crime that Lloyd's underwriters are refusing to pay the claim. I emphasise that no charges have been preferred against Mr. O'Shea arising out of the robbery on 8 March. Indeed, the police officer investigating the case has absolved him of any complicity. We therefore return to that conviction in 1979.

When Mr. O'Shea signed the proposal form prepared for him by an apparently competent broker, there was no question on the form asking him whether he had any previous convictions. Instead, Lloyd's underwriters have relied upon the catch-all clause

[Mr. Gerald Howarth]

"Are there any other circumstances within your knowledge or opinion"—

this is important—

"not already discussed affecting or likely to affect the proposed insurance?"

Mr. O'Shea answered the question—in his opinion, the answer was no. He did not appeal against the conviction because of the costs involved. Anyone involved in litigation knows that there comes a time when one has to consider whether it is better to cut one's losses, and Mr. O'Shea decided to cut his losses and not engage in the expensive business of going to appeal. He said that in his opinion he had denied the accusation, as he denies it to this day, and that it had involved a camera for which he paid £70.

Perhaps Mr. O'Shea was naive and should have realised that that was, in the eyes of the insurer, a material fact. Naive or not, that should not absolve Lloyd's from its responsibilities in this matter. This case reflects no credit on the insurance industry generally. I believe that at the base of it lies the doubt of the underwriters of Mr. O'Shea's innocence and that they are falling back on this catch-all clause to wriggle out of their obligations.

My advice to the underwriters is to put up their evidence or pay up to Mr. O'Shea now, and, to avoid this situation recurring, to ensure that proposal forms include the specific question, "Have you any previous convictions? If so, give details." That is the very least that should be done.

I pay tribute to Mr. O'Shea who, throughout this terrible personal ordeal, has shown great fortitude and a sense of reasonableness. He has not been totally consumed by it and has maintained at all times a balanced and reasonable approach. I hope that, as a result of this debate, a remedy will be found for him.

10.2 am

The Parliamentary Under-Secretary of State for Trade and Industry (Mr. Michael Howard): I congratulate the hon. and learned Member for Leicester, West (Mr. Janner) on raising an important general matter and on relating it to the way in which one individual has been affected; and my hon. Friend the Member for Cannock and Burntwood (Mr. Howarth), who has associated himself with the case.

I begin by dealing with the general points to which the subject gives rise, and I shall comment later on the case to which reference has been made. On the generality of the matter in relation to insurance contracts, there is a good deal of common ground between the hon. and learned Gentleman, who has taken a close interest in this subject for a long time, and the Government. We would not dispute that steps need to be taken so that the balance of interest between the insurer and the consumer provided by the common law of insurance contract is altered, although there may be something between us as to the best remedy to be adopted in pursuit of that objective.

In October 1980, the Law Commission published a report on insurance contract law. That report identified two main areas where, in the opinion of the commission, the law discriminated unfairly against the consumer. First, there was the common law duty of disclosure, to which the hon. and learned Gentleman referred. Under the present law, the insured is obliged to disclose all facts which a prudent insurer would regard as material, regardless not only of whether he was asked about a particular fact, but of whether he was acting in perfectly good faith in failing to realise its importance.

The second matter identified by the Law Commission was the question of warranty, to which the hon. and learned Gentleman did not refer and to which I shall not refer today.

The Government considered the recommendations of the Law Commission and accepted them. In 1983, the Government announced their intention to introduce legislation to implement them, with the important qualification that the reform of the law should apply to consumer contracts only. That was because there is not the same need for consumer protection in relation to business contracts, where the proposer can be expected to have a knowledge of the law and of his obligations under it, while extension to business contracts of a less strict duty of disclosure could seriously weaken the industry's international competitiveness.

The difficulty which the Government have encountered in endeavouring to deal with the problem by legislation is that a satisfactory definition of what constitutes a consumer as opposed to a business contract has proved singularly elusive. Indeed, a satisfactory definition of a revised duty of disclosure has given rise to similar difficulties.

Those were both areas in which it was important to have legal certainty if the revised law were not to create as many problems as the existing law, and it became clear as the Government considered the matter that such certainty would be extremely difficult to achieve. For that reason my predecessor announced in December of last year that he was embarking on discussions with the insurance industry to see whether changes to its statements of insurance practice might serve as an acceptable substitute for legislation.

Those discussions are well advanced and the Government are considering, in the light of the views that have been put to us by all the parties concerned, whether it is possible to achieve a satisfactory solution of the problem by revised statements of practice as a satisfactory substitute for legislation. If we were to follow that route, the situation would have to be kept carefully under review and the legislation would need to be reconsidered if that solution was found not to be working properly, and I hope to make a statement on that aspect of the matter shortly.

The other general point raised by the hon. and learned Member for Leicester, West related to exclusion clauses and to the fact that insurance contracts were excepted from some of the legislation dealing with exclusion clauses, including the two statutes to which he referred, the most recent of which was the Unfair Contract Terms Act 1977.

Those statutes pose specific and particular difficulties for insurance contracts, which must, by their nature, contain some exclusion clauses, and certainty of interpretation is essential to efficient insurance underwriting. If insurance contracts had been made subject to those statutes, that certainty would have been fundamentally undermined. The consequence of introducing such fundamental uncertainty into insurance contracts would have been an inevitable increase in premiums to all policy holders, as it would follow that there would have been a substantial increase in the number of potential and unforeseen claims which insurers might have been obliged to meet.

Thus, there are specific difficulties which those statutes would pose for insurance contracts. The Government have carefully considered whether those difficulties could be met and have reached the conclusion that it would not be right in all the circumstances to make insurance contracts subject to those laws.

Those are my observations on the generality of the points raised by the hon. and learned Gentleman. I come now to the case which he and my hon. Friend the Member for Cannock and Burntwood mentioned, that involving Mr. O'Shea. I say at once that, from the facts that have been disclosed to the House by hon. Members, it is difficult not to approach the case with a good deal of sympathy for the personal circumstances of Mr. O'Shea. I appreciate the reasons which have led the hon. and learned Gentleman and my hon. Friend to take up the matter, I understand the difficulties under which Mr. O'Shea labours and I understand and share the natural sympathy which they have expresssed for the predicament in which Mr. O'Shea finds himself.

Having said that, it is necessary to give careful consideration to the circumstances of the case, to the non-disclosure which occurred in that case and to consider to what extent, if at all, the facts of the case would have been affected by the recommendation of the Law Commission.

Before discussing the detailed circumstances of the case, I wish to place on record, lest it be thought that I had any kind of interest in the matter, that, although I was a member of Lloyd's, I ceased all underwriting in all the syndicates in which I had previously participated in Lloyd's when I assumed ministerial office in September of this year, fully in accordance with the Government's guidelines for the conduct of Ministers.

Mr. Janner: Does the Minister not consider that in the interest of manifest integrity, and to distance himself and presumably the Government from Lloyd's in the present and other unsavoury circumstances, he should relinquish his membership of that body so that it is abundantly clear that he has no interest in it or any part of what is happening to its bad name in these circumstances and in the allegations of fraud and other misconduct which have been referred to in the House recently?

Mr. Howard: I have made my position clear elsewhere. It is not possible, for good reasons resulting from continuing obligations and the right of Lloyd's to impose discipline on members where necessary, for a member normally to resign membership immediately. It is not possible normally, according to the rules of Lloyd's, for any resignation to take effect for a period of at least 30 months. In those circumstances, I have done what was proper for me to do, which was to terminate my underwriting and resign from all syndicates.

I wish to deal with the facts of the case——

Mr. Janner rose——

Mr. Deputy Speaker (Mr. Ernest Armstrong): Order. The hon. and learned Gentleman must not widen the debate.

Mr. Janner: On a point of order, Mr. Deputy Speaker. Is it in order for a Minister to reveal an interest in Lloyd's without saying whether he has given the 30-months notice to resign his membership from the organisation?

Mr. Deputy Speaker: I understand that the Minister explained his position the other night. In any event, it is not a matter for me.

Mr. Howard: I wish to deal with the facts of the case in the four minutes that remain to me. The Law Commission's report and recommendation can be summarised in this way:

"the duty of disclosure should be retained but it should be modified . . . A fact should be disclosed to the insurer by an applicant if . . . it is material in the sense that it would influence a prudent insurer in deciding whether to offer cover against the proposed risk and, if so, at what premium and on what terms; and it is . . . known to the applicant . . . and . . . it is one which a reasonable man in the position of the applicant would disclose to his insurers having regard to the nature and extent of the insurers cover which is sought and the circumstances in which it is sought".

As we have heard, Mr. O'Shea was a jeweller. He was seeking cover not for his house or personal possessions but for his business. I express no personal view, far less a view on behalf of the Government, as it would not be proper to do so in the circumstances. However, it is at least open to argument that the knowledge that Mr. O'Shea had a previous conviction for receiving stolen goods was a material fact likely at least to influence the premium and the terms which an insurer would be prepared to offer, if not an insurer's willingness to provide cover in the first place.

We have listened with great care to what has been said about the circumstances of Mr. O'Shea's conviction, but conviction it was and as a conviction it remains on the record. In the circumstances, the very fact that the Law Commission's recommendation would not necessarily cover the case may cause some to doubt—I express no personal or governmental view on the matter—whether the extreme language used by the hon. and learned Member for Leicester, West was justified. Those are the circumstances, and it is open to argument whether the Law Commission's recommendation would have covered the case. It is open to argument whether it is reasonable for an insurer to take the view that the disclosure was material and might have affected the premium required.

The hon. and learned Member for Leicester, West asked me to intervene, and he asked the Government to intervene. He must know that neither I nor the Government have any statutory locus to intervene in such matters. Although I share the views expressed by the hon. and learned Gentleman on the need to improve this area of our law, and although I share the sympathy expressed by him and my hon. Friend the Member for Cannock and Burntwood for Mr. O'Shea's personal predicament, I cannot provide the intervention or Government assistance for which they ask in resolving the facts of a sad and unhappy case.

Afghanistan

10.15 am

Mr. David Atkinson (Bournemouth, East): As this is the first opportunity I have had to do so in the House, I congratulate my hon. Friend the Under-Secretary of State on his appointment, which is so well deserved and long overdue. I am delighted to see my hon. Friends the Members for Dorset, South (Viscount Cranborne) and for Lewisham, East (Mr. Moynihan) in their places, both of whose interest and experience in Afghanistan are well known. I understand that they may wish to catch your eye, Mr. Deputy Speaker, in the course of the debate.

The House will know that next week marks the sixth anniversary of the Soviet invasion of Afghanistan. Despite the United Nations proximity talks, there appears to be no sign of an early withdrawal of Soviet troops. This is an especially appropriate time for the House to debate Afghanistan because, in my view, there exists a distinct danger that the euphoria following the recent summit between President Reagan and Mr. Gorbachev may tempt some in the west to compromise their original position over Afghanistan in pursuit of a return to detente, and possibly to encourage success at the arms control negotiations at Geneva.

It might be useful to recall the events leading up to 27 December 1979 when the West gave every sign of having been caught by surprise, which, if true, represents a major scandal. Western intelligence would, or should, have been aware of the growing Soviet influence in Afghanistan, with the application of the classic Leninist strategy of infiltration, subterfuge, sabotage and assassination during each of the successive regimes since the overthrow of King Zahir Shah in 1973, and especially since the role of the Soviet special forces, the Spetsnaz, in the murder of President Amin in 1979.

We now know from Soviet defectors since the invasion, and from Vladimir Bukovsky's book, "The Peace Movement and the Soviet Union", that the Kremlin took some sort of decision in September 1979 to invade Afghanistan, and, in anticipation of the end to detente that this would provoke, it decided also to reactivate the world peace movement at the so-called World Parliament of the Peoples for Peace conference in Sofia on 23 to 27 September.

Surely our spy satellites and intelligence sources would have picked up sufficient evidence of the movement of troops and armour during the weeks preceding the invasion itself, which would have alerted Western leaders to warn the Kremlin both in private and in public of the consequences of such unlawful aggression.

It should come as no surprise that the Foreign Office appeared to know nothing until it woke up after Boxing Day because we now know that our information gatherers were on strike at the time. In reply to a question from the hon. Member for Thurrock (Dr. McDonald) on 30 July 1984, my right hon. and learned Friend the Foreign Secretary said that between 20 December 1979 and 13 February 1980 there was industrial action by station radio officers at GCHQ Cheltenham in support of a pay dispute.

There had been previous action in June, July and September 1979. If we were caught napping because of such irresponsible action by those to whom we entrust the security not only of this country but of the Western Alliance, my right hon. Friend the Prime Ministr was wholly justified in seeking to end union influence at GCHQ. It is a pity that we do not remind the public more frequently of these facts.

The invasion was justified by the Soviet Union on the grounds of having been "invited" to send troops to counter foreign interference, just as it had been invited so to do by Czechoslovakia in 1968 and by Hungary in 1956. The reaction of the rest of the world was rightly condemnatory. The United Nations passed a resolution calling for withdrawal. The European Community approved the Carrington plan to negotiate for a neutral and non-aligned Afghanistan. To his credit, President Carter led the world on sanctions against the Soviet Union, including the grain embargo—this has since been lifted on the ground that it was proving ineffective and hurting American farmers more — the ending of technology transfer, soft credits and SALT II and an American boycott of the Moscow Olympics.

All too predictably, within a year, Western sanctions began to disintegrate in favour of self-interest. For example, President Carter himself quietly approved licences enabling American firms to sell billions of dollars' worth of gas pipeline-laying equipment to the Soviet Union, which, as we now know, was to employ gulag labour to construct it.

But there has been no such feebleness in Afghanistan where the people have shown that they are more prepared to be dead than Red in supporting seven different ill-equipped, ill-disciplined groups of freedom fighters, who were all too often prepared to fight one another rather than the common enemy, who then became a far more effective united force — the Mujahidin, equipped with heat-seeking missiles capable of doing impressive damage to the remaining Afghan army and the Soviet forces.

I shall not waste the time of the House speculating on the reasons for the Kremlin's decision to invade. There are many theories. The report by the Select Committee on Foreign Affairs discounted the historic "warm water port" theory; but perhaps the grim Russian joke—that the best way of defending its border is to be both sides of it—comes closest to the truth.

There is no doubt that the decision by the ageing moribund Brezhnev regime to invade Afghanistan has proved to be one of the Soviet Union's costliest blunders in recent years. It immediately isolated the Soviet Union from the free Muslim world at a time when the United States had lost influence through its support for the Shah and was being embarrassed by the hostages crisis in Teheran. It has been seen to be responsible for causing the single largest refugee problem in the world, with more than 4 million refugees in north-west Pakistan, and 5,000 or more coming over every month, and a further million in Iran—although that is no humanitarian gesture by the Ayatollah, who is using many of them at the front in his war with Iraq and is using the opportunity to export his own Islamic fundamentalist revolution to Afghanistan and the Soviet Union. That is why the Soviet Union has hastily replaced its central Asian troops with less impressionable Russians and Slavs.

There is no doubt that the war is contributing to some unrest in the Soviet Union as more and more service men return wounded and ever more families suffer bereavement. That has led to increasing television coverage showing Soviet troops in action. The Soviet Union is never backward in making a fuss of its individual heroes who are assuming almost Rambo-like proportions.

Although this can in no way be compared to the way in which public opinion in the United States forced Lyndon Johnson not to seek re-election because of Vietnam, the higher profile of the war is beginning to take a heavy toll and to affect the country domestically. Rostislav Evdokimov, the Russian free trade union campaigner who is now in prison, told me, while I was in Leningrad to interview him for my report on the freedom of trade unions in the Soviet Union for the Council of Europe, about the growing public awareness of the direction that the war was taking as a result of the coffins coming home.

I do not wish to dwell on the detail of the war itself. Reports still appear regularly in the Western press. It appears that the action has escalated this year and, although the Soviet-backed Afghan army has recently scored some successes, the Mujahidin continue to be able to threaten the main avenues of communication out of Kabul, northward to the Soviet border and eastward to the Khyber pass, as well as to infiltrate the capital.

Disgraceful reprisals are taken against the Afghan population. The list of atrocities is horrific. With more than 180,000 dead, it amounts to genocide. Fortunately, this has not gone unnoticed by the United Nations, where a report on the human rights situation in Afghanistan was presented earlier this year which figured prominently in last month's General Assembly debate when the continued Soviet occupation was condemned by a record majority. The General Assembly adopted yet another resolution on human rights and fundamental freedoms in Afghanistan on 13 December.

For some time, efforts have been made by the United Nations Secretary-General to secure a Soviet withdrawal in accordance with the annual resolutions and his proximity talks in Geneva are still going on. While a number of points have been agreed, we have yet to see any breakthrough resulting from the October summit. We must reasonably assume that Mr. Gorbachev wants a settlement. He has said as much, but he has said also that he would, if necessary, put five times as many Soviet troops into Afghanistan.

Although we must, of course, fully support these negotiations, especially Pakistan's determination not to negotiate directly with the Karmal Government, because to do so would represent de facto recognition of another Soviet puppet regime, there are a number of concerns which are being overlooked as well as initiatives which we should be considering which I should like to draw to the attention of the House.

First, I do not believe that the West has fully woken up to the problems of the refugees. For a first-hand account, I recommend the recent booklet "Refugees from Afghanistan" by George Miller, published by the British section of the International Society on Human Rights. The plight of the refugees must be kept in the public eye. We need to draw new world attention to the plight of the Afghan refugees. We have seen the massive response to aid Ethiopia. I am sure that, if we encourage more aid to the Afghan refugees, this will help to generate contributions and aid to those bearing the burden of assistance, not least the hard-pressed Pakistan Government and the United Nations agencies. It would also put international pressure on the Soviet Union.

Last month, the standing committee of the Assembly of the Council of Europe adopted the report by my right hon. Friend the Member for Torbay (Sir F. Bennett) on "The Deteriorating Situation in Afghanistan", including a recommendation urging the Governments of member states to increase the contributions to the International Committee of the Red Cross and Red Crescent to all places that they wish to visit in Afghanistan. I hope that the Government will vigorously support that recommendation.

We should not ignore the destabilising effect that so many refugees are having on Pakistan, not just on the economy, especially in the Peshawar area, but on the local population which is already strained by the Pashtoon and Baluchistan separatist issues which are being increasingly exploited by the Soviet Union against President Zia.

There is now widespread evidence that the Afghan security forces, the KHAD, are attempting to exploit Pakistani resentment of the refugee presence and have been able to penetrate the resistance movement to the extent of causing the deaths of a number of Mujahidin leaders within the past year.

Secondly, the West has yet to face up to the problem of the 200 or so Soviet soldiers who are now prisoners of the Mujahidin, many of whom wanted to come to the West. For example, Vladimir Naumov has been in rebel hands since November 1983. His health is deteriorating. He wishes to come to this country but I understand that the Home Office has, on three separate occasions, refused to consider his case. I appeal to my hon. Friend to see that we agree a humane policy with our allies towards those Soviet prisoners who wish to come to the West.

Thirdly, the West, including all members of the European Community, must continue to insist on a Soviet withdrawal before it is prepared to return to any new detente which Mr. Gorbachev seeks. Afghanistan must become a free and independent state again—neutral and non-aligned if that is the express wish of its people. There must be no compromise on that, and every opportunity must be used to get that message across to the Kremlin. I hope that President Reagan did just that at Geneva.

There should be no normalisation of relations between the Community and Comecon. Talks on that matter were broken off in 1980 because of the invasion of Afghanistan. Earlier this year, Comecon asked for a resumption of talks, but it took several months for the Commission to decide against such talks being resumed. Why did it take so long? The answer should have been immediate and emphatic. A Soviet withdrawal must come first.

I question whether the West's current attitude will be sufficient to convince the Kremlin seriously to consider withdrawal. If half the pressure that the world is putting on South Africa at present to end apartheid were applied to the Soviet Union to get out of Afghanistan, I believe that it would be only a matter of time before it did so. For France and other European countries to grovel to Third-world, black, corrupt, debt-ridden dictatorships to pile on the agony for South Africa and at the same time actively to pursue increased trade with the Soviet Union whilst it remains in Afghanistan, and to accept Siberian gas, is sheer hypocrisy and double standards.

At this time, when the Mujahidin is showing, with great courage and self sacrifice, that it remains determined to resist Soviet occupation and is committed to producing the same results as the Vietcong did for the United States in Vietnam, we in the West are honour bound to ensure that they want for nothing by way of arms and equipment. I believe that then we might see, for the first time, a Soviet retreat which will in turn contribute greatly to the promotion of peace and prosperity in our world today.

Viscount Cranborne (Dorset, South): The House owes a debt of immense gratitude to my hon. Friend the Member for Bournemouth, East (Mr. Atkinson) for the initiative that he has taken today. His timing, as so often, has been impeccable. He has raised the matter at a perfect moment in our parliamentary calendar because we are so close to the anniversary of the Soviet forces' invasion of Afghanistan in 1979.

My hon. Friend was exceedingly eloquent, as we have come to expect of him. He has also been generous in allowing me a small slice of the limited time available to him. I should explain that my gratitude is all the greater because I have an interest to declare, not just as chairman of the Afghanistan support committee but as chairman of its associated charitable organisation, Afghanaid, which is dedicated to sending help inside Afghanistan rather than to the refugee camps in Iran and Pakistan. I am sure that my hon. Friends will understand that that task is difficult, complicated and dangerous.

My hon. Friend has covered a large and complex subject thoroughly. I should like to emphasise a couple of the points that he made. The first relates to the scale of the disaster inside Afghanistan. Let there be no mistake, that is where the humanitarian need is. The refugees need help but, by and large, they are adequately looked after. The real need is inside the country where, of course, politically and physically it is most difficult to deliver it. I am grateful to my right hon. and hon. Friends in the Foreign and Commonwealth Office for the help that they have given my organisation. I wish to express appreciation for the way that they have co-operated.

There has been an appalling disaster which is—dare I say it—greater in humanitarian terms than the disaster in Ethiopia. The difficulty is that we do not know about it. It is extraordinary that the report presented to the United Nations General Assembly on 5 November 1985 attracted far less attention than it deserved. My hon. Friend was correct to draw the attention of the House to it today. The problem is that there are siren voices that say that it is a matter of super-power aggression, and wonder how a bunch of rag-headed tribesmen can manage to fight a super-power. They say, "Would it not be better to let them die slowly and not to irritate the Soviet Union when the world is so anxious to pursue the quest for peace?"

I shall set aside the temptation to discuss appeasement. Those people who put forward that argument do not know the type of people that the Afghan Mujahidin are. They will fight whether we help them or not. It would be an excellent thing, would it not, if we were to ensure, in so far as we could, that their sacrifice was not in vain.

In that context, I ask my hon. Friend the Minister to assure us of three things when he replies. First, that he will continue to give inside Afghanistan the humanitarian aid that is so badly needed. Secondly, that he will ensure that as much publicity as possible is given to what is happening inside Afghanistan. The Central Office of Information does a fine job already, but we need to do more. Will he encourage the newspapers and propaganda organisations to act accordingly? Thirdly, will he ensure that political pressure is applied? Is my hon. Friend the Minister prepared to undertake that Her Majesty's Government will press for observer status at the United Nations for the alliance of seven Mujahidin organisations?

Mr. Colin Moynihan (Lewisham, East): I am grateful to my hon. Friend the Member for Bournemouth, East (Mr. Atkinson) for raising this important and timely debate today. As hon. Members will be aware, I leave this evening for the north-west frontier of Pakistan to highlight the problems associated with refugees. I hope, during a two-week visit, to assess in detail some of the critical issues that he mentioned, and upon which I believe the House must concentrate in 1986.

We must consider the critical issue of the degree to which the Government should give humanitarian assistance inside Afghanistan as well as in the refugee camps. I fully appreciate and share the view of my hon. Friends the Members for Bournemouth, East and for Dorset, South (Viscount Cranborne) that this is a difficult issue which needs careful handling.

Bilateral assistance is provided by humanitarian charities. The Save the Children Fund does humanitarian work in the camps and Afghanaid does outstanding work in Afghanistan. They should have the Government's full support.

I place on record the unremitting and outstanding work of one of the world's recognised experts Rome Fullerton. He has done so much important work in the Afghanistan support committee and, although I have no eyes to see or ears to hear, I understand that he is with us today in the House.

I regret that, while I shall be on one side of the border, the hon. Member for Edinburgh, Leith (Mr. Brown), who as a Member of Parliament should support the democratic values of representative Government, should accept a Soviet invitation to visit Afghanistan as a guest of the Soviet-backed regime. If I see him across the border, I cannot say that I shall readily acknowledge him.

I wish to place on record that I believe that the West has not yet accurately assessed the best and most co-ordinated way of assisting the Mujahadin and ensuring that the Soviet troops get out of Afghanistan as quickly as possible. There are many strands that are yet to be drawn together into a positive and effective method of action by the West. I regret that we do not have that, and I hope that during the two weeks that I shall be in the north-west frontier I shall be able to address those matters in particular. It has been useful to hear the debate before I go, and I look forward to the contribution from the Minister who, I think rightly, has won the respect of the House as a passionate, thoughtful and highly competent Minister.

The Parliamentary Under-Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs (Mr. Tim Eggar): I am grateful to the hon. Member for Bournemouth, East (Mr. Atkinson) for giving me the opportunity to reply to the debate, and to my hon. Friends for joining in. I express some regret that no Opposition Member felt able to attend and listen to the debate or take part in it.

I said that I was grateful to my hon. Friend for raising the matter. That is because we are nearing the sixth anniversary of the Soviet invasion of Afghanistan. That anniversary falls on 27 December. However, it is also a repugnant task to reply to the debate because what is happening in Afghanistan is truly repugnant, sobering and chastening. My hon. Friend the Member for Bournemouth, East has already spoken of the historical background to the position in Afghanistan, and I do not wish to expand on that because it is well known, except to point out that the war in Afghanistan has now been going on for six years. That is longer than the second world war.

As my hon. Friend the Member for Dorset, South has said, it is an unsung, faraway and neglected war. Access is difficult. It is hard for the media to secure the facts and films which our communication systems crave. However, the truth can never be completely suppressed and I want to draw the attention of the House to the problems of human rights in Afghanistan. I do not want to be emotional, tendentious or propagandist; I simply want to tell the House the facts, because they speak for themselves. I do not want to produce Foreign Office facts. I shall refer to the report of the Special Rapporteur to the United Nations Commission on Human Rights to the General Assembly of the United Nations. That report is in the Library of the House. It if is true that the hon. Member for Edinburgh, Leith (Mr. Brown) will be spending Christmas in Kabul at the invitation of the Soviet puppet regime, I make an offer to him. The Foreign and Commonwealth Office will gladly make available as many as 100 copies of that report of the UN Commission on Human Rights. I look forward to meeting with him when he returns from Kabul so that he can tell me how far he got in his efforts to distribute those copies and the reaction to them of the regime and the people in Kabul. On the off-chance that he will not feel able to take up my offer, I shall tell the House something of what the report says. That document cannot be described as anything more than a sober and realistic analysis of the position in Afghanistan. It refers to the gross and systematic abuse of human rights in that country.

Some 115,000 Soviet troops are helping the regime in Kabul. The report found that "benevolent" administration guilty of torture, conscription of children aged 15, displacement of persons from their homes making them refugees in their own country as well as refugees in neighbouring countries, infringement of the right to self-determination, acts of brutality by the armed forces, bombardment and massacres of villages following reprisals, use of anti-personnel mines and, even more horrifying, the use of booby-trapped toys.

I shall briefly discuss each of the areas that were highlighted by the United Nations' document. There is no doubt that torture is currently commonplace and, to quote the report, torture

"has almost assumed the character of an administrative practice."

I do not need to detain the House on the horror of conscription of children.

The report refers to the creation of refugees——

"some regions are devastated, the population has had to flee and cannot return, the agriculture is completely destroyed."

In the course of operations against the opposition movements it appears that

"all kinds of sophisticated weapons, in particular those that have a heavy destructive and psychological effect, are being used. The target is primarily the civilian population, the villages and the agricultural structure."

The report goes on:

"whole groups of persons and tribes are endangered in their existence and in their lives because their living conditions are fundamentally affected by the kind of warfare being waged."

If that is not enough, the report writes of the merciless character of the warfare in that country. Perhaps we should not be surprised at the report's observation that in the treatment of prisoners the existence of the Geneva convention is simply not heard of.

I agree with my hon. Friend the Member for Bournemouth, East. The Government would like to see the International Committee of the Red Cross allowed freely to visit Soviet prisoners of war, the many Afghans taken in the fighting and the political prisoners — there are many of them—held by the Soviet occupying forces and the Soviet puppet regime.

However appalling the treatment of the prisoners of war is, it is a lesser tragedy than the calculated acts of brutality by the armed forces against the civilian population. The report says that the objective of the regime seemed to be to destroy the means of survival of the population assisting the resistance movement. I shall spare the House the full horror described in the report and take a typical example —a series of reprisal operations against 12 villages in one week in March of this year when 1,000 civilians were allegedly killed. These are not the Foreign Office's words. The report states:

"In the course of these operations, livestock was decimated, houses plundered and set on fire, women raped and some of them summarily executed, and several children locked up in a house were burnt to death."

What sort of regime is it that will consciously burn children to death? If we add atrocity to atrocity, the simple, chilling arithmetic says that, according to certain estimates, the series of incidents catalogued in the report "has resulted in the killing of approximately 500,000 Afghans since 1979, most of them civilians."

In only nine months of this year almost 33,000 civilians were reported to have been killed, almost 2,000 houses destroyed together with 74 villages, and well over 3,000 animals. With that goes the devastation and destruction of fields and livestock and, as the report says, the "destruction of irrigation systems in provinces as a result of aerial bombardments which have prevented any repairs from being made and have completely obliterated agriculture in several regions".

I do not have to tell the House that if the people cannot farm, they starve.

Yet that is not the worst, regrettably. I referred to the use of booby-trapped toys. Let me tell the House what those devices are. Generally they are dropped by helicopter in zones that are presumed to be controlled by the resistance. They resemble pens, harmonicas, radios or matchboxes, or are shaped like little birds, but those so-called toys explode when they are picked up or stepped upon. The majority of the victims are children aged between 8 and 15 whose hands or legs are blown off. Many witnesses have testified that the use of those horrible devices now form, according to the report,

"part of a strategy aimed specifically at the civilian population of villages where a large military operation appeared to be under way."

At this Christmas season we should note the chilling words of the report:

"The situation of children in Afghanistan has been particularly affected, whether they live in Kabul or in the main cities or whether they cross the border as refugees. The majority of children who do not leave the country and who are not in the cities are helpless against the effects of high altitude bombing and shelling, starvation and disease, the disruption of families and the destruction of family life and the collapse of the traditional structure.

There is apparently no health cure for the majority of the population. As a consequence, the infant mortality rate has reached 300 and 400 per 1,000".

[Mr. Tim Eggar]

That is one of the highest infant mortality rates in the world.

I should like to illustrate by a further quotation that the regime attacks its own citizens not only physically but in their very spiritual beliefs, in a country where perhaps 99 per cent. are Moslems. The report states:

"The Special Rapporteur also wishes to emphasise two new factors which illustrate the range of the actions taken in the country: on the one hand, a policy described as one of humiliation and religious intolerance; and, on the other hand, bombings of civilians during funerals.

Indeed, according to a number of witnesses, mosques have been desecrated, religious books have been destroyed and in some cases even used as toilet paper, while members of the Islamic faith have been obliged to eat pork and to drink alcohol.

A number of witnesses stated that funeral processions accompanying the bodies of victims had also been bombed."

Faced with that litany of systmatic abuses of human rights, we should not be surprised by what the report calls "one of the biggest movements of refugees history has ever known".

It is estimated to be continuing at some 6,000 to 8,000 people a month. Again, I quote:

"it may be appreciated that the sheer volume of the refugees is per se a human rights problem."

Small wonder that between 1·5 million and 2 million people are now displaced from their homes in Afghanistan, refugees inside their own country, with a further 3 million refugees in Pakistan and another million in Iran.

My hon. Friends have referred to the importance of aid to assist those refugees. Last year we were able to give some £4 million to help refugees in Pakistan. I hope that we shall be able to give similar amounts next year. I paid particular attention to the remarks by my hon. Friend the Member for Dorset, South. We very much appreciate the work that is done by Afghanaid and we hope that next year we shall be able to be of assistance again.

Despite increasingly aggressive and more sophisticated tactics, and much heavier firepower on the part of the Soviet regime's forces, the resistance remains strong and resilient. I assure the House that we take every opportunity to encourage the resistance, to draw attention to its gallant struggles, and to give it what support we can in its efforts to liberate its country from the Soviet occupation and puppet regime of Babrak Karmal.

The tragedy is that none of that should be necessary. The presence of Soviet troops in Afghanistan has been consistently condemned by the international community, most recently on 13 November this year at the United Nations, when a record 122 voted for the motion calling for the withdrawal of Soviet troops, with only 19 countries against. There can be no doubt that both the Kabul regime and the Soviet Union are, in Afghanistan, in breach of the Geneva convention and of the International covenants on Human Rights, of which both are signatories.

This week the Pakistan Government and representatives of the Kabul regime have been in Geneva for proximity talks under the auspices of the United Nations Secretary-General's special representative. Those talks have already reached agreement on the outlines of a solution, which would provide for the withdrawal of all foreign troops, full respect for Afghanistan's independent sovereign non-aligned status, non-intervention and non-interference from outside, leaving the country free to determine its own future, and the right of refugees to return to their homes in safety and honour.

There appear to be some signs of Soviet flexibility, but we need to have more than just the appearance. We need to have evidence of their willingness to come to terms and to withdraw from the country. Whatever the Soviet Union says, it is its willingness to negotiate a firm, fixed timetable for troop withdrawal which is the real test of its commitment to a settlement. Whatever may have been said at Geneva, we need to see concrete progress from the Soviet Union.

I confess that I find it difficult to understand why the Soviet Union has not learnt from the history of the region, from the proud tradition of the peoples of Afghanistan. There can be no victory against them, no militarily imposed solution. As my hon. Friend the Member for Bournemouth, East said, the key to peace remains the withdrawal of Soviet troops as part of a negotiated package. Nothing else can end the tragedy of Afghanistan and the suffering of its people, of whom, as we have heard today, fully one third are refugees either outside their country, in Pakistan or Iran, or within it. The Government are determined to do everything that they can do to assist those refugees and to ensure that the brave fight of the people of Afghanistan can continue to an ultimately successful conclusion.

I am sure that the whole House joins me and my hon. Friend in condemning unreservedly the activities of the Karmal regime and the Soviet Union. Over Christmas everyone in the House and the country will think of the brave Afghan people entering the seventh year of a war against a foreign aggressor. In particular, as our children and grandchildren open their toys, we may spare a thought for the children of Afghanistan who, when they pick up the toys that they see lying in the countryside, find, instead, a booby trap or a bomb, and lose limbs as a result of playing with those particularly fiendish devices left by the Soviet Union.

It being Eleven o'clock, MR. SPEAKER interrupted the proceedings, pursuant to Standing Order No. 5 (Friday sittings).

Gartcosh

The Secretary of State for Scotland (Mr. George Younger): With permission, Mr. Speaker, I will make a statement about matters relating to the steel industry in Scotland, and, particularly, about the Gartcosh cold-rolling mill and the Ravenscraig works.

On 7 August the Government announced the results of the strategy review which they had conducted with the British Steel Corporation. The most important outcome of the review was that steel making would continue at all five of the corporation's major sites, one of which is Ravenscraig, for at least the duration of the present planning period, that is until 1988, unless there should be a major and unforeseen downturn in demand. At the same time, the corporation announced as a managerial decision, and not subject to specific Government approval, that it intended to close from 31 March 1986 the Gartcosh cold-rolling mill. Gartcosh is about 10 miles from Ravenscraig, and draws its supplies of hot-rolled steel from Ravenscraig.

The corporation's decision on Gartcosh was the subject of controversy in Scotland. The Government were urged to intervene to prevent the closure, mainly on the ground that Gartcosh is an integral part of the Ravenscraig works, and that its closure would lead inevitably to the closure of Ravenscraig. It was argued that that would put in doubt the joint conclusion of the Government and the corporation that Ravenscraig should remain in operation. I have received a considerable number of written representations about the closure of Gartcosh, to which I have replied, and I have also met a number of deputations.

The most significant of the representations which I received were those from the Ravenscraig trade unions committee. On 9 October the committee asked me to meet it so that it could put to me its views on the matters I have just described. I agreed to do so as soon as conveniently possible, and we met in Edinburgh on 21 October. When the House resumed after the summer recess the Select Committee on Scottish Affairs began an investigation into the British Steel Corporation's decision to close Gartcosh. The two matters, the case put to me by the Ravenscraig trade unions committee, and the Select Committee's investigation, were and are quite separate, although obviously they relate to the same issue. Having considered the matter against the background of the Select Committee's intention to restrict its taking of evidence, and to report as quickly as possible, I decided to await the Committee's report before replying to the Ravenscraig trade unions committee. That remained the position until the beginning of this week.

There was then no certainty whether or when the Select Committee would report, and the already lengthy delay in replying to the trade unions committee began to appear discourteous, especially as the Christmas recess was imminent. I came to the conclusion that I could wait no longer, and my Private Secretary, therefore, wrote on my behalf to the Ravenscraig trade unions committee's convener on 18 December, conveying my views on the matters put to me by his committee. On 19 December, in reply to a question by my hon. Friend the Member for Edinburgh, Central (Mr. Fletcher), a copy of the correspondence was placed in the Library of the House.

My conclusion was that the Government would not be justified in changing their view that the decision to close Gartcosh was a matter for the commercial judgment of the corporation, that the issues raised by the proposed closure are commercial, managerial and technical, rather than strategic, and that those issues are properly a matter for decision by BSC, not the Government. The corporation has satisfied me and my colleagues that the closure proposal is consistent with the strategy agreed for the corporation for the next three years, particularly in relation to continuation of steel making on the five major sites, including Ravenscraig.

On 18 December the Select Committee agreed on a report, and I understand that that report is expected to be available later today. As is the usual practice, the Government will in due course give their views on the Select Committee's report and recommendations.

Mr. Donald Dewar (Glasgow, Garscadden): The Secretary of State will be aware of the widespread disappointment and anger at his insistence that Gartcosh can be killed off without damaging the rest of the Scottish steel industry. The Secretary of State, in his letter to Mr. Brennan, the shop steward convener at Ravenscraig, set great store on the BSC assurances. How can he do that with confidence, when bad news is pressing in on every side? Today the press has reported a story of a further 430 men being made redundant at the nearby Clydesdale tube works.

Does the Secretary of State genuinely believe that he can accept a policy which BSC openly says is based on an assumption that there will be no economic recovery or increase in demand for steel products during the next few years? Is it not naive to rely on such assurances about Ravenscraig when the top management of the BSC repeatedly call for closure of one of the major strip mills? Is it not extraordinary that the letter of 18 December was sent? It refers to the Select Committee's report and carefully states that the Government's response will come in due course from the Department of Trade and Industry. Why does the Secretary of State pre-empt that consideration by his right hon. Friend, and announce his damaging views on a central issue in the report?

It is the Select Committee's conviction that Gartcosh and Ravenscraig cannot be treated as separate entities, and that any guarantee extended to Ravenscraig should also cover Gartcosh. The Secretary of State must be uncomfortably aware that the report was endorsed by eight votes to two, and carried every Tory Member except two irreconcilable diehards. Does not the Secretary of State's letter to the convener kick his colleagues in the teeth, and suggest a lack of courtesy and a cavalier disregard for the Committee system? Has the Secretary of State seen the evidence offered to the Select Committee? If he has not, his repudiation of the link with Ravenscraig is even more indefensible.

I understand from what the Secretary of State said that to some extent he accepts that he jumped the gun with his letter to Mr. Brennen, although he offers some explanation. The statement contains an implied apology. Surely he accepts that to talk of discourtesy because of the delay in sending a reply is no alibi for the way in which he acted. I can promise him that the stewards would have been much happier with an explanation of the delay, and to be informed that the Secretary of State was prepared courteously to wait for the important Select Committee evidence, rather than be faced with this dismaying and damaging document, which is so ill-timed.

[Mr. Donald Dewar]

Is it not grossly unfair on the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry who has still to reply on behalf of the Government to the Select Committee report? Will the Secretary of State assure the House today—this will be an important assurance—that, despite what he said in his letter, the Government's mind is not yet closed, and that there will be a genuine in-depth consideration of the Select Committee's evidence and findings?

This cannot be the final word on the matter. The fight will certainly continue in Scotland. Will the Secretary of State promise that the weighty considerations raised by the Select Committee's investigation are not being shelved or sabotaged by his letter to Mr. Brennan, and that they are still very much on the ministerial agenda? Neither the Government nor the BSC management must take irrevocable action to close Gartcosh during the recess. The Secretary of State owes that assurance to the House, certainly to the Select Committee on Scottish Affairs, to the whole of Scotland, and to the courageous and responsible work force who have put a compelling case for their plant with force and dignity.

Mr. Younger: I appreciate what the hon. Gentleman has said, and entirely agree that the work force has worked hard and devotedly at Gartcosh. I am sure that he appreciates that the news about the large number of redundancies at Clydesdale tube works, which are extremely regrettable, has absolutely nothing to do with either Ravenscraig or Gartcosh. I am assured by the BSC management that they are due solely to a reduction in the demand for products which are made there. It is important that that should not be confused in any way with the controversy over Gartcosh and/or Ravenscraig.

I ask the hon. Gentleman to consider carefully the detailed responses given by the British Steel Corporation. They make extremely useful and interesting reading, and the hon. Gentleman will have to make his own judgment on the evidence submitted. Before then, he should not jump to conclusions about what his view might be.

We have been waiting for weeks to see whether the Select Committee would produce a report and, if so, what it would say. I have done some waiting, too. As I saw the shop stewards on 21 October, and as I have been pressed almost daily during the past month to say when my response would come, I thought that if I delayed my response until the recess it would be considered discourteous. I have no doubt that the hon. Member for Glasgow, Garscadden (Mr. Dewar) would have been jumping about in fury had I done so——

Mr. Dewar: Oh, no.

Mr. Younger: Yes; I have had this in the past. The hon. Gentleman would have said that I had delayed my response until the recess to avoid giving Parliament the opportunity to comment on it. The hon. Gentleman must be honest and recognise that that is exactly what he would have said. That is why I decided at the beginning of this week, as there was every likelihood that the Select Committee would not come to a conclusion, that I had to play fair with the House and ensure that I responded before the recess.

However, I give the hon. Gentleman the assurance that he seeks on the Select Committee report. I have not yet received the report or all the evidence given to the Select Committee, but we hope to receive it later today. If so, I assure the hon. Gentleman that we shall consider carefully everything that is said in the report and all the details of the written and oral evidence that was given to the Select Committee. We shall weigh everything carefully before the Government respond in the usual way in the new year.

Mr. Alex Fletcher (Edinburgh, Central): Is my right hon. Friend aware that Conservative Members regret the prospect of further job losses in the Scottish steel industry? However, is it not a fact that the problems at Gartcosh and the problems reported this morning at the tube works are not due to a lack of Government investment, financial support or political support to keep the main steel works in Scotland going? Indeed, my right hon. Friend showed unusual commitment in obtaining a guarantee of three years' further production at Ravenscraig. Does he agree that there is a contradiction in accepting that the steel industry needs orders and that it must be competitive to achieve those orders, and yet fighting to retain loss-making plants?

Mr. Younger: My hon. Friend is right to say that the British steel industry, and the Scottish end of it, must be competitive in every way possible. Our consideration of such matters must be dominated by the crucial importance of Ravenscraig to the Scottish economy. We must consider every part of the evidence against the background of whether proposals would be to the advantage of Ravenscraig, which is so large and so important to Scotland. I have considered the matter with that in mind, and I suggest that hon. Members should do the same. By far the greatest danger to Scotland would be a threat to Ravenscraig's future.

I agree with my hon. Friend that job losses are extremely unwelcome at any time, but especially now. But they cannot be due to lack of Government support for the industry, because we have given hundreds of millions of pounds to keep the industry going through its difficulties. Indeed, the Government have made a firm commitment to keep Ravenscraig open during the present planning period.

Mr. David Steel (Tweeddale, Ettrick and Lauderdale): The Secretary of State cannot seriously expect us to accept his explanation of threatened discourtesy to the trade unions for sending this ridiculous letter, when the trade unions were pinning great faith and hope on the Select Committee report and did not expect ministerial intervention before its publication. Moreover, is he aware that, on Scottish radio this morning, the Minister of State, Department of Trade and Industry, has been properly holding the line about no further Government statement on the matter until the Select Committee report is published in January? The Scottish Office should have adhered religiously to that line.

The Secretary of State must have recognised by now that it is generally believed in Scotland that the closure of Gartcosh in 1986 is bound to have a direct effect on the viability of Ravenscraig after 1988. There is no denying that.

Mr. Younger: The right hon. Gentleman completely ignores the fact that the Select Committee's deliberations have taken so long, and the fact that my response was to specific recommendations from the shop stewards joint committee. It is not a response to the evidence given to the Select Committee or to the Select Committee's views. Nor could it be, since I have not yet received them. With that in mind, I believe that the right hon. Gentleman is being disingenuous. He, too, would have been angry had I made the announcement during the recess. Therefore, his remarks are unfair to me.

Mr. Bill Walker (Tayside, North): I am a member of the Select Committee to which much reference has been made. Is my right hon. Friend aware that those who wished to use the Select Committee to produce a political report have been found out? Anyone who examines carefully the evidence presented to the Select Committee —I have done a tremendous amount of work on this report—will be bitterly disappointed that the Opposition do not recognise that, on the basis of the evidence, the corporation's decision was clearly commercial, managerial and technical. The British Iron and Steel Consumers' Council said that its members — the customers—had a vested interest in an efficient and financially viable BSC. Were it not so, prices to the consumer would be affected.

The cause of the problems at the tube works is uncertainty in the North sea oil market, brought about by the fluctuating price of oil. The fact that the price is sinking has thrown doubt on further orders from the North sea sector. Does my right hon. Friend agree that, although all of those matters are disappointing for Scotland, the most disappointing aspect is how the trade unions have been led along by those who believed that they could engineer a political report, but were unable to do so?

Mr. Younger: I appreciate what my hon. Friend says. I shall make no comment on the Select Committee's work until I have read the report in detail. I should tell the hon. Member for Garscadden that we should respect the right of all members of the Select Committee to express their views and to be respected for them. I hope that we will not give the impression that we attach more weight to some than to others——

Mr. Dewar: It was the majority.

Mr. Younger: I think it is important to accord respect to the views of all members of the Select Committee.

As my hon. Friend said, it is perfectly correct for the BSC to decide the future of Gartcosh. What this controversy has outlined most clearly is that it is exceedingly difficult for people outside the industry to become mixed up in the complicated detail of running it, as I have discovered. Although it must be done, I believe that it is better to allow industry to make its decisions wherever possible. My hon. Friend was right to mention one group who have not been mentioned so far this morning—the customers. They are the most important people. They require products made in the best possible works at the lowest possible cost.

Dr. Jeremy Bray (Motherwell, South): Did the Secretary of State make any approach to the shop stewards asking whether they would accept a delay in his response until he had a chance to consider the Select Committee report? I believe that they received no such approach.

Is the Secretary of State aware that the finishing mills in the British Steel Corporation, with Gartcosh, are already at the bottleneck? Is he aware that the closure of Gartcosh would tighten the bottleneck to such an extent that, whatever the demand, in three years' time the BSC can close Ravenscraig without reducing the amount of finished steel that it can produce?

Is the right hon. Gentleman aware that the BSC and Ministers have wriggled and squirmed in every direction to avoid giving their direct estimates or independent estimates of the effects of closing Gartcosh on the capacities of different stages of steel production, and thus on the viability of Ravenscraig after the closure of Gartcosh? Is he aware that it is totally inadequate for the British Steel Corporation to quibble about irrelevant details of other people's estimates while concealing its underlying strategy?

If, in three years' time, the Secretary of State, from whatever Benches, wishes to fight the closure of Ravenscraig, what arguments will he use? Does he acknowledge that the future of Gartcosh and Ravenscraig can be seen only in the context of the strip products group strategy as a whole, as other plants produce the same products and sell in the same markets? Does he condone the refusal by the chairman of the British Steel Corporation to give evidence on the strip products group strategy when, at other times, he says that that is the essential background to any decision on the future of Gartcosh and Ravenscraig?

Will the Secretary of State confirm that he has received from me a copy of a letter sent by me and other hon. Members to the Prime Minister seeking a meeting with her and other Ministers so that we can fully go into what I agree is a technical matter but one on which Ministers and the BSC have so far sought to conceal the underlying arguments?

Mr. Younger: I have seen a copy of the hon. Gentleman's letter to my right hon. Friend the Prime Minister. I am grateful to him for letting me see that. I assure him that it will be given careful consideration and that an answer will be sent to him as soon as possible.

I did not approach the shop stewards to ask their permission to delay further, because I thought that further delay would be undesirable and would certainly have been greatly disapproved of in Parliament.

I suggest that the hon. Gentleman, of all people, ought to be extremely careful about continuing to talk about the closure of Ravenscraig. It is not the case that, even if Gartcosh closes, Ravenscraig has to close also. It is terribly important that we should not go around giving the impression that it is. That is not so. Ravenscraig is far more important to Scotland than is any aspect of Gartcosh.

Several Hon. Members rose——

Mr. Speaker: Order. I shall endeavour to call all the right hon. and hon. Members who wish to ask questions, but I draw their attention to the fact that this is a private Members' day.

Mr. Roy Jenkins (Glasgow, Hillhead): Is the right hon. Gentleman aware that he has throughout given the impression of a pussy-footing approach on this important issue? Why did he feel confident yesterday, a few hours after the Select Committee report was published, to pronounce firmly that there was no link between Gartcosh and Ravenscraig, when the Select Committee, including the more respectable part of its Conservative membership, after weeks of taking evidence, was firmly convinced to the contrary?

I am not sure whether the Secretary of State's reply to the hon. Member for Glasgow, Garscadden (Mr. Dewar) meant that, with the Select Committee report, he is now willing to consider the matter afresh and, if necessary, reach a different decision about Gartcosh from that conveyed to the shop stewards yesterday. Is the right hon. Gentleman merely playing with words by saying that he is willing to look at the evidence? If his mind is not open, that is meaningless. Unless his mind is open, how can anyone have any trust in the future of Ravenscraig in his hands—if it be in his hands in three years' time?

Mr. Younger: The right hon. Gentleman will have to make his own judgment on that, on the basis of the record. The response that I gave yesterday had no relevance to the Select Committee report, because I have not yet received it. It was a response to the detailed recommendations and suggestions by the trade union shop stewards committee put to me on 21 October——

Mr. Jenkins: Is the Gartcosh decision open?

Mr. Younger: —to which I gave a very full reply yesterday. I ask the right hon. Gentleman to look at that very carefully indeed, because he will find that the arguments are extremely strong.

I assure the right hon. Gentleman that I and my colleagues in the Government will give the most careful consideration to everything said in the Select Committee report and all the evidence presented to it and we will look at that with an open nind.

Mr. Jim Craigen (Glasgow, Maryhill): Will the Secretary of State give us an assurance that, whatever else, Gartcosh will not have to close because of his well-known courtesy? Now that the Select Committee has reported, will the right hon. Gentleman take that report as an expression of Scottish opinion across the political spectrum, save one or two Conservative eccentrics? Will he assure the House that, as Scotland's representative in the Cabinet, he will have a change of heart, take on the Department of Trade and Industry and try to save Gartcosh?

Mr. Younger: As I have said already today, my overriding priority is the future of Ravenscraig. It is the largest part, the most important part and the central part of the Scottish steel industry. If I were convinced that the closure of Gartcosh would put Ravenscraig in greater danger, I should oppose that closure root and branch. But as, on the evidence presented to me by the shop stewards committee, I am not so convinced, I have to think of the future of Ravenscraig. It is clearly the opinion of the BSC management, and in the light of the shop stewards' evidence it is my opinion, that Ravenscraig is certainly no worse off, and is probably slightly better off, if Gartcosh does, regrettably, have to close. [HON. MEMBERS: "Oh!"] That must be our top priority and I hope that the hon. Gentleman will not join his hon. Friends and go around giving the impression that Ravenscraig cannot be run if Gartcosh closes. That is very damaging for the Scottish steel industry.

Mr. John McWilliam: (Blaydon): If Ravenscraig is so safe, why is the National Coal Board closing one third of its coke production for steel making by closing the coke plant at Derwent Haugh in my constituency, which serves Ravenscraig?

Mr. Younger: That has no relevance to future decisions on Ravenscraig. The BSC has made it clear that it has adequate coking capacity at Ravenscraig for the future, with the silicon welding, and it is putting more investment into Ravenscraig for direct coal injection. Of all the problems that we have to tackle, that is not one.

Mr. Charles Kennedy (Ross, Cromarty and Skye): When the right hon. Gentleman reads the report of these exchanges, he will surely acknowledge the unbelievably tortuous logic that he is trying to use. He told my right hon. Friend the Member for Glasgow, Hillhead (Mr. Jenkins) that he has an open mind on the issue and will be looking at the Select Committee report in that frame of mind, but in response to another question he said that he had a hunch —presumably he has had that hunch for some time— that Ravenscraig might be better off if Gartcosh were closed. What sort of open, objective analysis is that?

Given all the publicity about the deliberations of the Select Committee, surely the right hon. Gentleman does not have to wait for the report to arrive to know, as every hon. Member knows, that the Committee has said that it does not see the case for the distinction between Gartcosh and Ravenscraig that the management of the BSC is trying to make. Surely the right hon. Gentleman can respond to that today, instead of dodging the issue yet again.

Mr. Younger: I do not think that, on reflection, the hon. Gentleman will believe that that is a sensible proposition. He would not be pleased with me if I gave my response to any Select Committee report after merely looking at its conclusions and without studying the evidence. I have not had access to all the evidence. I have seen only the evidence that has been published. I do not think that, on reflection, the hon. Gentleman will feel that he has made a sensible suggestion.

The hon. Gentleman will not be doing anybody in Scotland any good if he backs a solution that is worse for Ravenscraig. He ought to think carefully, as I have, about what is best for Ravenscraig.

Mrs. Gwyneth Dunwoody (Crewe and Nantwich): Is not the truly outrageous aspect of the Secretary of State's behaviour the fact that he deliberately sought to pre-empt the conclusions of a Select Committee? He rushed out his response not because of any suddenly realised need for courtesy, but because he was horrified at the conclusions that he thought that the Select Committee had reached. Has not he undermined the whole system of Select Committees?

Mr. Younger: I suspect that the hon. Lady has not studied the history of the Select Committee on Scottish Affairs. I note that the hon. Lady thinks that, when a proposition has been put to a Minister on 21 October, a response on 18 December has been "rushed out". I do not think that that would carry much conviction among Scottish Members.

Mr. Frank Field (Birkenhead): Are the two arguments that the Secretary of State has put to the House—the importance of competitive pricing and the need to pay attention to the preference of customers—identical to the arguments that he is deploying in his discussions with the Secretary of State for Defence over the placing of the next batch of SSK submarines?

Mr. Younger: There is no conflict between those two views. I have been concentrating this morning on trying to get the best deal for the British steel industry. All hon. Members should carefully study with open minds the evidence that I have published and put in the Library.

Against all that evidence, they should ask which course is the best for the Scottish steel industry and will give the best prospects for Ravenscraig. If hon. Members look at the evidence with that question in mind, I think that they will come to a different conclusion from the one that they hold at present.

Homelessness (London)

Question again proposed, That this House do now adjourn.

Mr. Speaker: We now return to the Adjournment debate. I say to the hon. Member for Newham, North-West (Mr. Banks) that the best thing would be for him to continue his Adjournment debate until just before noon, which will enable the hon. Member for Chipping Barnet (Mr. Chapman) to have one minute extra.

11.29 am

Mr. Tony Banks (Newham, North-West): I hear what you say, Mr. Speaker. The exchanges that we have just heard are very important. However, it is regrettable that the Government did not choose to find a somewhat more convenient time to make that statement, more convenient for Back-Bench Members who have matters to raise and for Scottish Members, many of whom will already have returned to their constituencies.

At least the Minister whom the Government have chosen to make their apologies for the homelessness in London is in the form of the Parliamentary Under-Secretary of State for the Environment, rather than the chairman of the Conservative party, the Chingford boot boy who unfortunately reduced to the level of the gutter what should have been a good debate last Wednesday on the problems of the inner cities.

In a supposedly civilised society, it should be unacceptable that anyone who so desires should be without a roof over his or her head, but within a few yards of the House may be found hundreds of people — men and women, young and old—who are sleeping rough on the streets. The Greater London council has just received an interim report by Professor John Greve of Leeds university on homelessness in London. He previously reported in 1970 and he now finds that the level of reported homelessness in London is up by 700 per cent. since then. Professor Greve's report, with others that came from the Duke of Edinburgh and the Archbishop of Canterbury's commission, show that there is incontrovertible proof of the social crisis that is facing inner cities.

Instead of approaching this problem with the same urgency that sent a task force steaming towards the Falklands, the Government have sought to rubbish all the evidence. If we believe the Government, the Duke of Edinburgh has become a Marxist, the Church of England has become the Kremlin at prayer and recent inner city riots are just isolated incidents of hooliganism. Perhaps the Government think that they can contain the growing problem by recruiting more policemen and giving them plastic bullets, clubs and water cannon. Such a response would simply add blind stupidity to the criminal negligence of which the Government are already guilty in their policies towards inner cities.

London this year has reached the depressing record of more than 27,000 households accepted by the boroughs as being homeless. That is only part of the problem. There are also over 20,000 single homeless in unsatisfactory accommodation or sleeping rough.

Hon. Members will shortly be departing for Christmas, no doubt a merry one. However, I hope that they will spend some time during the season of good will and festivity thinking of the poverty and degradation facing so many of our citizens in London and elsewhere. The lucky ones will go to bed and breakfast or temporary accommodation, where two thirds of the homeless accepted by councils end up. However, I doubt whether any Member of Parliament would consider himself or herself to be lucky in such accommodation. Conditions in bed and breakfast accommodation for the most part are squalid and overcrowded. Fire regulations are often flouted and many mothers and children suffer from ill health and severe social stress brought on by living in such appalling circumstances. The stable in Bethlehem would have offered more pleasant accommodation than many mothers and children will enjoy this Christmas.

The cost to the state of bed and breakfast accommodation is formidable. In his interim report, Professor Greve concluded that, far from representing an economical way to deal with the problem, the use of bed and breakfast hotels for homeless families is financial and economic madness. In London, the GLC figures show that the financial cost to local authorities alone of subsidising this type of accommodation for the homeless exceeded £12·5 million in 1984-85. It is estimated that this could rise to £16 million in the present financial year. However, this expenditure represents only a fraction of the financial cost to the state imposed by the use of this type of accommodation. In addition to local authority spending, huge costs are borne by central Government. Through DHSS board and lodging allowances the Government are acting on that not by building more council houses or providing more accommodation but by harassing the homeless in bed and breakfast accommodation.

In his report, Professor Greve compares the cost of housing families in bed and breakfast hotels with that of building new homes and flats for the families concerned. Taking into account only the estimated DHSS board and lodging costs, he shows that the average annual cost of keeping a couple with two children in bed and breakfast accommodation is over £13,000 compared with only £7,600 for building the family concerned a suitably sized council flat or house. That is how ludicrous the situation is becoming. If one takes into account the other costs, to the local authority and to the families themselves, Professor Greve concludes that these "reinforce the financial case for giving priority to housing as against bed and breakfast accommodation . . . the social case for doing so is overwhelming."

It might be overwhelming to all sensible people, but that excludes the Government. Their economic and social policies are taking the country towards the status of a banana republic, or, as Prince Charles pointed out, a fourth-rate country. Perhaps the Government think that he too has been recruited into the Militant Tendency.

Yesterday, in a written parliamentary answer, the Secretary of State for the Environment announced the housing capital allocation for 1986-87. I have not had a chance to study it in great depth, but as far as I can see, far from increasing the allocation to reduce homelessness, the national housing improvement figure is cut by 13 per cent. in real terms over 1985-86. The London HIP allocation for 1986-87 is £430 million, a heavy cut from the £483 million allocated in 1985-86. When the Conservative Government came into office in 1979, the HIP allocation for London was £1,563 million, but next year it will be only £430 million. That is a reduction of 72 per cent.

I know that the Government's philosophy is that problems are not solved by throwing money at them, but I should like the Minister to explain how one solves London's housing crisis by a 72 per cent. reduction in HIP allowances since the Government were elected.

The Minister may say that local authorities have lots of vacant property that they could use to house the homeless. However, in London most vacancies come about because the dwelling is not fit to live in and is undergoing repair or improvement. One of the boroughs with the most empty property is the borough that the Government like to praise as a fine example. In Wandsworth, 2,000 council houses are being kept empty because the authority is trying to sell them off. The Minister may say that authorities have capital receipts, but in inner London the capital receipts are simply not there. They are accumulating in outer London areas where the problem of homelessness is not so desperate. The Government should recognise this in the HIP allocation.

The Minister cannot deny that homelessness has increased dramatically throughout the Government's period of office. I am happy to give way if the Minister wishes to deny that, but he cannot and he remains in his place. On this occasion, I do not blame him. Throughout their term of office, the Government have enforced repeated and vicious cuts on local authority housebuilding and repairing programmes. Since 1979, the amount that councils are allowed to spend on housing has been cut by over 60 per cent. Largely as a result of this policy, the Government have also presided over an increase in recorded homelessness of 70 per cent. in London and nearly 50 per cent. nationally.

The social cuts should be obvious to even the nastiest of Tory Members — I accept that the Parliamentary Under-Secretary does not fall into that category. Perhaps the economic argument is not so apparent. The Government say that it costs £6,500 to keep each unemployed person on the dole, in terms of benefits paid and revenue lost. There are 400,000 unemployed construction workers on the dole, which shows that a major housebuilding programme to tackle the housing crisis would save £2,600 million. That money is at present going down the drain to keep 400,000 construction workers on the dole. What is it, apart from an ideological hatred of the public sector, which prevents the Government from ending what is essentially a man-made scandal—homelessness?

The Minister knows my borough of Newham fairly well. He has visited it several times. We are obliged to him for that. I even offered him accommodation in one of our 110 tower blocks, but he has not taken up the offer yet. I would like to think that, when he replies, he will give the Christmas message that I would like to take back to Newham, which is that we can look forward to partnership status in 1986.

In Newham, the number of priority need clients seen by the homeless persons unit increased from 972 in 1982 to an estimated 1,680 in 1985, and Newham is by no means the worst of the London boroughs for homelessness. Those figures exlude all of the non-priority groups, most of whom are people over pensionable age, single people and childless couples. I can give a dramatic demonstration of how bad things have become in Newham. In 1981, the average nightly placement in bed and breakfast was just 1·6 people but it is estimated to have increased to 71·4 a night in 1985. The cost of bed and breakfast to the borough of Newham during the same period has risen from £9,000 in 1981-82 to an estimated £550,000 in 1985-86.

The Minster knows the borough, but how does he think that we can manage with such problems, which are also mirrored in the adjoining boroughs of Tower Hamlets and Hackney? Those three represent the first, second and third most deprived local authority areas in England on the basis of the Department of the Environment's statistics. That is a terrible treble which the East End can well do without.

I can imagine Tory Members asking why people do not go into the private sector and buy a home. I must tell them that 75 per cent. of Newham's priority applicants for housing are on supplementary benefit. This year, we have for the first time exceeded 40,000 people in the borough on supplementary benefit. I find it peculiarly obscene that the same Prime Minister whose economic and social policies keep so many of my constituents homeless or on the dole can afford to spend £400,000 on a neo-Georgian bunker in Dulwich.

The scandal of London's homeless is getting worse and is directly attributable to Government cuts in housing investment. As the right hon. Member for Leeds, North-East (Sir K. Joseph) said in a flash of inspiration, the poor are poor because they lack money. It can equally be said that the homeless have nowhere to live because there are not enough decent homes to go around at prices which the people who need them can afford. The homeless cannot rely on the private sector because their incomes are too low.

What will the Government do to stem the rising tide of homelessness? Why have they decided not to amend the Housing (Homeless Persons) Act 1977 to give all homeless people the right to a home? How will the Government change their methods of distributing housing capital allocations to take more account of the plight of the homeless in the inner city? Who will take on the role of co-ordinating provision for the single homeless in London when the GLC has gone, given that the boroughs' grant scheme at Richmond will deal essentially with the financial business of distributing grants? Do the Government contest the assertion of many that it is cheaper to build a new council house than to keep a homeless family in unsatisfactory bed and breakfast hotels? If not, why do they not act with more financial prudence and protect the ratepayer by allowing councils to spend more on housing investment?

The Government have failed in many areas of social policy, but nowhere has the failure been more profound than in the provision of housing for the homeless. Why has homelessness in London and elsewhere increased so dramatically during the Government's two terms of office? Does the Minister know? More important for the homeless, does he care?

In view of the plight of the homeless in London and the poverty and degradation that we see around us in the inner cities, no member of the Government deserves to have a happy Christmas this year. You do, Mr. Deputy Speaker, but I cannot wish the Minister the same.

The Parliamentary Under-Secretary of State for the Environment (Sir George Young): The House is grateful to the hon. Member for Newham, North-West (Mr. Banks) for giving us this opportunity to debate the increase in homelessness. He started by saying that last week's debate on the inner cities ended in chaos because of my right hon. Friend the Member for Chingford (Mr. Tebbit), the Chairman of the Conservative party. If he had been allowed to make his speech, the House would have been a lot wiser than it was.

The hon. Gentleman is right in saying that the numbers of homeless people are increasing. I think that he will find that they went up under Labour as well. From July 1984 to June 1985, the London boroughs accepted 25,900 households as homeless as compared with 24,280 during the previous year. However, nearly two thirds of them were accommodated in permanent lettings, and others were accommodated in hostels and short-life accommodation. At any one time, there were 2,500 households in bed and breakfast accommodation.

Of course we are worried by the numbers being put in such accommodation as it is unsatisfactory and expensive, especially for families. We have made it quite clear that it should be used only as a last resort. I was pleased to see that my own borough of Ealing has managed to reduce the number of people that it has placed in bed and breakfast accommodation. I do not find the economic argument anything like as powerful as the argument that such accommodation is unacceptable for families. We have made it quite clear to local authorities in our code of practice that such accommodation should be used only as a last resort.

The hon. Gentleman was a little carried away when he said that the increase was "directly attributable" to the Government. If we are honest, we will admit that the rise in homelessness has something to do with some significant social changes, such as the greater incidence of marital breakdown. The figures show that 20 per cent. of those who are accepted as homeless in England became homeless simply because of problems arising from marital breakdown. I do not know whether the hon. Gentleman will blame the Government for that, but I think that he would be pushing his case a little too far to try. There are other social reasons. For example, young people are leaving home far earlier and in far greater numbers than they used to. That is social change independent of Government and one of the factors responsible for the increase.

It is also legitimate to consider the other side of the equation — the role of local authorities in coping. Between 1980 and 1985, local authorities in London let homes to about 50,000 homeless families. The number of lettings to homeless families has increased under this Government from 12,700 in 1980 to just over 16,000 in 1985. The Government already allocate a substantial borrowing power to local authorities to enable them to make the necessary adjustments to their housing stock, and we allow them to supplement that with capital receipts. The figures of allocations that the hon. Gentleman quoted conveniently excluded the capital receipts available to local authorities.

Mr. Banks rose——

Sir George Young: I shall not give way, partly because I know what the hon. Gentleman will say and partly because time will not permit me.

Local authorities can compliment their allocations by 20 per cent. of the capital receipts that have accumulated during the past few years. Next year, the London boroughs will be permitted to borrow £430 million for capital expenditure on housing.

[Sir George Young]

The hon. Gentleman asked what we were doing about homelessness when allocating resources. Of course, homelessness is one factor and we have recently given it increased weight. For next year we have changed the basis of the homeless indicator from lettings to the homeless to households accepted as homeless. That widening of the indicator means that the number of people placed in bed and breakfast accommodation will have a greater influence on authorities' allocations.

Between 1979 and 1984, local authorities and housing associations in London produced nearly 72,000 new homes, and the private sector nearly 29,000—giving a total of 101,000 new homes. At the same time, the population of London declined by about 100,000, so the overall supply and demand equation is, on the face of it, improving.

The hon. Gentleman dismissed rather peremptorily the fact that in London there are some 30,000 empty public sector dwellings, of which 10,000 have been empty for more than a year. Quite frankly, that is an affront to the homeless. In times of necessary financial constraint, we must try very hard to make the best possible use of existing resources, and returning those vacant dwellings to use must be a top priority.

Mr. Simon Hughes (Southwark and Bermondsey): If the Minister gave the comparable figures for empty property in the private sector in London, including property that has been empty for more than a year, he would realise that the figure was considerably greater than for public sector property.

Sir George Young: The figures are available, although I think that they go back some time because there has not been a recent survey. It is public knowledge, but I do not have the figure in my folder. The public sector, both central and local government, have a responsibility because the assets are provided by the taxpayer. We do not have a comparable responsibility for assets in private ownership.

On July 10 we issued a circular to all authorities setting out ways in which better management could reduce the number of empty dwellings and recommending a greater use of short-life schemes and temporary lettings. We have also relaxed the housing association grant regime and have established an urban housing renewal unit that is already active in promoting a number of measures to use empty properties and to revitalise some of the run-down estates.

The problem of rent arrears has a role. At the end of the financial year 1984-85, the GLC and the London boroughs between them were owed rent arrears approaching £92 million. That is deplorable and means the loss of valuable resources that could otherwise be devoted to easing the problems of homelessness.

On the question of mobility, some local authorities have difficulties because they have insufficient accommodation in their own boroughs. We attach great importance to mobility schemes to iron out those imbalances. Those schemes enable the local authorities to respond more flexibly to the accommodation needs of the homeless. However, some boroughs do not take up all the lettings afforded to them. We have established the Greater London mobility scheme, but it is not fully subscribed despite a reduction in quotas this year.

The Government have also put £3 million to one side for the London borough of Camden for the purpose of funding housing association developments in the north-west boroughs to help those boroughs in that part of London which do not have housing stock of their own. All the nomination rights for that go to the inter-borough nomination scheme.

The hon. Gentleman mentioned the single homeless. We must have a sense of priority here, and that must mean that families rather than single people should come at the top of the list. That said, we have been trying to help the single homeless in special need. We are funding the provision of small modern hostels and other forms of shared housing. Most of those are for the single homeless, including the elderly, but other groups with special needs merit that also, including ex-offenders, former psychiatric patients, the mentally handicapped, ex-alcoholics, battered wives and the disabled.

Since May 1979, the Housing Corporation has approved schemes nationally for more than 13,000 people in that type of accommodation. We want to help the voluntary sector, and in 1986-87 we shall increase to £500,000 grants to voluntary bodies concerned with homelessness. That is intended to assist the provision of advice that helps to make better use of existing accommodation, to reduce evictions for rent arrears and to ensure that homeless people receive their rights under the Act. Under those provisions, I have today approved a grant to the Bayswater Hotel Homelessness Project, which is doing valuable work advising homeless families in that part of London on their housing problems and, in many cases, helping them to find a solution. I hope to meet members of the organising group in the spring to hear more about their work.

My Department produces a wide range of leaflets giving guidance to the public on various aspects of housing. It is generally accepted that spreading knowledge of people's rights in that way is useful. In August, we issued an expanded version of our booklet aimed at helping one-parent families with their housing problems, including homelessness. I am now looking sympathetically at the possibility of producing a general leaflet on homelessness.

At the beginning of my speech, I expressed concern about the increase in the numbers of homeless people placed in bed and breakfast accommodation by local authorities. The hon. Gentleman rightly said that standards in some of that accommodation were most unsatisfactory. My right hon. Friend the Secretary of State is consulting local authorities and other interested bodies about a draft circular memorandum that will draw the attention of local authorities to the already wide-ranging powers that they have for securing improved conditions in bed and breakfast hotels and other houses in multiple occupation. —[Interruption.] The hon Member for Holborn and St. Pancras is muttering continuously throughout my remarks.

Mr. Frank Dobson (Holborn and St. Pancras) rose——

Sir George Young: In the spirit of Christmas I give way to the hon. Gentleman, in the hope that that will keep him quiet for the remaining few minutes in which I have to speak.

Mr. Dobson: Why have the Government consistently resisted all measures to strengthen the law to improve safety conditions for people living in houses in multiple occupation?

Sir George Young: If the hon. Gentleman examines the record, he will find that that is not the case. We have taken a number of measures to improve safety standards for those living in HMOs — houses in multiple occupation — and I shall write to the hon. Gentleman what will have to be a long letter outlining the steps that we have taken. He might prefer to confine his interventions to the field for which he has shadow ministerial responsibility.

Mr. Tony Banks rose——

Sir George Young: I am hoping to answer some of the questions that the hon. Member for Newham, North-West put to me towards the end of his remarks. I promise to give way to him later if there is time.

He asked what the reasons were for homelessness and why the numbers were increasing. That was a relevant question because the underlying reasons are complicated. We are pressing ahead with a substantial programme of research into various aspects of homelessness costing about £600,000. That will shed light on factors influencing homelessness, on the standards in houses in multiple occupation and on the way in which local authorities operate the Housing (Homeless Persons) Act 1977, including their use of bed and breakfast accommodation.

The hon. Member for Newham, North-West also asked if we were contemplating any other measures. We have had discussions with SHACK, CHAR and other interested bodies and we are considering a number of measures which might help to relieve the problem of homelessness. They cover, among other things, further ways of improving the utilisation of the existing public and private sector stock; possible improvements in the ways in which homelessness is reflected in the arrangements for allocating housing resources; and further steps to encourage local authorities to concentrate their provision on those who are in greatest need. Those results will emerge in due course.

Mr. Tony Banks: I am interested to learn that there is to be another study of the problem. Does the Minister accept that the report by Professor Greve, which is due out early next year, will provide an excellent basis for the Department's investigations? The hon. Gentleman will be aware that the report is being paid for by the GLC.

As the hon. Member for Southwark and Bermondsey (Mr. Hughes) pointed out, there is a great deal of vacant accommodation in the private sector. Why will his Department not allow local authorities to move in with compulsory purchase orders to take up some of that accommodation? In my borough of Newham we are desperately short of four-bedroom accommodation, although a large amount of it is available in empty private sector stock. We should like to be able to take that up by way of compulsory purchase Can the hon. Gentlman offer any help?

Sir George Young: There is scope for the private sector to do more. We have tried to encourage private householders to let their properties by the introduction in the Housing Act 1980 of shorthold provisions which guarantee them repossession at the end of a fixed term; we have given local authority tenants the right to sublet; and, as I explained, the initiatives that we are considering include a further look at the private sector. My Department welcomes any research that sheds light on this problem and indicates the way ahead, and we shall consider the final conclusions of the Greve report when it is available.

The hon. Member for Newham, North-West asked why in yesterday's announcement there was an apparent reduction in resources available to London. The reason is simple. In setting the allocation total, we had to take account, first, of the need to bring expenditure into line with provision. The headroom built in in previous years had not been enough, with the result that there had been a substantial overspend. Secondly, and more importantly, local authorities can use their capital receipts, which have gone up in the last year. Simply holding the percentage constant to 20 per cent. gives them access to increased spending power from those receipts. Local authorities are getting access to other opportunities for capital expenditure.

The hon. Gentleman poured scorn on what Wandsworth is doing, when it is making faster progress in tackling its housing problems by being prepared to have a partnership with the private sector. It is turning round difficult-to-let estates that many council tenants would not accept. It is converting the aptly named Livingstone estate in Wandsworth in partnership with the private sector. In the main, the purchasers of the flats are Wandsworth tenants or those on the waiting lists. It is making real progress in tackling its problems by this partnership. Far from deploring it, Labour Members should be welcoming it with open arms and persuading their local authorities to do even more in this direction.

12 noon

Mr. Sydney Chapman (Chipping Barnet): I am grateful to have this opportunity of raising the wider issue of urban regeneration, which in a sense, but only partly, is a continuation of the previous Adjournment debate. I like to think that it is an extension of the more fruitful part of the debate that took place nine days ago, on 11 December.

I am pleased that the Under-Secretary of State for the Environment, my hon. Friend the Member for Ealing, Acton (Sir G. Young), will reply to this short debate. His long ministerial experience covers six years and he was at one time a councillor in an inner London borough and a chairman of a housing association. Both those qualifications will be helpful to him in this debate.

There is no doubt that there is a need for massive additional investment in urban regeneration, and it is important to mention that we are talking not only about our inner cities. The need for urban regeneration extends to most parts of our urban areas. I am told that 77 per cent. of us live in urban areas. Incidentally, over one third of us live in the large conurbations which occupy only 6 per cent. of the land area that we call the United Kingdom. In other words, we are a closely knit community.

We all have our own views about the state of the fabric of the nation and the nation's housing stock, but I suspect that most politicians are uneasy about the low level of investment in our infrastructure. As my hon. Friend knows, there has been a spate of reports recently, including one from his Department's urban housing renewal unit, which estimated that £18·8 billion needs to be spent to maintain the public sector side of housing alone. I am told that if the private sector is included, there is a need for a global £45,000 million to be spent. There has been the Duke of Edinburgh's inquiry into housing and the Archbishop of Canterbury's Church of England report entitled "Faith in the City".

It is self-evident that there is not the remotest chance of adequate public funds becoming available to tackle such a mammoth task on the scale that is necessary for urban regeneration. I happen to think that that is so under the present Government or another one, or even if there is a change of Government direction. If anyone doubts that, I commend to him the excellent article written by my hon. Friend the Member for Horsham (Sir P. Hordern) that appeared in the Daily Telegraph of 10 December.

We must encourage more private investment; that is the key to meeting more but not all of our housing needs. Eighteen months ago the Select Committee on the Environment reported on green belts and land for housing. I think that I can summarise it in shorthand without distorting what the Committee said. In effect, it stated that green belts have a broad and positive role, that of open spaces whose presumption against development can better shape urban areas; green belts were conceived originally as a way of containing growth and have become essential in dealing with the problems of urban decline; green belts should now assist urban regeneration. Basically, that is the guts of one part of the Select Committee's report. I agree with it, if only, but not only, because I was a member of the Committee and I am the president of the London Green Belt Council.

It will be prudent for me to declare interests at this stage. I am a non-practising architect, a non-practising town and country planner and a non-executive director of a development company and construction company.

We need a partnership if we are to realise the goal of urban regeneration. The public sector has the authority and, I think, the public acceptance. It has the contact with communities and can identify the social needs of a particular area. It often owns the land that needs to be redeveloped. The private sector has the access to finance, the development experience and the skills and expertise needed to assemble parcels of land and undertake construction. There is a need for a comprehensive new approach. We must encourage a massive financial input by the building societies, the banks which are now in the mortgage market, and, not least, the pension funds, which have considerable assets.

We have seen what can be done. That may have been an exceptional experience, but I draw the attention of the House again to the success of the London Docklands development corporation, which has already attracted £1 billion of private investment. I am told that every £1 of public money invested has attracted more than £5 of private investment. About 2,700 houses have been completed; 5,000 houses are under construction; and 4,700 jobs have been created. About 1,500 people at any one time are employed on the construction works.

Another good example of what can be done is the Baltimore inner harbour scheme, across the Atlantic, which occurred before the LDDC's projects. That was the greatest single programme of urban regeneration ever undertaken.

The trick is to turn derelict or under-used sites with negative market values into positive developments that will show a reasonable rate of return and attract money. The problem is that, although successful schemes can attract four times or more as much private investment as the amount committed by the public, the initial ratio of funding required is 3 : 1 the other way around. The Government must therefore encourage this necessary partnership.

I acknowledge that the Government have taken and are taking certain initiatives. A legislative framework is being built up. The Building Societies Bill, which will make it possible to use the assets of building societies for urban regeneration on a much larger scale; the concept of urban development corporations; enterprise zones and the impending housing and planning legislation, which will bring about simplified planning zones, are part of the legislative jigsaw. The urban programme, which has been substantially increased and is running at about £338 million, the urban development grants of £77 million—a more modest figure—which have attracted £340 million of private money and the derelict land grants are playing their part. I agree with my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State that the grant schemes seem to achieve the most effective results.

I should like to offer some suggestions to my hon. Friend the Under-Secretary of State. First, because of the success of the LDDC and the Merseyside development corporation, the Government should seriously consider creating more urban development corporations. I understand the difficulties, but I believe that parcels of land could be assembled in some of the other major conurbations where relatively few people live and where comprehensive development of this new type could be better managed by a special agency. The phrase "urban development corporation" is not particularly attractive. I prefer the acronym SPA, or special priority area.

Secondly, there is a need for a new form of national agency to tackle the massive cost of urban regeneration. I do not know whether it should be called a national urban task force or a national urban renewal agency, but we need to draw together people from industry, Government and local authorities who have an expert knowledge of industry and administrative ability. They are the type of people who served on the new town corporations.

That national agency could set up a programme of work and monitor it, and be a catalyst for ideas and experience. There is a case for setting up urban development trusts in selected areas to attract the private finance needed. They could put the money to work to create viable schemes.

There is a need for a rearrangement of finances. There is not so much a need for significantly more public funding for urban regeneration as a need to redirect the money. Urban development grants should not go to the local authorities which in any case have to provide 25 per cent. of the finance needed, but should be redirected to the developers.

I refer my hon. Friend to paragraph 79 of the Select Committee report:

"Short-term public service public sector savings are hindering the creation of the sustained thrust for redevelopment that characterises the success of the LDDC. The Secretary of State accepted that the money that would have gone on those schemes is used inevitably in ways that pressurise vacant land and Green Belt land. The absurdity is that to save the public sector £90 million of expenditure over the whole country, over half a billion pounds of private money is pushed away from urban areas, to intensify pressure on agricultural land. Of course there is a considerable prospect that if Derelict Land Grant were demand-led huge spending might result. However, these grants do not meet the whole cost of schemes, only local authorities' shares of about one seventh. Their operation should be determined by the willingness of the private sector to put up money, and not by cash limits. A major opportunity to promote urban infrastructure and regeneration is being squandered."

I refer my hon. Friend also to paragraphs 64 and 66 of the report. The vexing but real problems should not be used as an excuse for inaction. Difficulties, for example, in producing title due to previous inefficient conveyancing should be and could be dealt with

"by statutorily guaranteed absolute title if necessary."

The Secretary of State should use his reserve powers more regularly to order the disposal of unused land held by local authorities, statutory undertakers and nationalised industries. I know that some progress has been made since the report was published.

This is an opportune time for a major urban regeneration initative. It is clear that the construction and development industries are ready, able and willing to take part. To realise that, one has only to read the recent speeches of the president of the Chartered Institute of Building, Mr. Norman Wakefield, who was last year's chairman of the national contractors group of the Building Employers Confederation. The Chartered Institute of Building and the Building Employers Confederation have taken significant initiatives. The Phoenix Partnership has been set up by the building material producers and there is also the Urban Investment Review Group which is chaired by Mr. Tim Melvill Ross. To show that initiatives are being taken by other parts of the construction industry I should like to quote part of the leader in the current issue of the Chartered Surveyor Weekly written by the editor, Mr. Michael Hanson. It is the journal of the Royal Institution of Chartered Surveyors. It states:

"The British Property Federation's working party on urban renewal under the chairmanship of Gerald Powell" is one other initiative.

"This is on the point of identifying an actual inner-city site of about 20 acres (not in Liverpool or London) where a hypothetical redevelopment, mixing residential and commercial, can be shown to bring real benefits to the local community.

The Housebuilders Federation is going further, by embarking on an eight-month tour of Britain's worst inner-city areas, after which it will produce its own White Paper of proposals.

These will differ from the recent report of the Archbishop of Canterbury's working party on inner-city deprivation by producing hard evidence and practical solutions, duly costed.

Clearly, not all Britain's housing needs can be solved by building in the inner cities, but it might be a step in the right direction if the inner cities are regenerated before too much more countryside is laid waste".

We need to harness and channel all those initiatives. It is a matter of the attitude and will of the Government at national and local level. Of course there are difficulties and problems, but I believe that they can be sorted out. I remind my hon. Friend the Under-Secretary that some of our inner-city areas are a disgrace to a nation that calls itself civilised. There is a tremendous challenge. We have a last opportunity to save our inner cities from going into terminal decline. I am told that the Cabinet discussed the need for new initiatives in urban regeneration at its meeting yesterday. I know that my hon. Friend was not present at that meeting, because he is not yet a member of the Cabinet. However, I hope that he will be able to reply to the debate in the positive spirit that is his hallmark.

The Parliamentary Under-Secretary of State for the Environment (Sir George Young): My hon. Friend the Member for Chipping Barnet (Mr. Chapman) is better informed about what happened in the Cabinet than I am. I can shed no light on what was discussed yesterday.

My hon. Friend is right to say that there is a real challenge to the Government. A growing number of professional bodies, trade associations and construction companies are interested in the inner cities. They are producing new ways of tackling the problem. They have made it clear that they are prepared to invest their own resources and manpower in partnership with the Government. Over the past few months we have read many reports and had many approaches, some of which my hon. Friend mentioned. It is now up to the Department of the Environment and the Government to respond and harness that enthusiasm and build a fresh approach to the inner cities in a spirit of partnership.

It is common ground, certainly between my hon. Friend the Member for Chipping Barnet and myself, that the traditional public sector approach is unlikely to work and, in any case, would be fiendishly expensive. To some extent, we are currently suffering from the public sector oriented approach in our inner cities. We must make the resources available to tackle those problems. Central and local government must have a much closer relationship, be prepared to understand the issues as they are seen by the private sector and recognise that the private sector is not a loss-making social agency. It has a responsibility to shareholders and we must reconcile its interests with our interests as administrators and parliamentarians.

Only yesterday the House approved, without a Division, the Building Societies Bill that was mentioned by my hon. Friend. That will unlock the substantial resources of the building societies, in a way that is not possible at the moment, to tackle some of the problems of dereliction and decay. My hon. Friend is well placed to address himself to the subject. He is a member of the Select Committee. He has exhibited great interest and he represents a London constituency with the green belt on its northern boundary, but not too far to the south he is exposed to some of the pressures of the inner cities.

My hon. Friend mentioned the London Docklands development corporation and made a powerful case for extending such corporations and setting up similar bodies in other parts of the country. The legislative framework exists and I shall draw his suggestions to the attention of my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State. He also made a more radical suggestion for a national renewal agency, which I suspect will involve primary legislation. That is something that we will have to look at carefully.

My hon. Friend's theme was partnership. He mentioned the gearing that we have secured in the LDDC. Last week it broke the £1 billion landmark for private investment attracted to its area. As he said, every £1 of public money spent in the docklands has drawn in nearly £6 of private investment.

The level of owner-occupation in docklands has risen from 5·3 per cent. in 1981 to 15·7 per cent., but, encouragingly, nearly half of all occupiers of the new homes were previously residents of the three docklands boroughs of Tower Hamlets, Newham and Southwark. Many new jobs have been created in the LDDC area. We shall look closely at ways in which we can apply the lessons learnt from the urban development corporations elsewhere.

Another element in my hon. Friend's theme of partnership was the derelict land grant. One of our priorities, as he rightly said, is to bring disused or under-used tracts of urban land into better use. That is a key priority of the derelict land programme. We have increased its budget from £23 million in 1979 to £82 million this year. We have concentrated it on recycling land and on schemes that lead to development and private sector investment. Derelict land grant can be paid direct to the private sector to enable it to reclaim sites for its own use. Earlier this year we approved the largest ever private sector reclamation scheme costing £1·4 million and covering no less than 90 acres of the Normanby park steelworks in Scunthorpe. The site will be developed by Pipe and Rail Limited for several manufacturing activities.

My hon. Friend referred to land registers. It is common ground between us that far too much public sector land is lying idle in the inner cities. There are often exciting opportunities for new investment or housing development, but we cannot achieve that unless the land is made available. My right hon. Friend the Secretary of State is making increased use of his power under the land registry system to require public sector owners to dispose of unused land. Twenty-one directions were issued on 19 November requiring the disposal of 139 acres. Speaking from memory, I think that one of those directions was in my hon. Friend's borough, although I think that it was in the Prime Minister's constituency rather than his own. We are looking actively at more directions and are determined to get a big momentum behind the scheme. In all, over 10,000 acres have been taken off the register by being sold or brought into use since October 1984.

My hon. Friend mentioned urban development grant and suggested that, instead of having to go through the local authorities, we should introduce a new power enabling us to give grant direct. We shall want to look at that. Urban development grant has made a substantial impact. In England as a whole, by the end of last month, we had approved over 165 UDG schemes. They involve grant offers of £74 million, bringing in their wake private sector investment of £325 million. About £60 million of the approved grants will enable industrial and commercial projects creating 16,000 jobs to go ahead. The remainder is being concentrated on housing development, leading to the provision of nearly 4,000 homes.

Let me give a London example of the success of the UDG. I refer my hon. Friend to last Thursday's edition of The London Standard, which contained a profile of the Royal Agricultural Hall. The report reflected on the astonishing variety of uses to which the hall had been put in the past,

"the entertainment ranging from the Grand Ball of 1869, when 5,000 guests waltzed beneath the chandeliers and 4,000 gas jets, to Ubini's Original Exhibition of Performing Fleas — the wonders of minute creation."

We are restoring the hall with £2·8 million of urban development grant, although not necessarily for that historical use. The scheme involves the refurbishment and conversion of the hall into an international business design and exhibition centre. That transformation of a building that has been run down over decades will contribute significantly to the regneration of that part of London.

My hon. Friend referred to enterprise zones. Some areas have suffered from particularly serious decline over a prolonged period. It was to help those areas that we designated the first enterprise zones in 1981. Since then, further zones have been designated and there are now 25 in the United Kingdom. They are a success. The number of jobs in the zones has increased dramatically and the areas concerned, which have been in decline for so long, have been given a new lease of life.

My hon. Friend touched on housing. The Government are committed to strengthening housing choice and promoting opportunities for low-cost home ownership in our cities.

Earlier this year we set up the urban housing renewal unit, which encourages local authorities to improve the management of their stock, to involve tenants in plans for the future of their estates, and to develop management systems, which are more responsive to their needs. It is also exploring private sector solutions to some of the more problematic housing estates, and improving the standard of housing education by funding 15 part-time graduate studentships at the London School of Economics housing management centre.

Among the initiatives that the unit hopes to develop is an extension of the community refurbishment schemes, which were successfully piloted on Merseyside. They involve local people who have been out of work for more than a year refurbishing their estates, and, in some cases, rebuilding their homes. The unit has an urgent programme of visits and meetings with the authorities with the most severe housing problems. It will be an important part of its job to transfer such successful experiments to areas which have not previously considered them.

My hon. Friend mentioned the urban programme, and was kind enough to say that we have increased substantially the resources available to it. They have increased from £93 million in 1978-79 to £338 million, which is a reflection of our commitment to the regeneration of our inner cities. It is an example of how central Government and local government can work effectively together. Much is made of the friction in the relationship between the two. Indeed, the report of the Archbishop's commission on urban priority areas claimed that there "is a regrettable lack of will on the part of Central Government to support local government and to devote adequate resources to Urban Priority Areas."

We have put fresh impetus behind the urban programme. Under it, some 12,000 projects are being supported, all of which have been submitted for ministerial approval by local authorities. Since 1978-79, more than £1·9 million has been allocated in support of local authorities' programmes of urban renewal. We have sought to concentrate resources on the worst areas, and have worked with local authorities, with some of whom we have political differences, to ensure that maximum value for money is obtained.

It is sometimes suggested that the increases have been more than offset by cuts in the rate support grant. We make no secret of the fact that there has been a change in the relative contributions of central and local government towards the financing of local authority expenditure. The Government's share has been reduced for every local authority to strengthen local accountability and the financial responsibility of those who manage local authority expenditure programmes. There has been no shift in the share of rate support grant to the inner cities, and the share of the rate support grant for urban partnership and programme authorities is much the same in percentage terms now as it was in 1979. The expenditure assessments on which rate support grant is based recognise that inner city authorities have higher spending needs than other areas. To use the terms of the grant calculation, their grant-related expenditure assessments are often much higher in relation to given functions than the national average.

I could say a great deal more about the Government's commitment to inner-city areas. The Government remain firmly committed to the notion of the green belt, which is one of my hon. Friend's particular interests. However, it is important to emphasise its positive role, as my hon. Friend did. There is something in the green belt for the inner cities, as resources must be redirected to the inner cities, and developers no longer have the option simply to take the easier solution of greenfield redevelopments. The green belt is a positive aspect to our inner-city approach, and has a role to play in tackling problems.

One small example of our determination to restore hope —and, dare I say, faith—in the inner city is apparent in Brixton during the festive season. I ask hon. Members who travel through Brixton to bear in mind that the excellent illuminations have been provided with support from the urban programme. As I would not wish to spoil our reputation for thrift, I must point out that they were obtained second-hand from Blackpool. On that festive note, may I say that we have had a more constructive 30 minutes on inner cities today than last week when Labour Members howled down my right hon. Friend, the chairman of the Conservative party.

Mr. Deputy Speaker (Mr. Ernest Armstrong): I am grateful to hon. Members, and especially to the Minister, for bringing us back to the timetable.

Housing (Leyton and Leytonstone)

12.29 pm

Mr. Harry Cohen (Leyton): I congratulate the Church of England on its report "Faith in the City". It makes many telling points and draws attention to the growing crisis in our inner cities, caused and much exacerbated by the Government's policies. The report states:

"The combination of unsatisfied needs and unused human abilities seems to us as uneconomic as it is illogical and immoral."

Such sound moral and economic argument, which is relevant to our housing needs and capabilities, as well as to other aspects of life, was met by a bully-boy response from the Government.

The part of the report that especially caught my eye was its identification of urban priority areas, not just in the inner cities but on the fringes of the cities in housing estates. The report says that they present a pressing problem for the mid-1980s. Its recognition of the fringes of cities clearly applies to Leyton, which is classified as outer London, but its housing and many other services mirror the deprivation of the inner city. The main reason why it is not officially recognised as an inner-city area is that it lies in the borough of Waltham Forest which contains in the north the relatively prosperous area of Chingford, although it, too, has pockets of housing problems. The rest of the borough, especially Leyton and Walthamstow, has inner-city problems, and the Government should recognise that in financial terms.

There is a growing housing crisis in Waltham Forest and a severe problem of homelessness. At present, the homeless are almost the only category who can be guaranteed offers of council accommodation. That is done at the expense of those on the waiting list and requiring transfers. But the policy has been adopted because the alternative is the expensive, wasteful, unsatisfactory and unsuitable bed-and-breakfast arrangements. I am informed that even in Waltham Forest the council cannot find accommodation for about 150 homeless families. Although Waltham Forest has avoided using bed-and-breakfast establishments until now, it could be forced to do so in the near future. Even then, there will be no relief for those on the waiting list and awaiting transfers.

With council houses being sold and no replacements being built, there is almost no hope of the overwhelming majority of people on the waiting lists being rehoused,. Many people live in desperate conditions, and have 70, 80 or 90 points, but are getting nowhere in their quest for housing. The young, the newly married and couples with no children have no chance.

The problem is the shortage of decent accommodation. Recently, I received a letter from the council's rehousing supervisor about the case of a Mrs Smith. He wrote:

"In June this year the Housing Panel awarded a very high degree of social need priority to this case and recommended the offer of a three bedroom house . . . The problem of course is the very limited supply of such properties especially now no new properties are being built . . . I am sorry to write in such pessimistic tones when writing about a high priority case but the limited supply of properties is having a drastic effect on the prospects of any transfer case."

The lack of new properties is causing great difficulties for tenants who want transfers. The housing manager was interviewed in the local press earlier this year. He said:

"Because the supply of council homes has dried up . . . there is less opportunity to move within the Council sector, from the tower block estates to more popular properties."

Some tenants who want transfers face a Catch-22 situation. I took up the case of my constituent Mr. Szersynski. He and his girl friend were in the "couples sharing" queue and had 61 points. The housing department wrote to me:

"The present rehousing level within the 'couples sharing' queue is 77 points".

However, the couple are expecting twins, which gives them another 20 points, taking them past 77 points. That seemed to be excellent news, but the letter from the housing department added that when the twins come they will need two bedroomed accommodation and the minimum of points required for that is 110 points. That is a real Catch-22, or perhaps a Catch-110.

Problems have also been caused for my constituents Mrs. Warsap and her 82-year-old parents in Chingford. Their case is reported in today's edition of the Walthamstow Guardian under the headline "Christmas Day Ruined." Mrs. Warsap and her parents want a three or four-bedroom house so that the family can live together. They have offered to swap the two houses that they currently occupy, both of which are in tip-top condition, but that proposal has had to be turned down. Mrs. Warsap told the Walthamstow Guardian:

"When I walk in in the morning mum is often lying helpless and sobbing on the bed . . . For now, Christmas is a very sad time indeed."

That is the sort of difficulty facing people who want transfers.

Not only is there not enough money for building, but there is not enough to repair existing properties. In the interview with the local press earlier this year, the housing manager said:

"We haven't got enough resources to do the basic repairs and improvements to our existing stock. Take our list of repairs so far. We've got a 10 year programme, but some of the things we'll be doing in year 10, we should be doing this year—no doubt about it . . . there is no money to spend on environmental upgrading of estates."

That upgrading includes not only the appearance of estates, which is vital, but the facilities for mothers and children on those estates. Play groups and creches on the Hollydown way and Oliver close estates were started and run by the mothers, but have been denied support because of the lack of resources. If facilities are not provided and the environment of estates is not upgraded, it leads to problems such as those experienced on the Broadwater Farm estate as alienation sets in among the inhabitants.

Improvements in the private sector in my borough have also been curtailed because there has been a block on improvement grants since August 1984. There is growing disrepair in that sector, too.

The problem is one of resources. As the housing manager said in that interview:

"It sounds simplistic to say it's a money-linked problem, but to a large extent it is. Obviously you've got to strive to get the maximum out of what you've got, but all these things just can't be done with the amount of money we're working to."

An additional dimension will exacerbate the housing misery of a large number of my constituents for many years to come unless additional resources are provided by the Government. The M11 link road is to be carved through my constituency. The Government gave an inadequate allocation for rehousing the displaced families. In an act of terrible mismanagement, the local Tory-Liberal council sold off the site which was to be used for building new homes and used the money elsewhere. As a consequence, many more people will be in a housing crisis unless additional money is provided.

In the face of these grim facts and those of 9,300 homes unfit for people to live in, 6,800 without bathrooms or inside toilets, 10,700 in need of urgent renovation, 1,300 overcrowded with more than two people per room, the Government dismiss any need for more to be done and abrogate their responsibility. They have cut Waltham Forest's housing investment allocation — the council received less than one third of what it deemed to be necessary.

It is ironic that the debate is taking place on the day when Tory Members are packing up to go to their comfortable homes in the shires. They should think for a moment how they would feel if they were in my surgery, in which I see family after family in housing discomfort and desperation, and bitterly dissatisfied. My housing caseload is a catalogue of human misery, worry and desperation. How many Tory Members go back to the awful circumstances experienced by my constituents?

How many parents of Tory Members experience conditions like those of Mrs. Harvey and her pensioner friends in my constituency, a case described in the local paper? She lives in a Leyton tower block and hates it. Not only do the lifts not work, but they are filthy and never get cleaned over the weekend because the council does not pay the caretaker overtime. When the lifts do not work there is a long haul up to her 11th floor flat. Mrs. Harvey and her friends dream of having their own front doors and gardens with a bit of green—nothing too fancy—but they realise that they are no longer spring chickens. Mrs. Harvey knows that in a few years she will not be able to climb stairs any more.

How many Tory Members have wives and children trapped on the tops of tower blocks unsuitable for their means, like Mrs. Palfreman and her two children and many others in my constituency? Another example is that of Mrs. Dibley and her large family who live in overcrowded conditions in property too small, dilapidated and inadequate for their living requirements. I have had cases in which teenage daughters and sons have had to share bedrooms or even where mothers are forced to share rooms with teenage sons because of their poor housing circumstances. I bet not many Conservative Members have experience of such housing problems. How can they say that monetarist cuts apply in these circumstances?

Let us compare this housing starkness under the Tories with Labour's alternative. We plan for a big boost in resources, extensive building of new homes and repairs and improvements to existing ones. Priority will be given to providing new homes for rent, a sector in which the need is overwhelming. There will be an enhanced role for local authorities, lifting the present Government restrictions on them, and for housing co-operatives. We shall provide new help for low-income households. That is a proper programme for decent homes, providing many jobs in the process. We need this programme of action for the people of Leyton and Leytonstone. My borough also needs a big boost in its housing investment allocation.

The Tory party should be ashamed when it sees Labour's effective housing alternative. It should be ashamed at its rough-neck reaction to the Church of England report, of its application of monetarist policies to housing and of what that has meant in personal misery to many of my constituents and thousands of others in the country. It should be ashamed of backing the Chancellor. He has applied monetarist policies even to his own father-in-law, who has had to live in impoverished circumstances on state benefit—Victorian values, indeed.

The Parliamentary Under-Secretary of State for the Environment (Sir George Young): The hon. Member for Leyton (Mr. Cohen) threw away what I thought was a good speech with some rather personal attacks at the end, which did not add much strength to his argument. If we are talking about shame, he might care to consider what happened to the housing investment programme under the previous Labour Government. He will find that the major reductions occurred then. There were reductions of some 49 per cent. as compared with 20 per cent. under this Administration. If the hon. Gentleman wants to dish out accusations and invite shame, he might address himself as much to the Opposition Benches as to these.

The hon. Gentleman made a tactical mistake when he implied that there was lack of concern among Conservative Members who represent London constituencies. When I finish the fourth Adjournment debate today, I shall go to my advice bureau in Acton—the second this week—where I shall deal with housing problems, just like the hon. Gentleman. I know that Conservative colleagues who represent London seats are as committed to tackling their constituents' problems as is the hon. Gentleman.

The hon. Gentleman mentioned the M11. The Government have taken on board the implications for local residents of major road improvement schemes. I have had discussions with local councillors about the implications for the council's housing programme of having to accommodate some of the households that will be displaced by the Department of Transport's road scheme. My hon. Friend the Minister of State for Transport has been in touch with the hon. Gentleman about road scheme issues.

Waltham Forest's housing investment programme allocation of £8·270 million for the current year took account of the council's plans to fund a newbuild scheme to assist with the decanting programme. The allocation represented 92·5 per cent. of the council's 1984-85 allocation, when it had been advised to plan on the basis of receiving at least 80 per cent. The hon. Gentleman can be assured that previous HIP allocations had also taken account of the council's plans.

For 1986-87 the council's recently announced allocation of £7·716 million will allow the council to continue with the decanting programme. I understand that development of the Sinnot road site has been delayed, but another site already started at Netley road includes 67 general purpose dwellings to assist in the decant programme. Decisions on the timing to undertake housing schemes are entirely for local authorities, in the light of available resources and local housing needs.

I am satisfied that, within the resources available to London as a whole, housing capital allocations to Waltham Forest borough council have had full regard to local housing needs. I can confirm that special account was taken of the council's plans to develop two newbuild housing schemes to assist with its decanting programme associated with major road schemes in the borough.

The hon. Gentleman said that, to tackle the housing problems in his constituency—I accept that there are housing problems there—there must be increased public expenditure. He set to one side the role of the private sector in helping to tackle such problems. There are now 3 million more owner-occupiers than when we came to office. If it is possible to develop policies that bring owner-occupation within the reach of more people, pressure on local authorities is reduced, and they can concentrate their resources on people for whom owner-occupation is not an option.

The hon. Gentleman should consider the wide range of schemes that we have introduced such as low-cost home ownership and homesteading. He will find that we have taken pressure off local authorities by encouraging people who have traditionally looked to the local authority for a solution of their housing problems to look elsewhere and to adopt a form of tenure which most of them want.

There has been no mortgage famine. Indeed, there has been ready availability, and land has been available for builders. We have been able to bring owner-occupation within the reach of more people. We have encouraged local authorities to have partnership schemes with private developers. Some local authorities are just sitting on land hoping that, one day, a Government will give them enough money to develop it so that they can build council houses for rent.

Some of the more enlightened authorities have said that they should make that land available to the private sector for low-cost home ownership, but insist that, in the first instance, the homes are offered either to sitting council tenants or to people on their waiting lists. If they adopt that approach, that will not increase public expenditure. Indeed, it will reduce it because they will receive capital for the land. Such an attitude will help them to make real progress with their housing problems. If a tenant buys a new house, the authority has the advantage of a re-let; if it is sold to someone on the waiting list, the pressure on the list is reduced. I did not detect any understanding of the role of the private sector in what the hon. Gentleman said.

Some 62 per cent. of tenants in the private sector are owner-occupiers. If we concentrate on public sector stock and public expenditure only, we are not adopting a total approach to housing. It is right to harness the energy of the private sector to try to tackle the problems outlined by the hon. Gentleman.

Some difficult council estates are being transferred to the private sector, with sitting tenants who retain all their rights, such as the right to buy. The private sector has transformed those estates and made them satisfactory places in which to live. Both Labour and Conservative authorities have adopted that partnership approach so as to make faster progress in tackling housing problems.

Mr. Cohen: I am aware of the role of the private sector. Indeed, I mentioned that improvement grants should be expanded, not blocked as new improvement grants have been since August 1984. If the Minister is so keen on giving the private sector support, he should provide additional money so that the improvement grants can be reinstated.

Many of the schemes to which the Minister referred, such as improvement for sale, are mostly cosmetic because those who most desperately need housing just cannot afford them, even with the discounts being provided. The result is that many of the homes allocated under those schemes are left empty, and that makees those in need of homes very angry.

Sir George Young: When we took office in 1979, the figure spent on improvement grants by local authorities was £90 million. Two years ago, that figure rose to £900 million. It has now settled at between £400 million and £500 million. That is substantially more than was being spent by the previous Administration. The hon. Gentleman is being somewhat selective in his criticism.

On improvement for sale and other initiatives such as homesteading, local authorities must ensure that those to whom homes are allocated will modernise and occupy them quickly. My borough imposes quite tough conditions on when people must begin work if they wish to continue to be eligible for improvement grants and for the delayed start of mortgage repayments.

The hon. Gentleman did not pay sufficient attention to the role of the private sector in tackling housing problems in his constituency. He mentioned the problems of tenants in getting local authorities to effect repairs. He will be pleased to know that, as from 1 January, local authority, new town and housing association tenants will have a right to repair. An item of work that costs between £20 and £200, such as repairing a cracked cistern or a leaking pipe, can now be paid for by the tenant, who will be reimbursed by the authority. That is a worthwhile extension of the many rights that we have given to tenants since we took office.

Leaflets will be available shortly to local authority tenants. We can give the hon. Gentleman a supply of them for his advice bureau if he would like that. The work may be carried out more quickly under the new proposals than if tenants continue to rely solely on local authorities.

The hon. Gentleman mentioned renovation of housing stock. We have a much clearer picture of the position since we undertook a survey, with the help of some authorities, earlier this year. We were especially grateful for the co-operation of Waltham Forest in that exercise. The borough council is an enthusiastic supporter of our policy to improve private sector stock. The housing strategy that it has drafted for next year shows that it proposes to continue with that support. Indeed, almost 30 per cent. of its bid for housing capital resources has been planned for improving the private sector stock.

It is important that improvement grants, which are not as readily available as they were, should be targeted by the local authority at those who can least afford to pay for the repair and improvement of their property. The council newbuild programme continues to give support by providing accommodation for those with special needs, the elderly, disabled and others who are not able to cope easily for themselves.

The hon. Gentleman implied that the allocations announced yesterday were inadequate. Whatever figure we had announced, the Opposition would have found it inadequate, but we had to bear in mind the Government's overall economic strategy, and the need to keep control of public expenditure and keep down inflation.

London's share of the national allocation of £1·5 billion is 30 per cent. That is recognition of the special housing needs of the capital. In addition, the boroughs can invest a worthwhile proportion of the receipts that they generate through the sale of council houses to tenants and through sales of vacant housing and land. The abolition of the GLC means that the allocation that the GLC would have had has been redistributed to the London boroughs, which will also have the spending power associated with the GLC's capital receipts.

The London borough of Waltham Forest, within which the hon. Gentleman's constituency lies, has received an allocation for next year of £7·716 million. That represents 91·4 per cent. of the council's 1984-85 allocation and fully honours the commitment given to all local authorities in December of last year that they could plan their forward housing programmes on the basis that their allocations for next year would be at least 70 per cent. of their initial allocations for 1984-85. As I say, Waltham Forest has capital receipts which it has built up and it can augment the allocation by using that money.

In total, these resources can be used by the council to meet what it judges to be local housing needs and priorities, including those in the hon. Gentleman's constituency. The council's housing strategy seems to contain the right priorities—eliminating unfit housing, increasing the supply of accommodation for special needs, upgrading unsatisfactory housing, securing additional local authority accommodation to meet general housing needs, such as decanting, and improving the environment of housing areas.

The specific problems include an aging stock with disrepair in the private sector, particularly in the pre-1919 stock. The council also has disrepair in some of its own buildings and a poor external environment to some of its estates. There are 9,300 unfit dwellings in the borough, with 5,700 not having internal WCs or proper bathrooms. It also has the problem of 570 houses affected by the problems of pre-stressed reinforced concrete dwellings. We have made provision to help local authorities with difficulty in meeting their obligations under the Housing Defects Act 1984.

I was involved in an initiative not long ago in the hon. Gentleman's borough. I refer to the Walthamstow neighbourhood home improvement agency, which is in the neighbouring constituency to his. Two years ago I opened, in conjunction with the London borough of Waltham Forest and the Anglia building society, the Walthamstow neighbourhood home improvement agency, the object of which was to provide advice and help to poor, elderly owner-occupiers in an area of the borough covering more than 4,000 homes.

That was run on a non-profit-making basis, giving free advice, and it made a big impact in the area. Indeed, the house from which the scheme is run was itself improved and converted, giving people living in the area an idea of the potential of their own homes. With a commitment by the local authority to improvement grants and the availability of top-up mortgages from the building society, that is the sort of partnership scheme that the Government want to see, and I know that other similar initiatives are being considered.

From my Department's urban housing renewal unit, £50 million of the resources available for housing next year is being made available to assist local authorities to carry out schemes to be identified and agreed in discussion with my Department. We hope that there will be a constructive meeting with Waltham Forest to ascertain whether there is some scope for part of the £50 million to be spent in Waltham Forest to turn round some of the difficult estates.

I do not underestimate the problems facing the hon. Member for Leyton and his constituents. We are doing what we can for Waltham Forest, but we believe that more progress will be made more quickly if we broaden the horizon and harness the resources of the private sector rather than concentrating exclusively on a public sector solution.

Oluronke Owoseja

Mr. Jerry Hayes (Harlow): Christmas is a time for families, a time for loved ones to be reunited in their own homes, to enjoy themselves and to be together. Most important of all, Christmas is a time for children.

It is with particular sadness, although with particular appropriateness, that on the Friday before Christmas 1985 the House should be debating the tragic story of a young girl who will not be at home and will not be with the family that she loves. Sadly, this will be the third Christmas that she will be spending away from her home in Harlow, where she was brought up since she was three or four months old. She will be in Nigeria. She will be in a strange country, with strange customs, with strange people.

That is the result of the deceit and trickery of her natural mother, the mother who had no contact with her child since her birth until August 1983 and who kidnapped and took the young girl to Nigeria.

In 1971, one of my constituents, Mrs. Jean Dwyer, who lives in Harlow, saw an advertisement in a magazine asking for someone to foster a Nigerian baby girl. She applied because most of her family had grown up and left home and because she had fostered Nigerian girls before. She entered into a private undertaking — a fostering arrangement — between herself and Oluronke's natural mother. It was all proper and above board because Mrs. Dwyer deposited the agreement and had it ratified with the local authority.

All went well. From 1971 to August 1983 the little girl lived happily as part of Mrs. Dwyer's family. She went to a local school and she made many friends. She was a happy little girl who had spent all her formative life in Great Britain, in Harlow.

There was a problem in 1975 when for some reason the natural mother, aided and abetted by the natural father, tried to snatch the girl back. Perhaps that was because in 1974 her natural parents had separated and their marriage was dissolved, but we do not know. As a result of the attempted snatching, Mrs. Dwyer went, properly, to the High Court and Oluronke was made a ward of the High Court, with custody, care and control going to Mrs. Dwyer.

From 1975 until 1983, all was happiness. There were no further disturbances and no further contact with the natural parents. A happy little girl was living in a loving environment in my constituency. Then the High Court did something outrageous, and certainly inexplicable. On the application of the natural mother, it ordered that the little girl should have access to her natural mother, the mother who had had no contact with the little girl since she was born. To make matters worse and to compound the High Court's ludicrous decision, which is still a mystery to me, the mother was allowed to take the child away overnight. This only heralded the obvious tragedy. The natural mother took the child away, despite the protestations of Mrs. Dwyer and the little girl, and Mrs. Dwyer never saw Oluronke again.

The natural mother said to the little girl, "I am taking you on a shopping trip to Amsterdam." Nothing could have been further from the truth. It was nothing more than a wicked deception. The little girl was taken on an aeroplane not to Amsterdam but to Nigeria.

Several months passed before Mrs. Dwyer heard anything about Oluronke. Hon. Members can understand that she was worried out of her mind. The High Court sensibly ordered a full press and television search. The High Court said, "Give the case the maximum coverage. We must find this little girl. The natural mother is clearly in contempt of court because the little girl is a ward of the court and under its jurisdiction."

After several months, letters from Oluronke started to arrive showing that she was desperately unhappy. She was in a strange country with strange customs, strange people and sometimes a strange language, because she had been brought up and educated in Harlow in Britain. She did not know anything about Nigerian customs. She was Nigerian only by birth. It appears that the natural mother does not care for the child in any way, as the little girl does not even live with her. She has been dumped into the custody of a 90-year-old grandfather.

The little girl has been managing to contact Mrs. Dwyer through letters smuggled with the aid of the little girl next door. It may be of interest to the House if I give an example of the type of letter the little girl has been writing to her home. She has said:

> "These past few months have been agony. All the memories of England, Harlow and, most of all, home have just been closing in on my mind, although since I started school I don't get so much time alone and so I am now occupied. But in the first months things were really terrible. Even now, sometimes when I'm watching TV and I see a programme from England, it reminds me of us all arguing over what programme to watch. So you can see, I can never never forget you and all you did for me, and I am determined to pay you back even if not in money . . . I will always love you, even if we are not successful in my returning. I could never resent you for that. So if you don't have the money, please don't worry yourself at all about it.
> Bye now, Love,
> Ronke."

That is an example of the tragic, pathetic letters that Mrs. Dwyer, the foster mother, receives from the little girl.

The House and the vast majority of the people in Britain are outraged at such cases. We are not prepared to accept the abduction of young children to strange countries. There was a time, before the Child Abduction and Custody Act 1985 and before we were signatories to the Hague convention, which deals with this problem, when the Foreign and Commonwealth Office was dealing with 150 child abduction cases a year. There was a time when about 200 illegally abducted children were brought to this country each year. It is no surprise to my hon. Friend the Under-Secretary of State that there is still a serious problem of child abduction. The Child Abduction and Custody Act 1985 and the Hague convention are utterly meaningless unless all countries are willing to make them work. It will be no surprise to the House and to my hon. Friend to know that Nigeria is not a signatory to the Hague convention.

It is normal in a debate involving the Foreign and Commonwealth Office to lash out and blame it for all kinds of difficulties. After all, my right hon. Friend the Chancellor of the Duchy of Lancaster once said that the Ministry of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food was for farmers and the Foreign Office was for foreigners. I do not subscribe to that view. My hon. Friend's Department and his two predecessors have been helpful. They have done all in their power to facilitate the return of this little girl. I commend my hon. Friend and his officials, with whom I have had numerous dealings, for the hard work that they have put into the case.

The difficulty is simple. We are not receiving co-operation from the Nigerian authorities. Money is no object. We have raised enough cash to enable this little girl to be flown back to Great Britain. Passports are not a problem because the Foreign Office and the high commission in Lagos have arranged for an emergency passport to be available for her. What is happening with the Nigerian authorities? Precisely nothing.

The problem is not helped by the natural parents' and the grandfather's attempts to prevent this little girl from returning to this country. I cannot understand why. Shocking threats have been made to this girl. Unfortunately, letters stopped coming from Oluronke to Mrs. Dwyer some time in July this year because the natural family discovered that there had been correspondence between them. They discovered that Sola, the littel girl next door, had been helping with the correspondence. They discovered the plan for Oluronke to return here.

One of the last letters from Oluronke received by Mrs. Dwyer said:

"Dear Auntie Jean,

I am sure now that there will be no way of me returning to England now only for a holiday or after I have finished school here. Every day the people here will be watching my every movement and if I was still to return it would put Sola"— that is the little girl next door—

"into so much trouble. Although I can honestly say I don't regret my correspondence with you I do regret letting Sola get involved in all this and I swear to God I would have given my life here yesterday just to get her out of all this trouble. Anyway I really wrote to inform you that both my father and mother intend writing to you in the near future. I can't explain what I want to tell you very well but they both swear that when you read their letter you'll die immediately so please if any letter arrives from Nigeria take it straight to your lawyer or barrister but whatever you do don't open it please. This is very important."

What type of people put such terror into the mind of a girl of 14 or 15? What type of people are prepared to go to such lengths to prevent that girl from going back to the family that she loves and to the only home that she has ever known? It is as obscene as it is monstrous. Today is probably a last-ditch attempt to try to get this little girl back. On Monday, I went to the Nigerian high commission and delivered a letter to be sent to the new President of Nigeria asking him whether, for humanitarian if no other reason, he would intervene in the case to try and stop the obfuscation by the authorities and to obtain some co-operation with the family so that this girl can come back.

I ask my hon. Friend the Under-Secretary to do all he can to persuade the Nigerian authorities to be co-operative. They should at least give the little girl a chance to go to the British high commission in Lagos and say that she wants to come home or give her the chance to express her point of view and preferences. I ask him to do all he can to put pressure on the Nigerian Government to become a signatory to the Hague convention, so that, even if we can do nothing in this case, we can prevent such things from happening again.

Most importantly, I am grateful for the work that my hon. Friend and his predecessors have put in, but we must not give up. It is shocking that the little girl should have to endure what she is putting up with at the moment and that she should be so desperately unhappy. The now widowed Mrs. Dwyer spent the years from 1971 to 1983 loving and caring for the child and she will now have to spend another Christmas on her own. The only thing that she has to comfort her are her memories.

The Parliamentary Under-Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs (Mr. Tim Eggar): I pay a warm tribute to my hon. Friend the Member for Harlow (Mr. Hayes) for the way in which he has fought so steadfastly and determinedly on behalf of his constituent Mrs. Dwyer. It is an extremely sad case and he has described it very movingly to the House. My own personal sympathies go to Mrs. Dwyer and to Oluronke.

Few Members in the House would have done as much as my hon. Friend has on behalf of his constituent. I know that at least twice he visited my predecessors to discuss the case. I am particularly grateful to him for the warm tribute that he paid to the officials of our consular department. The work done by our consular offices throughout the world is under-rated and under-valued. They often work long and unreasonable hours against unreasonable expectations by British citizens. It is nice when hon. Members such as my hon. Friend the Member for Harlow feel able to pay a real tribute to their work. On Christmas day, as on every other day of the year, there will be a consular officer on duty in the consular department in London, standing by to assist in any emergencies that may occur on 25 December.

Before I comment on the sad circumstances of the case I should like to take the opportunity of reminding the House of the background against which all cases of international child abduction have to be considered. It is to be regretted that child abductions are becoming all too common and more frequent. The ones who suffer are not the parents but the children, who often become little more than pawns in bitter marital and legal disputes. However, it is an inescapable fact that when children are removed from Britain, whether they are the subject of a court order of custody or wardship, they become subject to the law of the country where they happen to be and are no longer within the jurisdiction of the British courts.

At present, there is no machinery for the enforcement outside the United Kingdom of British court orders of custody or wardship. In the absence of an amicable agreement between the parties concerned, the only legal course open to the aggrieved party is to take action to be awarded custody in the courts of the country where the children are. It would be for those courts to decide what relevance, if any, to attach to a British court order. Unfortunately, any action overseas would be costly, as British legal aid is not available for legal actions taken in overseas jurisdiction. In the majority of cases, sadly, legal aid will not be available to the British subject in the country where the legal jurisdiction operates. Our diplomatic and consular posts overseas cannot initiate legal action, nor can they represent the plaintiff in court. I stress that we fully accept that we have a general responsibility in such a case to do what we can to help, but the extent to which we can help will vary from country to country, and even from case to case.

Since early in 1983, our consular officers have been under instructions to assist as soon as they are contacted by a parent whose child has been abducted. Their instructions cover the following courses of action: first, to provide lists of local lawyers to enable parents to pursue their case through local channels; secondly, if they are so requested, to try to obtain from the local authorities a report on the child's welfare; and, thirdly, to give any assistance they can in connection with granting access to the children, including if necessary offering facilities where a meeting with the children could take place. Further, after consultation with our consular department in London, officially or unofficially they can draw to the attention of the local authorities information about British court orders affecting the children; they can do what they properly can to help bring about a speedy conclusion of any legal proceedings dealing with the child's custody; and, finally, they can approach the local authorities for help in tracing abducted minors.

However, the situation is made more difficult if the child or children concerned, as well as being British, are citizens of the country where they are being held—in other words, dual nationals. It is a matter of internationally accepted practice that a consular officer cannot afford protection to dual nationals in the country of their second nationality. Any representations on their behalf have to be informal and, sadly, the authorities of the country concerned would be within their rights to say that the British Government had no standing to intervene.

My hon. Friend referred to the Child Abduction and Custody Act 1985, which came into effect in October last year. The purpose of the Act is to try to reduce, and ideally to eliminate, the incidence of child abduction from this country. Under its terms, the abduction of a child, even by one of its parents or guardians, is a criminal offence. Anyone suspecting that a child is at risk of abduction can inform the Home Office. A warning will then be sent immediately to ports and airports.

Furthermore, child abduction is an extraditable offence. If a child has been abducted to a country with which the United Kingdom has an extradition treaty, it is for the police and the Director of Public Prosecutions to decide whether action for the extradition of the offender could and should be initiated. However, even if the offender were extradited to this country, that of itself would not necessarily guarantee the return of the child. Unfortunately, in several cases reported to us during the past year, the abduction has been unexpected, and the offender has left the country before the ports could be warned. That happened in the case with which my hon. Friend is concerned.

The problem of child abduction affects not only this country; it is worldwide. As my hon. Friend knows, two international conventions came into force in the second half of 1983. Their purpose is to achieve some mutual recognition of the court orders of wardship or custody of one country in another and to help right the wrongs of child abduction. Those conventions are the European convention on recognition and enforcement of decisions concerning custody of children and on restoration of custody of children, and the Hague convention on the civil aspects of international child abduction. The United Kingdom is a signatory of both conventions, but we have not yet ratified them. The Child Abduction and Custody Act 1985 will enable us to ratify both conventions when it comes into force. We hope to do that some time next year. The terms of the conventions are incorporated in the Act, which will give them the force of law in the United Kingdom.

The terms of the conventions can be applied only between states which have ratified them. Although the existence of the conventions is a step in the right direction, their wider effectiveness will depend on future ratification by other signatories, and the number of cases for which solutions may be sought will be limited by the number of countries which have ratified the conventions. At present there are no proposals to make bilateral agreements with countries that have not acceded to the conventions.

I turn to the specific case which my hon. Friend raised so ably today. It must be considered against the background that I have just outlined. The case is expremely sad, and has caused considerable anguish and distress to the child's foster mother, Mrs. Dwyer.

Oluronke was born in London in 1970 to Nigerian parents. She is a British citizen by birth, but also a Nigerian citizen. When she was three months old, she was fostered to my hon. Friend's constituents, Mr. and Mrs. Dwyer. In 1976, Oluronke was made a ward of court, and care and control were granted to Mr. and Mrs. Dwyer. Furthermore, when Mr. Dwyer sadly died, the court granted care and control to Mrs. Dwyer alone. However, the court stressed that Oluronke's natural parents were to be allowed reasonable access, and during an access visit her mother abducted her to Nigeria.

I well understand Mrs. Dwyer's anxiety for Oluronke's welfare and her desire that Oluronke should return to the United Kingdom. It must be tragic when someone to whom one has dedicated 13 years of love and care is suddenly snatched away. I fully sympathise with Mrs. Dwyer, and my heart goes out to her. I cannot do other than condemn the act of abduction which was in direct breach of a United Kingdom court order. Oluronke is now at the home of her natural mother and grandfather. She is living in her grandfather's house, which in the context of the Nigerian extended family is not as unusual as it would be in the United Kingdom. As she is still a minor, she may not leave Nigeria without the permission of her natural parents.

As my hon. Friend said, both her mother and grandfather are opposed to her return. Oluronke is now attending school, and we understand that she has made some friends of her own age. That is help, albeit to a small degree. As she is a Nigerian child living with her natural family in Nigeria, she is subject to Nigerian law, and I am sorry to say that our high commission in Lagos has no formal standing to intervene in her case.

When Oluronke is 18 she will be able to apply in her own right for a British passport, to which she would be entitled, and, travelling under that passport, she would be able to return to the United Kingdom without any let or hindrance.

The message that I must give my hon. Friend is especially sad and harsh. He has done everything that he can to assist his constituent and has asked me to give an assurance that we shall not give up. He has not given up, and I gladly assure him that we shall not give up. I wish Oluronke well, and I hope that it will not be too long before she is reunited with Mrs. Dwyer.

Arts Council (Special Grant)

1.29 pm

Mr. Chris Smith (Islington, South and Finsbury): The Minister for the Arts has explained to me why he is unable to be present today. He is attending a meeting of Ministers in Brussels. I am sure that the Under-Secretary of State for the Environment—the hon. Member for Mitcham and Morden (Mrs. Rumbold) — will be an admirable substitute. The Minister has offered me a meeting to discuss arts funding in the new year, and I shall take up his offer keenly.

I start from the view that the arts have an enormous value for millions of people. Governments of all political persuasions must encourage the production of the arts to foster creativity, and must at the same time ensure that the general public can enjoy the arts — especially the performing arts — at prices which everyone can reasonably afford. Those twin principles—the fostering of initiative and creativity, and encouraging the public to participate in and enjoy the arts—are the cornerstones of any sensible arts funding policy.

Sadly, the present position is not so happy. Many artistic institutions will have great problems when the GLC and the metropolitan county councils are abolished at the end of March 1986. The funds at present placed at the disposal of artistic institutions by the GLC and the metropolitan counties will not be available after 1 April. The Government have recognised the problem and have said that they will make available additional funds through the Arts Council to enable replacement funding for the institutions that will suffer. However, the amount is insufficient.

I can do no better than quote a letter that I received only two days ago from the chairman of the Arts Council, Sir William Rees-Mogg. On the general problem of replacement funding, he wrote:

"I must make clear to you the very great difficulties the Council faces with regard to post-abolition funding given that the sum of £25 million provided by Government to replace Met. County spending on the Arts, while an improvement on the originally intimated £16 million, still falls far short of the £35 million which the Council has identified as the real need."

That is not the Opposition speaking; that is the chairman of the Arts Council, appointed by the Government, telling them that the amount of replacement funding should be £35 million, not £25 million. That is the root cause of the problem which I shall discuss today. That is the major problem facing many artistic institutions that are vying for too small a part of Arts Council funding.

I hope that the Government will not give the excuse that the Minister for the Arts gave at a recent Question Time when he said that arts funding has risen by 7 per cent. in real terms under this Government. The arts world is baffled by that figure and every calculation demonstrates that it is not correct. I hope that the Government will not start saying that they have been very good to the arts and that we should appreciate that. The simple fact is that £35 million is needed and £25 million is being made available. That is about to have a serious effect on the arts.

I wish to speak principally about two artistic institutions in my constituency — two theatres that receive funds from the Greater London council. They are the Almeida theatre and the Sadler's Wells theatre.

The Almeida was founded about six years ago and has shown a remarkable development, largely through the initiative, enterprise and creativity of the small group who started the theatre and have put in a tremendous amount of work to make it an institution which is respected not only nationally, but internationally. Remarkable progress has been made in those six years.

Not only have those at the theatre produced great achievement in artistic terms, but they have transformed a derelict building into one of the most attractive theatres in the country. The mixture of productions, ranging from the almost popular to the wildly avant garde, has added new dimensions to the artistic enjoyment available within our capital city.

The people at the theatre have adopted an extremely sensible housekeepng approach to funding and the management of resources. They have worked hard, with a skeleton staff, and have put in enormous effort. If the Government are as dedicated to such values as they keep saying that they are, they ought to recognise that the people at the Almeida have put in an enormous amount of work for little reward, being dedicated solely to creating a vibrant and exciting artistic institution.

The theatre has made strenuous efforts to seek private sponsorship for its activities and has been successful to a limited extent, but there are limits to the amounts that private companies are prepared to put into experimental theatre of the type that the Almeida is particularly interested in promoting.

The theatre has used pricing policy to good effect. Seat prices have been raised as high as possible, without losing custom and reducing the size of audiences. In all possible respects, the theatre has adopted a sensible and cost-effective approach to the business of putting on theatrical productions. It is sad that there is no guarantee that the money that the theatre receives from the GLC, both in capital and revenue terms, will be replaced when the council is abolished.

The other artistic institution in my constituency about which I am particularly worried is the Sadler's Wells theatre, which has a long and honourable history, going back far beyond the innovative and recent development of the Almeida theatre.

The recent announcement of the Arts Council that Sadler's Wells and four other so-called receiving theatres would not receive Arts Council funding after abolition has thrown the theatre into a deep and distressing quandary. The decision by the Arts Council not to provide any replacement funds for the receiving theatres runs contrary to the apparent assurances that were given to Sadler's Wells in the past. I quote first from a letter written on 16 April 1984 by Lord Gowrie, who wrote to the right hon. Member for Chelmsford (Mr. St. John-Stevas), who had taken up the question of Sadler's Wells funding:

"When I met representatives from Sadler's Wells last December (1983), I undertook to consider their case for some form of central funding. I am glad to say that it will now be possible for Sadler's Wells to apply to the Arts Council to make up the deficit in their funding caused by the abolition of the GLC. Final decisions as to the distribution of new funds will of course rest with the Arts Council"— this is the get out—

"but I am sure that they will sympathetically consider any approach made by Sadler's Wells."

If sympathetic consideration is a rejection of any replacement funding, I shudder to think what unsympathetic consideration might be.

[Mr. Chris Smith]

Subsequent to that, on 23 September this year, the hon. Member for Shoreham (Mr. Luce), now the Minister for the Arts, wrote to the chairman of Sadler's Wells:

"I appreciate Sadler's Wells' worries and I can assure you that the Arts Council are aware of them too. As you know, the GLC's grant to the theatre was taken into account in calculating the £16 million additional funding which the Government has already announced for the Arts Council."

If the Sadler's Wells grant was taken into account in the original £16 million, why, now that the amount is £25 million rather than £16 million, is Sadler's Wells not to get any funding that has been made available to the Arts Council?

It must also be borne in mind that the £267,000 for which Sadler's Wells has applied represents only slightly above 10 per cent. of its gross turnover. It is not asking for massive funding of large proportions of its operations. It is asking only for that amount that is the shortfall that it needs to remain viable in business. It has made strenuous efforts to attract private sponsorship and commercial support. In 1985-86, that amount will reach over £350,000. However, it cannot, in the 15 weeks left to it between the announcement of the Arts Council decision and the start of the next financial year, find the further £250,000 that it will require to make up the shortfall, because no funds are now available.

The Government's decision, through the Arts Council, not to provide funds to Sadler's Wells will undermine the confidence which private and commercial sponsors will wish to see before they put funds in the theatre when the GLC goes. The point that so far has been consistently made in terms of both the Almeida theatre and Sadler's Wells by Government Ministers when they talk about these matters is that the local borough should pick up some of the tab when the GLC goes.

Mr. Jeremy Corbyn (Islington, North): I endorse everything that my hon. Friend has said about the Almeida theatre and Sadler's Wells, being an admirer of both. Will he consider the problem of many other theatres in London, particularly innovative local community theatres such as the St. George's theatre in Tufnell Park in my constituency, as also being serious? The real problem is that the Government should be providing sufficient money to make up for the shortfall following the appalling decision to abolish the GLC in the first place.

Mr. Smith: I entirely agree with my hon. Friend. These examples from my constituency are but two among many that will be affected by the decision to abolish the metropolitan county councils and the GLC.

I noticed that the hon. Lady the Under-Secretary was nodding when I said that the successor authorities are expected to pick up the tab. That claim ignores the fact that the borough already provides both theatres with some support. In revenue terms, the amount is small but, in terms of a 25 per cent. contribution to partnership funding for capital works in both theatres, it is substantial. In addition, both theatres receive their mandatory 50 per cent. rate relief and the discretionary 50 per cent. rate relief, which represents a substantial contribution from the borough's ratepayers in forgone rate income.

Mr. Clement Freud (Cambridgeshire, North-East): Does the hon. Gentleman agree that the Government's claim also ignores the promise that the Minister for the Arts made to the Select Committee on Education, Science and Arts that there would be sufficient Government money to continue supporting GLC and metropolitan counties' arts enterprises?

Mr. Smith: Yes indeed. There is quite clearly insufficient money to continue the full operations of the artistic institutions that are supported by those councils which are about to be abolished.

Two other factors must be borne in mind when the Government say that the borough must pick up the tab. First, the borough of Islington is rate capped. We were told only this week that a reduction of 18 per cent. in rates levied on the people of Islington is demanded by the Government in the coming financial year. How will the additional money that will be required be found from a diminishing pool to support those theatres when the GLC goes? Secondly, the theatres do not relate solely to a small community — they represent borough and regional resources. It can be argued that their attraction goes beyond the capital city. It is up to the Government to recognise, through the Arts Council, that they have a relevance beyond Islington.

I call on the Government to do three things, and I hope that the hon. Lady will be able to give me some assurances. First, they should admit the gross inadequacy of the £25 million that is being made available to the Arts Council as replacement funding. Secondly, they should recognise the special status of these valuable artistic institutions as regional resources rather than merely local ones. Thirdly, they should show some shred of recognition that the arts are essential to our community, and that they are not a luxury to be cut as a result of easy whim.

The arts are an essential part of the civilization that goes with a democracy. If these theatres and others like them suffer as a result of lack of financial commitment from the Government, the quality of life in Britain will be diminished. Heaven knows, life in Islington is hard enough. These two artistic institutions provide a little joy to my constituents. The Government are full set on a course that will remove that joy.

1.50 pm

The Parliamentary Under-Secretary of State for the Environment (Mrs. Angela Rumbold): I reiterate the apologies of my hon. Friend the Minister for the Arts, who cannot be present to respond to the debate. As the hon. Member for Islington, South and Finsbury (Mr. Smith) said, my hon. Friend has explained to him that he is in Brussels and has offered to meet him in the new year. If I am unable fully to cover all the points raised by the hon. Gentleman, my hon. Friend will write to him.

The hon. Gentleman felt that it was important that Government, among others, should continue to encourage the arts. I do not think that anyone would disagree with that. Indeed, I believe that the Government have fully demonstrated, by their actions, that they are committed to that.

It may be helpful if I begin by outlining our position on funding the arts after abolition. The Government have always recognised that abolition of the GLC and metropolitan county councils would have important implications for arts funding, bearing in mind the prominent role which the GLC and MCCs have taken in this sphere. As a result, on 11 April 1984 the then Minister for the Arts announced that the Government would make available £34 million in 1986-87 to replace GLC and MCC expenditure on the arts. That comprised £16 million for the Arts Council, £1 million for the British Film Institute and £17 million for museums. Those figures were based on the estimates then available of actual expenditure in 1983-84, adjusted forward for inflation to 1986-87, and after allowing for a take-up of essentially local activities by the successor districts and borough councils, which were, of course, being relieved of the significant GLC and MCC precepts. I should stress that at no time have we committed ourselves to making up the total deficit, because we consider there is a proper role for local funding. Similarly, we have never committed ourselves to funding additional activities and commitments which the GLC and MCCs have entered into after 1983-84, which may be part of the problem.

Nevertheless, during the course of 1985-86 many representations were made to my hon. Friend and his predecessor, Lord Gowrie, by the Arts Council and others, that the original calculations on which the £16 million had been based omitted significant arts expenditure that was either carried by the GLC and MCCs on other budgets or related to bodies that had come into operation after 1983-84. They also argued that the Government's funding should be increased to take account of the general expansion in arts spending by the GLC and MCCs that had taken place since 1983-84. A case was also made by the British Film Institute for additional post-abolition funding for film projects.

On 14 November, my hon. Friend announced the Government's response to those various representations. He announced that the Government were raising the £16 million allocated to the Arts Council to £25 million and the £1 million allocated to the British Film Institute to £1·3 million. Perhaps the hon. Gentleman would recognise that Sir William Rees-Mogg has played a significant part in enabling that increase to take place.

My hon. Friend also announced that the Arts Council's basic grant, excluding post-abolition funding, would be raised to £110·6 million, thus giving it a total grant of £135·6 million for 1986-87.

Together with the £17 million already announced for museums, this brings to over £43 million the Government's provision for post-abolition funding of the arts. It demonstrates our determination to maintain the level of Government support and to give arts bodies in the GLC and metropolitan areas a good foundation on which to build.

Nevertheless, the Arts Council figure of £25 million still leaves districts and boroughs to make a vitally important contribution. The Arts Council's estimate was that to meet all current arts requirements it would need £35 million. This seems to be slightly unreasonable because there is cause to expect districts and boroughs to bridge the gap when they will have been relieved of precepts to a much greater value than this sum—by definition, about £35 million said to be the current GLC-metropolitan county councils' contribution.

We believe strongly that local arts must have a base of local funding. If this is not forthcoming, or if successor authorities are unwilling to contribute adequately, it must call into question whether the arts are seen as sufficiently worthwhile in the area. I am sure that such a question does not arise in the hon. Gentleman's area.

The hon. Gentleman will be grateful to know that, in spite of the rate capping of Islington council, it will have the ability, because of the favourable grant that it has been given—about £11 million in excess of what it received last year — if it is prepared to look carefully at its expenditure, to contribute to the arts within its total budget. I trust that he will look at that with interest, if not with favour.

The Government take the view that there is a strong obligation on districts and boroughs to assess need in their areas and to meet it, often on the basis of matching contributions from central Government via the Arts Council. The hon. Gentleman will recognise that it is not for the Minister to dictate which project should be helped, although my hon. Friend has done his best to ensure that there is enough money to go round.

Mr. Chris Smith: The hon. Lady refers to an additional £11 million going to the borough. She will appreciate that that must cover everything that the GLC at present provides for the people of Islington. She is suggesting that the total grant requirements of Sadler's Wells and the Almeida theatre, which between them—two artistic institutions alone — amount to £600,000, should come out of that £11 million. That, surely, is impossible.

Mrs. Rumbold: I was merely suggesting that there should be some constribution, as the local contribution, from that money to help the Sadler's Wells and the Almeida theatre.

I come to the specific point that the hon. Gentleman made about Sadler's Wells and the general case that he put. The Arts Council said recently that it would not assume responsibility for the metropolitan counties' funding of receiving theatres, including Sadler's Wells. This is entirely consistent with the council's normal funding policy, which is to fund performance, not buildings.

The council firmly believes that it is for local authorities to provide and maintain buildings, but it has undertaken that, where it can assist other arts bodies in a particular district, it will do so, taking full account of the fact that the successor authority is shouldering its responsibility for receiving theatres.

My hon. Friend has received strong representations from a number of the arts bodies affected by the Arts Council's decision not to provide receiving theatres with replacement money. On 9 December he met representatives of Sadler's Wells, who told him of their anxieties.

My hon. Friend has much sympathy with these bodies. Equally, he understands the Arts Council's reluctance to break with its longstanding policy of not funding receiving theatres. He therefore welcomed and has commended to the affected bodies the council's clear indication that it was prepared to take into account successor authorities' funding of receiving theatres when considering the funding of other arts organisations in their areas. He believes firmly that funding of arts bodies should be a joint activity, bringing together the Arts Council and/or regional arts associations in partnership with local authorities and other local interests.

The Almeida is a producing house as well as a receiving theatre and the council has told my hon. Friend that it will be considering its case for replacement funding, in line with the claims of all other bodies presently funded by the GLC. The council does not expect to be able to announce its decision on funding for a few weeks.

[Mrs. Rumbold]

As I have explained, we see funding of the arts as a plural activity; central Government have an important part to play but so, too, have local government and the private sector. We believe that we have upheld our part of the funding. Although the hon. Gentleman will not like what I am about to say, I shall reiterate that since the Government came to power in 1979 we have increased total central arts expenditure by nearly 10 per cent. in real terms and increased the Arts Council's basic budget by about 7 per cent. These figures take no account of the additional funding that we have provided to replace arts spending by the GLC and MCCs.

We believe that the Government have met their commitment, and through their provision of over £43 million for total post-abolition funding, including £25 million for the Arts Council, have recently given a generous lead to the successor authorities in the abolition areas.

Beckenham Hospital

2 pm

Sir Philip Goodhart (Beckenham): Almost exactly three years ago, on Friday 17 December 1982, I presented a petition which said:

"There is a need for the full range of facilities to be maintained at Beckenham Hospital for the benefit of the local communities. Wherefore your petitioners pray that your Honourable House will urge the Secretary of State for Social Services to instruct the Bromley Health Authority to maintain the present range of facilities at Beckenham Hospital."

As I told the House at the time, the petition had been signed by a wide cross-section of community leaders. It was supported by more than 22,000 signatures, which were gathered in only six weeks. It represented the largest demonstration of support for a local institution that I could remember in the past 25 years.

That unprecedented gesture reflected, in part, the fear that the authorities would soon take far-reaching decisions without being aware of the strength of local sentiment and, in part, gratitude for the splendid skill and dedication of the staff at Beckenham hospital, which has been demonstrated so often for so many years.

The petition was prompted also by the fact that there is an imbalance in the provision of health facilities in the Bromley health authority district. Most of the hospital beds are in the south and most of the people live in the north. Nearly 50 per cent. of my constituents in the north-west third do not have cars and find journeys to hospitals in the southern part of the district exceedingly difficult.

We feared three years ago, and we still fear, that if cuts had to be made in any hospital provision, the convenience of the doctors who live and work in the south of the district would count for more than the convenience of the patients who live in the north. On 24 January 1983, in replying to the petition, the Secretary of State said:

"Bromley Health Authority will produce a Strategic Plan in 1983 setting out plans for developing local health services. While the Strategic Plan cannot be anticipated in detail, the Authority does intend to maintain a wide range of facilities at Beckenham Hospital for the benefit of the local community: this does not mean that the existing range of facilities will necessarily remain unchanged in every respect . . . but Beckenham Hospital will continue to play an important role in the district."

When the strategic plan was produced, it was eminently sensible. In its draft plan, Bromley health authority said that it had

"as a long-term objective the provision of 60 per cent. of hospital services in the north of the district in line with the distribution of the population."

That sensible declaration was widely welcomed when it was made, for it fitted the social as well as the demographic realities of life in the area.

Since the publication of the draft plan 25 years ago, there have been substantial changes in the provision of health care in Beckenham. Beckenham maternity hospital, which has given such good service to the community for so many years, will soon close. Its facilities will be transferred to Farnborough hospital, which lies about eight miles to the south of the present maternity hospital.

I have accepted the planned closure reluctantly. The move to Farnborough will create some inconvenience for constituents, especially in the north-west of my constituency. There are substantial medical arguments in favour of the transfer, although I would have wished that the Beckenham maternity hospital could continue on its present site until the planned new accommodation in Bromley hospital is available in the early 1990s. Meanwhile, there has been a reduction in the number of acute beds in Beckenham hospital. They were replaced by a geriatric day hospital and two wards of geriatric patients.

Despite some initial misgivings that the switch in emphasis towards geriatric provision was going too far, the present balance between orthopaedic beds, gynaecological beds and geriatric beds and the geriatric day hospital and outpatient services provides a service to the community that is highly valued. That service is provided efficiently and effectively in a way that commands the respect and affection of the community. There is one operating theatre in Beckenham hospital. From the beginning of January until 19 December this year, 2,245 operations were carried out there, showing that the theatre fills a real need and is managed most efficiently.

Despite the fact that Beckenham hospital has avoided a reputation for conveyor-belt medicine, its throughput of patients is substantially better than in the district as a whole and the regional average. In orthopaedic beds, Beckenham's throughput is 27; the average for the district is 20.2; and the average for the south-east Thames region is 27.2. It does not sound wholly appropriate to talk about throughput in reference to gynaecological beds, but the throughput figure for beds in the Beckenham gynaecological ward is 73, compared with a district average of 57.2 and a regional average of 64.7. In geriatric beds, where clearly throughput must be viewed differently, the Beckenham figures are slightly better than elsewhere in the district. The future of Beckenham should be assured on grounds of convenience and efficiency.

The Bromley health authority's meeting on 17 December was faced with a management paper recommending the closure of the operating theatre and the gynaecological and orthopaedic wards in Beckenham hospital. The management paper envisaged total closure of Beckenham hospital in the near future and the closure of all acute beds in Orpington hospital in the south of the district.

The Bromley health authority is spending, in round terms, £50 million a year on hospitals. Looking ahead to 1986-87, the Bromley health authority estimates that it will be faced with a shortfall in income of £2 million. To meet that shortfall, the health authority has been urged by the management to reduce the number of acute beds from 659 to 566 in 1986-87. In other words, to meet a projected revenue shortfall of 4 per cent., the management proposes a cut in acute beds of more than 16 per cent.

Of course a shortfall of £2 million a year is serious, but to meet this by a cut of 93 hospital beds is barmy. According to the management's own figures, it will produce a saving of £1.2 million a year. In other words, the management will have precipitated a major crisis in the Health Service locally and will still have gone barely halfway towards meeting the projected financial shortfall. That would plainly have the most harmful effect on our waiting lists.

At the moment, the Bromley health authority is in the top quarter of the 200 odd districts in England and Wales when it comes to the shortness of waiting lists, but 28 per cent. of the 350 people on our waiting lists have had to wait for more than a year for an operation. If the proposed plans go through, the waiting lists and the time that those on them will have to wait can be expected to escalate sharply.

The effect of the proposed changes on Beckenham hospital will be out of proportion to the savings that can be achieved. If and when the orthopaedic and gynaecological wards at Beckenham are closed, it is suggested that the beds will be filled with geriatric patients who at present go to Farnborough and Orpington hospitals. That would mean that the sole major identifiable saving would be made on the operating theatre at Beckenham hospital. Its closure will save £60,000 a year.

We are then talking about the destruction of Beckenham hospital as we know it for a paper saving of £60,000 a year. It would, of course, be possible not to move in additional geriatric patients, but just close the orthopaedic and gynaecological wards. When I discussed that matter with the management at Beckenham hospital yesterday, it was plain that that alternative made no economic sense when one considers the division of overheads. If the whole of Beckenham hospital were to be closed, it is said that the savings would be £2 million a year. I suspect that the estimated savings are illusory, while the social and medical loss would be enormous.

The most charitable thing that I can say about the proposals by the chairman of the Bromley health authority and the new management team is that they seem to be ill-considered and are likely to produce the maximum disruption for the minimum of saving.

The new chairman and the new management team should not be asked to take most of the blame for this new crisis. They are being strangled by the guidelines of the resource allocation working party. That working party, which produced its guidelines in the mid-1970s, had the laudable objective of seeking to equalise the provision of medical services across the country as a whole. That was a desirable objective, and it was hoped that progress towards achieving equality between one part of the country and another could be made painlessly by a process of differential growth between the regions.

Relatively under-provided regions would merely have a larger annual increment of growth than the relatively over-provided regions. In theory, no one would suffer. As Dick Crossman, the egalitarian and highly political Labour Secretary of State for Social Services, wrote in the 1970s:

"I can only equalise on an expanding budget."

Between 1979 and 1983, that in effect was what happened. There was differential growth on an expanding budget and the operation was comparatively painless.

In the past three years, however, London and the south-east have been faced with a real loss of resources as money has been transferred to other regions and the regions have been encouraged to carry out their own resources reallocation programme. That means that, if the RAWP guidelines continue to be enforced so enthusiastically, we shall be faced locally with a perpetual crisis. As one senior nurse said to me yesterday at Beckenham hospital, "However many economies we make in Bromley, we always seem to be £2 million a year short."

We have done what the Government want. Our administrative costs in Bromley are lower than those in the region as a whole, and we are saving £2 million a year through the introduction of competitive tendering. However, we still face a crisis. What then should be done? In the immediate future, the Bromley health authority management team should go back to the drawing board and do its sums again. I am glad to say that that is already happening.

[Sir Philip Goodhart]

There should be urgent talks between the Bromley health authority and the South-East Thames region about the application of the RAWP guidelines in the financial year 1986-87 and the years immediately following that. That will help during the course of the next month.

The Secretary of State and his admirable team of Ministers must look urgently at the application of the RAWP formula. I am glad to note that on 17 December this year the Secretary of State announced that he had asked the National Health Service management board to review the operation of the formula, particularly the way in which the relative needs in different parts of the country are measured. I hope that the review will act quickly but, inevitably, it will take time. The hospital service in my area, and in London as a whole, cannot wait for a lengthy academic review which may or may not produce some relief for the current crisis. In order to meet our immediate crisis, I hope that in the new year the Secretary of State will meet the chairmen of the four Thames regions and the chairmen of all the health districts in greater London to consider what remedial action may be taken to relieve the immediate problems faced by London.

This is the last but one debate in the House before the new year. I wish you, Mr. Deputy Speaker, and the Under-Secretary a merry Christmas. If the patients and the prospective patients at Beckenham hospital in particular, and Bromley hospitals in general, are to have a happy and healthy new year, they will need more help than they are getting at the moment.

Mr. Roger Sims (Chislehurst): I congratulate my hon. Friend the Member for Beckenham (Sir P. Goodhart) on the way in which he has raised the issue of the effect of RAWP in Bromley and the vigorous style in which he has defended his constituents. I am grateful for the opportunity to contribute briefly to the debate.

I should like to emphasise that Bromley health authority has reduced its expenditure, as my hon. Friend said. It has done that by efficient economies and by contracting out. It has been congratulated in the House by the Secretary of State on the way in which it has done so. However, it still finds that it is continually having to make reductions in its services because it cannot meet its budget.

I am not going to argue the case for Beckenham or any other hospital. I have no hospitals in my constituency because they are situated in the other three constituencies in the area. However, whatever reductions are made, whether in Beckenham or elsewhere, the ultimate effect will be a reduction in patient care for my constituents and those of my hon. Friend. I accept the principle of RAWP and what it seeks to achieve, but I urge the Under-Secretary to consider a substantial slowing down of the effect of RAWP or an abatement of it.

Like my hon. Friend, I wish the Under-Secretary a peaceful Christmas, but I urge him, when he returns in the new year, to look carefully at the effect that RAWP is having in an area such as Bromley, and to reconsider its effects.

2.18 pm

The Parliamentary Under-Secretary of State for Health and Social Security (Mr. Ray Whitney): I am happy to have the opportunity to respond to my hon. Friends the Members for Beckenham (Sir P. Goodhart) and for Chislehurst (Mr. Sims). I reciprocate the wishes for a peaceful, happy and prosperous Christmas for all of us and a healthy and well cared for new year for constituents in the Bromley area.

The concern of my hon. Friend the Member for Beckenham for the Beckenham hospital is well known and, as he has reminded the House, he has made sure that Ministers in the Department of Health and Social Security are well aware of his concern. That was particularly manifested by the presentation in December 1982 of a petition to the House signed by around 22,000 people.

I endorse the tribute that my hon. Friend paid to the skill and dedication of the staff at Beckenham hospital, and the loyalty of the local people to the hospital. That is the case in many hospitals. We should be proud of that and take advantage of it.

At the same time, we must improve and develop our health care. I leave aside the resource constraints and problems, which are inescapable. Progress in medicine, shifts in population and the need for more technical and clinical services to be grouped together must be taken into account. I hope that we all agree that there must be changes. Inevitably, we run into problems of the conflicts of old and justified local loyalties with the advances of modern technology. The Health Service must be concerned primarily with the delivery of service to our constituents.

The inescapable shadow of the distribution of resources must always hang over us. Neither of my hon. Friends will need reminding that nationally our record is good. Since 1979, we have increased expenditure on the National Health Service by 20 per cent., and, according to the Chancellor's autumn statement, next year there will be a further increase of 2·2 per cent., in real terms. Of course, there are pressures of pay and additional staff, but we always need to remind ourselves that they, too, are services. Some 70 per cent. of the cost of the NHS is staff pay. Staff are a valuable and crucial commodity in the delivery of health care. We have achieved real increases in pay and in the numbers of doctors and nurses. We are happy to have done so. All that is at the national level, and should be recognised.

Both my hon. Friends referred at length to the complicated resource allocation working party formula. I was glad to note that my hon. Friend the Member for Beckenham accepted that the move towards the RAWP objective of equalising services throughout the country was laudable. That proposition was supported by my hon. Friend the Member for Chislehurst. That is the Government's position, as it was of previous Governments.

We are moving towards that objective at a steady and measured pace, not at a helter-skelter pace. Long-term revenue plans assume annual reductions of 0·3 per cent. until 1993-94. That can be regarded in no sense as undue or immoderate haste or pressure. As my hon. Friend the Member for Beckenham was good enough to acknowledge, the pressures on several areas, particularly the four Thames regions, have been recognised in two ways—by the statement following the autumn statement and by the broad RAWP outlines announced by my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State on 17 December.

There was an increase in funding in the Thames regions to take account of the pressures to which both my hon. Friends referred. The management board of the Health Service was invited to review the operation of the RAWP formula. That is being done within the basic principles of RAWP, with which we all agree, but we recognise that an examination of the pressures is required. My hon. Friend rightly suggested that the examination be speedy. That is a fair point, and I take note of it. I hope that he will accept that we recognise those pressures.

I shall now deal with the proposition of Bromley health authority, and the future of Beckenham hospital. I stress that these are still proposals for discussion. As I understand it, a formal consultation process will begin next month. The proposals are revisions of proposals which have been around for some time.

Sir Philip Goodhart: At the meeting on 17 December all the proposals were referred back, so the health authority will have to do its sums again.

Mr. Whitney: My point is that this is still an issue for the health authority. As my hon. Friend recognises, our system must be based on policies being made essentially at district health authority level. The region and the Department only take part at appropriate points in the process.

Given that the health authority is above RAWP and that financial adjustments are still to be made, I am sure that my hon. Friend will agree that better dispositions of resources can be achieved. Therefore, it must be right for the health authority to examine all the available options, taking due account of the sensitivities of local support for particular services and facilities. I hope that my hon. Friend will not seek to cramp the authority's intellectual style in the search both for the most effective use of resources and, more important, for the delivery of the services which his constituents need. I understand that the health authority is adopting that approach. Obviously, we shall maintain close contact with it.

The proposition is that the acute services will be dealt with in two hospitals rather than four, taking account of the fact that the hospital throughput is rather slow and expensive for acute services. Clearly there is a need for improvement. The delivery of the full range of high-quality clinical acute treatment is difficult to achieve. It is not for the Department or Ministers to take a decision on that. However, we must consider whether these days an 80-bed hospital can truly provide the level of acute treatment that our constituents have a right to expect. Whatever may have happened on 17 December, I understand that the authority has judged that the answer to the provision of a better service is to concentrate acute services in two hospitals, and to use the facility at Beckenham hospital for geriatric and mental illness provision.

We have watched the development of the issue carefully, and I have no doubt that the chairman and members of the district health authority of Bromley will take careful note of the points made with sincerity and conviction by my hon. Friends. The community health council has been involved in the discussions from the earliest stages. It appreciates the need to put the proposals into effect. But the measures will be the subject of the usual consultation, and Ministers will not come to a firm view unless and until the proposals are referred to the Department for consideration.

It being half-past Two o'clock, the motion for the Adjournment of the House lapsed, without Question put.

ARMED FORCES BILL

Ordered,

That Sir Antony Buck and Mr. Robert Key be discharged from the Select Committee on the Armed Forces Bill and that Mr. Tony Baldry and Mr. Nicholas Soames be added to the Committee.—(Mr. Maude.)

Housing Co-operatives

Motion made, and Question proposed, That this House do now adjourn.—[Mr. Maude.]

2.30 pm

Mr. David Alton (Liverpool, Mossley Hill): I have the privilege of opening the last debate of the last sitting before Christmas and, indeed, of this year. That gives me the opportunity to extend seasonal greetings to you and your family, Mr. Deputy Speaker, and to the Minister and his. It also enables me to comment on the appropriateness of debating housing at a time when we celebrate a feast with such obvious significance for the homeless and the badly housed.

My interest in housing co-operatives predates my entry into the House and originated when I was chairman of Liverpool council's housing committee. I believe in housing co-operatives because they offer the best way of giving tenants a stake and a say in their communities. I believe in them because, from my experience of representing people in the inner city during the past 13 years — as a local councillor or as a Member of Parliament — I am convinced that the traditional landlord-tenant relationship has failed badly. A passing glimpse at sprawling, faceless, badly-maintained municipal estates confirms my belief.

Planners and politicians have waged war against entire communities, slowly and deliberately running down neighbourhoods and depriving people of their homes, roots and identities. In their place, the "we-know-best" politicians have created nightmare developments which people have rejected utterly. One need look no further than Manchester's Hulme or Liverpool's Netherley to see the dire consequences of Labour and Tory housing policies during the past 20 years. I opposed the construction of Netherley in 1972; 13 years later, it is being demolished with about 47 years of debt charges remaining to be paid. In my constituency, two 20-year-old blocks of flats—Entwistle Heights and Milner House — are being demolished, with 40 years of debt charges remaining.

It is a bitter and costly legacy. But perhaps most damaging of all is that, in destroying the "Coronation Street" communities, family life and support has been wrecked. In the past, many inner-city communities were like large happy families, until the politicians came along and scattered the people to the winds.

The housing co-operative movement has recognised people's desire to take over from the planners and take control of their homes. Nowhere has that desire been so potent as in Liverpool, where thousands of people recognise housing co-operatives as the opportunity to realise their most cherished dreams. In a city where one in five is unemployed and many have low incomes, the right-to-buy legislation is not an option. But that should not preclude people from having the opportunity to realise their cherished dreams.

I have been saddened by the response of the Labour-controlled council to those who wish to have their own homes, but who cannot afford to buy them. The Rochdale Pioneers must be turning in their graves as they see Socialists putting every possible obstacle in the path of people who wish to shake off the municipal, corporatist yoke.

The Minister will be aware of the heroic struggle and the fight waged by the Eldonian housing co-operative in Liverpool. Its leader, Tony McGann, and his brave committee have faced every sort of threat from municipal bully-boys. Their original planning application was opposed on completely trumped-up grounds, with the council subsequently being overruled by the Secretary of State on appeal. Attempts were also made to bribe and intimidate tenants to break ranks and move out into newly-built council properties. Labour used every dirty trick in the book to try to break the spirit of that co-operative. It has happened in other developments, too. Portland gardens was to have been a housing co-operative, but it was municipalised, snatching away from people who saw homes being built opposite them the chance of homes of their own. Those properties were sequestrated by the local council and taken away from those tenants.

Furthermore, the local Merseyside Improved Housing association, which had been backing the Portland gardens development, lost about £40,000 on abortive work on the scheme. That, too, is public money.

Tenants at the Mill street co-operative were told by the local housing department that if they resigned they would immediately be offered houses—if they got out of the co-op, they would be given somewhere decent to live—but if they chose to remain, no repairs would be done to their homes.

The latest attempt by local Labour leaders is to change the allocations policy so that tenants who believed that they would be able to move into housing co-operatives will now be denied that chance. Every possible obstacle has been put in the path of people who want to live in housing co-operatives.

That bitter experience has convinced me that a new Act to guarantee the rights of co-operators is needed urgently. A right-to-co-operate Bill should be introduced at the earliest opportunity in the new year and should guarantee in law the rights of tenants who take on the full might of the council landlords.

The Eldonians were a particularly strong group. They had the support of their local councillors, some of whom were moderates in the Labour group. I admire them immensely for the way in which they stood up to the local Militants. The Eldonians also had the support of the Archbishop of Liverpool and of the Liberal group on the city council. My right hon. Friend the Member for Tweeddale, Ettrick and Lauderdale (Mr. Steel), the leader of the Liberal party, met that group at one of its meetings and gave it his personal support.

The Eldonians' fight has secured for them £6 million of housing investment in Liverpool. The housing will be managed by the tenants. That is jobs; that is services; that is homes. How ironic it is that political leaders, who never stop parroting those phrases, should have been in the vanguard in trying to prevent that investment and those homes from coming to Liverpool.

The Eldonians were fortunate to have the support of the Merseyside Improved Housing association in their fight. The work of that association has been magnificant, and I pay particular tribute to the chief officer, Mr. Barry Natton, to Tom Clay, who has done much of the groundwork, and to the other members of the team. Merseyside Improved Housing backed its commitment to housing associations by putting its money where its mouth was. It put £150,000 into the Eldonians' scheme alone, and £50,000 of that will ultimately be a direct subsidy which is not reclaimable.

Merseyside Improved Housing cannot afford to do that every time, as my hon. Friend the Member for Orkney and Shetland (Mr. Wallace) learned last Friday when we visited St. Andrew's gardens in my constituency and met the fledgling Bronte housing co-operative. The members of that co-operative need resources and help desperately. Representatives of Merseyside Improved Housing came to that meeting and will happily provide the professional advice and skills, but they must be backed up by resources.

The Department of the Environment's funds for housing co-operatives are lamentably small. The Minister for Housing, Urban Affairs and Construction told me last month in answer to my question about grants under section 121 of the Housing Act 1980:

"I consider that the present arrangements are satisfactory; the total provision for such grants in 1985-86 is £342,700 of which £94,700 has been set aside for co-operatives." [Official Report, 25 November 1985; Vol. 87, c. 381.]

In other words, less than £100,000 has been provided throughout the country for the development of housing co-operatives through grants under the 1980 Act. I have given an example of one co-op which required £50,000 to get only one scheme off the ground.

The Housing Corporation provides a co-operative promotion allowance, but that is only £2,100 per scheme. The Minister told me in another written answer:

"The level of co-operative promotion allowance for 1986-87 is currently being considered as part of the annual review of all housing association grant allowances."

The Minister admitted that the current rates were only £2,135 per scheme for projects in the provinces, and slightly more in London. He went on to say:

"The rates to take effect from 1 April 1986 will be promulgated early in 1986." [Official Report, 27 November 1985; Vol. 87, c. 570.]

That gives the Minister the opportunity to review those small allowances. The Government should take into account as well the size of the scheme and an additional per unit allowance should be made available.

Thirdly, we should be looking at the funding for repair grants, the upper limit of which is about £200. That is not enough money if one lives in a run-down flat in the middle of a hard-to-let development on a peripheral council estate. The House must pass legislation or bring in orders that will enable more money to be made available to tenants who want to turn around their estates. If special grants, such as repair grants, were given where people formed housing co-operatives, they could act as a catalyst and be responsible for tackling the major problem of hard-to-let and empty property that we see on so many of the big municipal developments.

There is a need for plurality of funding from a number of different pockets both in the Housing Corporation and in the Department of the Environment. The present derisory sums are hopelessly inadequate. None of the existing mechanisms recognises this most difficult and important work and the struggle that so many tenants have to mount without professional advice or expertise.

As an illustration of how low a priority such action is at the moment, I point out that the Housing Corporation nationally allocated only half of one person's time specifically to housing co-operatives, and that is not good enough. I hope that the Minister will say that the Government will look again at funding the need for more professional backing and help. If the housing co-operatives succeed, they will form a springboard for more co-operative ventures. The Mondragon experience in Spain came about when groups of unemployed Basques got together with the help of the local priest to set up a people's bank. They put their savings into the bank and financed the development of workers' co-operatives. That experience could be repeated in areas such as central Liverpool, which can work on the basis of a successful housing co-operative.

Housing co-operatives give people a stake and a say in their own community and homes. Families need greater protection if they are not to see the homes that they have helped to plan snatched away from under them. That is why we need a right-to-co-operate Bill. Co-operatives are about the most important form of home rule. They enable us to decentralise power and ownership in the most radical way possible. They are worthy of full support from the House. In the spirit of Christmas, which is of such special significance to the homeless and the badly housed, I hope that the Minister will be able to give me the assurances that I have sought.

2.43 pm

Mr. Simon Hughes (Southwark and Bermondsey) rose—

Mr. Deputy Speaker (Mr. Harold Walker): Order. Does the hon. Gentleman have the consent of both the Minister and the hon. Member for Liverpool, Mossley Hill (Mr. Alton) to speak? I see that he does.

Mr. Hughes: I am grateful to my hon. Friend for granting me a few minutes to speak in support of his plea to the Government to be more supportive of the housing co-operative movement.

At the moment, our lament is that the housing co-operative movement is seen as incidental rather than integral to the planning of housing provision in Britain. For many—and the Government have still to learn this lesson—they are the only way out of municipal misery. They are the only alternative that offers self-management and self-control rather than that other fallacious alternative, the unmanageable financial prospect of being able to buy, and then keep up payments for, a house. The liability of owner occupation and the right to buy is a useless resource to those who do not have the money to purchase and then sustain a commitment.

The Government should no longer consider the co-operative movement to be the reserve of the trendy middle class. That is not the reality. They are often most appreciated by working people in inner cities, London as well as Liverpool. The working people are backed up with the expertise and resources, both financial and skilled, of people who can advise and assist.

I have three propositions to make to the Government. First, they should establish, as part of the Department of the Environment, a national co-operative development fund—a co-operative corporation to balance the Housing Corporation — which would channel funds to the co-operative movement to build up that part of our housing sector.

Secondly, the Government should ask local authorities to present proposals for co-operative schemes in what is presently the public sector and in newbuild when, each year, they ask for local authorities' housing plans. That would help us to get away from the idea that the only alternative to public sector build is private sector build. Local authorities could get used to the idea that they had to plan co-operative ventures.

[Mr. Hughes]

Thirdly, the Government should facilitate a network of expertise, administrative skills, financial advice and resources to enable those who would choose co-operative housing if they were given the chance to make that choice and to be supported.

Such steps would give the Government a new reputation for the new year as the improving, enabling, co-operative Government — which even they will find appealing.

May I, on behalf of Opposition Members, offer our good wishes to you, Mr. Deputy Speaker, and to the Clerks and staff of the House who make our work so much easier? May I ask the Government to reflect that the more co-operative they are on matters such as this, the happier people will be and the better our housing will be in 1986?

The Parliamentary Under-Secretary of State for the Environment (Sir George Young): Nobody is more committed than the Government to breaking up the municipal monopolies that the hon. Members for Liverpool, Mossley Hill (Mr. Alton) and for Southwark and Bermondsey (Mr. Hughes) have mentioned. Similarly, nobody is more committed to moving away from the town hall paternalism which has doomed many local authority tenants to live in rather depressing surroundings.

That is why we are happy to review our support for the co-operative movement and to see how we might usefully build on it to provide greater impetus in this growing movement. I was disturbed but not surprised to hear of the irregularities of Liverpool city council that the hon. Member for Mossley Hill described. It is appropriate at a time of year when thoughts of many of our colleagues turn to other things to consider the role of co-operatives in tackling some of the remaining housing problems.

The debate shows the anxiety of the hon. Member for Mossley Hill about the many recent disturbing developments that affect his constituency and the whole of Liverpool. Some of the incidents that he described show the damage that can be wrought by militant Socialism in a deprived inner-city area.

There is not much between the Government and the hon. Members for Mossley Hill and for Southwark and Bermondsey about the desirability of extending further the housing co-operative movement. Only last week, my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State for the Environment said in a debate on the inner cities that co-operatives are working successfully in many inner city areas, not least Liverpool. We are anxious to see how we might help best.

Co-operatives are formed by a group of tenants or prospective tenants who are in housing need. If they are registered with the Housing Corporation, they have access to development funding, as do other housing associations. What distinguishes them is the fact that they are completely self governing, that their rules restrict membership to tenants and would-be tenants, and that all tenants have to be members of the co-operative. Almost by definition, therefore, their experience of the broader requirements of developing a housing scheme is somewhat limited.

The right way in which to approach that lack of experience is to help with the necessary training, advice and support. The Housing Corporation now insists that any new co-operative seeking registration and public finance must have a development agreement with a recognised secondary co-operative or housing association that provides back-up services and training. Secondary co-operatives are bodies which own no properties, but exist solely to provide development and other services to the primary co-operatives which carry out the work. I pay tribute to Co-operative Development Services, one of the major secondary co-operatives in Liverpool, which has done so much to encourage and foster the movement in Liverpool.

I have touched on the difficulties that can arise with housing co-operatives, but a recent review by my Department showed that they are balanced — and, indeed, outweighed — by the benefits and advantages that the movement can bring, not least in inner urban areas. Inherent in the co-operative movement—and both hon. Members touched on that—is the willingness of the residents to take responsibility for managing their own houses and taking a real sense of pride in the area in which they live. That avoids many of the problems and the resentments between landlord and tenant which have been a feature on large local authority estates.

That participative approach extends to the design of the dwellings to be built or renovated by the co-operatives. Apart from the co-operative style of management, a key feature is likely to be the close involvement of the actual members who work closely with building professionals in the physical arrangement of the development so that it fully reflects the wishes of the members of the co-operative. For that reason, they are now in the forefront of the community architectural movement that has attracted considerable publicity and most distinguished endorsement during recent months. Those of us interested in the inner cities simply have to take note of the growing awareness and willingness of those who live there to take responsibility for their future and to transform the soulless inner-city estates into an area in which they are proud to live.

The development of those schemes is funded primarily by loans from the Housing Corporation. I note what the hon. Member for Southwark and Bermondsey said about the need to set up a separate source of funds—he used the initials NCDF—for that movement.

At the moment, every scheme, whether submitted by a co-operative or a conventional housing association, is considered by the corporation on its merits. That ensures that only the best and most suitable projects are approved and that funds are used in the most effective way within the corporation's overall strategy.

In 1984-85, the level of capital expenditure on co-operative schemes was £23 million. It is too early to say what the figure will be for this year, but the indications are that the value of new schemes may be running at a slightly higher level. Yesterday we announced the Housing Corporation's approved development programme for next year. Gross provision has been maintained at the same level but we will concentrate resources on meeting needs in inner-city areas. That should encourage the funding of co-operative schemes.

However, development loans are not the sum total of our commitment to housing co-operatives. On 1 April this year an additional development allowance, the co-operative promotion allowance, was introduced. It is provided exclusively to housing co-operatives and its aim is to meet the extra costs that they face in obtaining back-up and advice from registered associations and secondary co-operatives. It currently stands at £3,522 for each first project in London and £2,135 elsewhere. The hon. Member for Mossley Hill implied that that was a derisory sum. When it is reviewed, we shall take his comments into account. Second and subsequent projects receive a smaller allowance.

We have attempted to recognise the special problems that co-operatives face when considering section 121 grants. Out of the total of nearly £350,000 available, some 30 per cent. has been set aside for secondary co-operatives in the current year.

Mr. Alton: Can I press the Minister further on allowances? Will he look at the question of their being paid only on successful completion of the scheme? There are occasions when co-operatives fail, through no fault of their own, and the allowances are not paid.

Will the Minister say something about the number of staff employed by the Housing Corporation who deal with housing co-operatives?

Sir George Young: The Government are anxious not to spend too much on abortive expenditure. That principle inspires our approach to housing associations and co-operatives. I shall have another look at the matter, but obviously we want the money to go on schemes that are completed rather than on those that are simply contemplated. I shall also take another look at the resources of the housing corporations that are devoted to promoting co-operatives in the light of the fraction of 1 per cent., or one person, as mentioned by the hon. Gentleman.

The housing co-operative movement was pioneered in Liverpool in the late 1970s when people in depressing public housing started to band together into self-help groups to find a way to better housing. That approach, harnessing the energies of local people, was supported initially both by the housing corporation and the city council of the day, and many of those early schemes are now complete.

Notable successes have been, for example, the Weller street and the Grafton crescent housing co-operatives in Liverpool 8. Those achievements have been widely recognised and some have won awards. The Prime Minister visited Grafton crescent co-operative in Liverpool last year and she, like others, was deeply impressed by what she saw.

In the Merseyside context, the co-operative principle provides an opportunity for those with no realistic prospect of home ownership, a point made by both hon. Members. The people there can now take real responsibility for the design, management and maintenance of their homes. It enables them to escape from inefficient local bureaucracy and to play a role in creating and sustaining good sheltered housing.

It was extremely sad, therefore, that the present Labour city council should have adopted a deliberate and dogmatic policy of municipalisation at the expense of co-operative schemes. The city council is not now prepared to enter into arrangements for tenant management co-ops or to found newbuild schemes for co-operative ownership because of its wish to direct all available resources to the council's newbuild for rent programmes, a narrow-minded and counter-productive approach.

That means that Liverpool co-operatives must now look exclusively to the Housing Corporation for funding and compete directly with many other claims on resources. Even though the corporation's resources are fully committed, it has been possible — through the special allocation for Merseyside which the Minister for Housing, Urban Affairs and Construction announced yesterday as £8·6 million for next year—to help some deserving co-operative schemes, in particular the Eldonian community association, which established the Portland gardens housing co-op in 1982 with the objective of developing a scheme of 111 houses and bungalows for families from the Portland gardens tenement block.

That scheme had been caught by the change in Liverpool city council's policy, but a deal was struck by which the council took over the scheme as a municipal development. But as co-operative members were involved in the design work, they will be allocated the new houses and bungalows.

That association has further plans for another scheme of 145 houses, bungalows and flats on the Tate and Lyle site. The scheme will be for families living in tenement blocks due to be demolished in Vauxhall. The proposed scheme is 60 houses for shared ownership for families in employment, 40 houses for rent by unemployed families and 45 bungalows and flats for rent by pensioners. We have been able to agree that resources should be made available from the Housing Corporation's approved development programme to make a special allocation to the co-operative to acquire and develop the site.

The former sugar refinery had been acquired by English Estates, which demolished it, and it is now reclaiming the land, with the aid of a derelict land grant, for future development. As the hon. Gentleman pointed out, there was a problem with planning permission, which the Secretary of State resolved, and the Eldonians have now started to work out detailed design proposals.

Despite Liverpool city council's rejection of the co-operative movement, that movement still demands attention. The Government have shown their commitment and have made special funds available, through the Housing Corporation, to enable a number of schemes to proceed.

When the city withdrew support, we provided resources for the Dingle residents and the Shorefields co-operatives to proceed on land owned by the Merseyside development corporation near the garden festival. Those are almost complete. Co-operative development services, neighbourhood housing services and major co-operative housing agencies in Liverpool, together with other bodies, have been in the forefront of building up the co-operative movement in Liverpool.

There is much to be said in favour of housing co-operatives. The forthcoming legislation may provide an opportunity for a debate on the lines that the hon. Gentleman outlined about a right to manage. I readily concede that there is energy and resource in our inner cities that the Government must harness, perhaps through the co-operative movement, to enable people to have a greater say in their own destinies, and the Government are ready to give those people an opportunity to achieve their aspirations.

As the final speaker before Christmas, I join in what has been said in wishing you, Mr. Deputy Speaker, and your fellow occupants of the Chair, the officers of the House and the Whips a richly deserved happy Christmas and all the best for 1986. I have no doubt that when the House reassembles early in January we shall have been refreshed and invigorated by our holidays and will be ready to tackle some of the problems that hon. Members have outlined in these Adjournment debates.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: I am grateful to hon. Members for their kind expressions of good will. I join them in extending our best wishes to all who serve us here, and I extend my personal best wishes to all right hon. and honourable Members.

Question put and agreed to.

Adjourned accordingly at Three o'clock.

The House met at half-past Two o'clock

PRAYERS

[MR. SPEAKER in the Chair]

Death of a Member

Mr. Speaker: I regret to have to inform the House of the death of Martin Stevens, esquire, Member for Fulham, and I desire, on behalf of the House, to express our sense of the loss we have sustained and our sympathy with the relatives of the hon. Member.

Oral Answers to Questions

TRANSPORT

Docklands Light Railway

1. Mr. Sims asked the Secretary of State for Transport when he last met the chairman of London Regional Transport to discuss the proposed westward extension of the docklands light railway to Bank station.

The Secretary of State for Transport (Mr. Nicholas Ridley): I discussed this matter with the chairman when I met him on 12 November. I and my officials are in close touch with him.

Mr. Sims: Is my right hon. Friend aware that the principle that applies privatisation to rail transport is very much welcomed on this side of the House? When my right hon. Friend next meets the chairman, will he convey that sentiment to him, and will he wish the project every success?

Mr. Ridley: I am grateful to my hon. Friend. I agree entirely with him that it is a very important breakthrough that the provision of public transport can now be contemplated in the private sector. I shall certainly convey what my hon. Friend has said to the chairman of LRT, who I know shares his and my view.

Mr. Spearing: Will the Secretary of State confirm that the westward extension will go ahead only if the Canary wharf project goes ahead first?

Mr. Ridley: Yes, Sir.

Mr. Robert Atkins: Can my right hon. Friend indicate when the STOLport, of which the docklands light railway will be a feature, will take effect?

Mr. Ridley: There are no proposals for the extension of the docklands light railway east to the STOLport from the central section, which is currently being constructed. The date when STOLport will go forward is a matter for my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State for the Environment. I believe that it will go ahead, but he must give the precise time.

Roads Policy

2. Mr. Chapman asked the Secretary of State for Transport if he will make a statement on his roads policy, in the light of the National Economic Development Office civil engineering report: "A Fairer and Faster Route to Major Road Construction".

The Parliamentary Under-Secretary of State for Transport (Mr. Michael Spicer): My right hon. Friend made an interim response to the Economic Development Committee last March. Consideration of the report is almost complete and we hope to give a full response to the EDC in the near future. The response will be published and I shall send my hon. Friend a copy.

Mr. Chapman: Will my hon. Friend confirm that the Government's objective — there is plenty of scope for doing this — ought to be to expedite public inquiries into major road proposals and that this can be done without any loss of rights by those who are adversely affected or who make representations? Furthermore, will he confirm that it would be possible for the Government to improve the compensation paid to those who are adversely affected without any extra call being made upon public funds, provided that the consultations and the procedures could be expedited?

Mr. Spicer: I cannot prejudge our response to the Economic Development Committee. However, we recognise that serious delays can be caused by planning procedures. We have to balance these against the rights of those individuals who are affected. We are looking at ways in which compensation can be improved.

Mr. Bruinvels: I recognise the need to speed up motorway and major road construction, but will my hon. Friend consider the need to monitor the working of these roads once they have been constructed? I have in mind the notorious cracks that arose on the M25 during construction.

Mr. Spicer: The answer has to be, yes. We certainly monitor roads after they have been built. That is one of the reasons why maintenance has been stepped up.

Severn Bridge

3. Mr Roy Hughes asked the Secretary of State for Transport what was the outstanding debt on the Severn bridge at the latest available date.

The Parliamentary Under-Secretary of State for Transport (Mr. David Mitchell): At 31 March 1984, some £46 million.

Mr. Hughes: Bearing in mind that the Secretary of State said a few days ago that the former Secretary of State for Defence ought to go because he had become an embarrassment to the Government, and bearing in mind also that this Secretary of State is so persistently flouting the law, is he not equally an embarrassment to the Government? Is it not simply ridiculous to impose a 150 per cent. increase in tolls on the Severn bridge when the Welsh economy is in such a parlous condition?

Mr. Mitchell: The judgment was not concerned with the level of tolls or the question which the hon. Gentleman has attached to that. It was concerned with procedural impropriety at the 1984 inquiry, and that is an entirely different matter.

Mr. Stern: Does my hon. Friend agree that if the Welsh economy needs assistance from public funds, which may well be so, that can far more clearly be provided through regional aid than through an indiscriminate subsidy to all road users on a particular stretch of road?

Mr. Mitchell: I entirely concur with my hon. Friend's view.

Mr. Anderson: Surely the Secretary of State must realise the problems of attracting new industrial investment over the bridge. Why do the Government insist on persisting in a policy the certain effect of which is to place an additional obstacle before the regeneration of the Welsh economy?

Mr. Mitchell: It is by no means certain that the best use of such money would be to subsidise the tolls on the bridge rather than give more direct help to the Welsh economy.

Sir Anthony Meyer: Is my hon. Friend aware of the steadily growing opinion in all shades of political views in Wales that the trouble of having tolls on the Severn bridge is by no means justified by the sums raised and that it would be far better to sweep them all away?

Mr. Mitchell: I hear clearly what my hon. Friend says, but a substantial debt has to be worked off, and that is slowly being done. By the year 2006 it will have gone. It would be wrong for us to ignore the extent of that debt and pretend that it does not exist.

Mr. Ron Davies: Does the Minister realise that there is no logic in the argument that on the one hand tolls should be retained and on the other that subsidies should be given by regional aid, particularly when the Government this year have already cut regional aid by 50 per cent.? Given the recent legal defeat, why does the Minister not realise that there is massive resentment on the Welsh side of the bridge against the tolls and that the Welsh people regard them as a block on industrial and commercial development? Why does he not take this opportunity to admit defeat and do away with the tolls altogether?

Mr. Mitchell: The question whether there should be tolls is different from that tabled today, but we have given notice of appeal against the judgment and perhaps we had better await the outcome of that.

Coaches (Speed Governors)

4. Mr. Adley asked the Secretary of State for Transport when he expects that speed governors on coaches will be required to be fitted; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Michael Spicer: We expect to consult on draft regulations later this year with a view to requiring coaches that can exceed 70 mph starting to be fitted with speed governors in 1987.

Mr. Adley: I welcome the Government's decision to try to do something to control the increasing menace of coaches on our roads, but may I ask my hon. Friend, if he has not yet done so, to look at the recent Channel 4 programme called "Catching the coach"? Is he aware that it was made clear in that programme that the safety standards applied by coach operators in Britain are well below those of other countries and that the behaviour of some coach operators in using physical short cuts in many of our towns and cities is just one of the problems that mean that we should have a full review of the way in which coach companies are using or abusing the law in a whole area of activity at the moment?

Mr. Spicer: I have not seen the programme to which my hon. Friend refers, but I shall do so. I agree about the sense of urgency that this matter requires, but before introducing the necessary regulations we must be sure that the devices work properly and safely and are calibrated and sealed.

Mr. Holt: My hon. Friend knows that we shall all welcome the introduction of the governors on coaches, but what will the Government do about the drivers who are able to drive lethally often when they are inadequately trained and qualified and moonlighting?

Mr. Spicer: If the drivers are not obeying the law they will be prosecuted.

Channel Tunnel

5. Mr. Pike asked the Secretary of State for Transport what representations he has received concerning the safety provisions of the alternative transport systems put forward in the prospective Channel tunnel schemes.

Mr. David Mitchell: Concerns about safety have been included in a number of letters from members of the public and representative and voluntary bodies. Safety has, of course, been at the forefront of the Government's assessment of the schemes.

Mr. Pike: Will the Minister recognise that there is strong concern about the safety aspects of any Channel tunnel, whether rail or road, and the problems of satisfactorily dealing with an accident should it occur under the middle of the Channel? We want to be sure that if the project goes ahead such problems can be dealt with and that there will be adequate safety measures and facilities to deal with them.

Mr. Mitchell: The question of the results of accidents and how to deal with them is covered by the assessment.

Mr Crouch: Is my hon. Friend aware that I have been receiving a great amount of flak recently from my constituents for having given support to the idea of a fixed link? Has he any safety provisions — not for me, because I can easily get a flak jacket, as they are readily available these days—but for my consitituents, who are properly concerned about the possible destruction of the Kentish environment that the project might produce?

Mr. Speaker: Order. That is rather wide of the question.

Mr. Mitchell: The environment has been one of our major considerations, in which we have been assisted by an outside assessor. I assure my hon. Friend that the problems for his constituents and for all people living in one of our most beautiful counties have been taken into account.

Mr Stephen Ross: As the Channel Expressway is being reported as one of the two runners for this contract, will the Minister assure us that he is taking into account the problems of a 31-mile road link, the ventilation for that road, the extraction of carbon monoxide and the danger of an accident in such a tunnel?

Mr. Mitchell: Assessments have covered ventilation and the particular circumstances that would arise if there were an accident in the tunnel leading to a build-up of stationary traffic, with the consequent effect on the carbon monoxide level.

Mr. Alfred Morris: Is the Minister prepared to meet the North of England Regional Consortium to consider and respond in detail to its important views about the proposed link?

Mr. Mitchell: If those views are concerned with safety, of course I would be prepared to meet a deputation if the right hon. Gentleman wished to bring one.

Mr Harrison: On the safety considerations, will there be continuous adequate lighting in the tunnel, unlike the lighting provision on our motorways, especially the M1 and the M62, in both of which I have an interest?

Mr. Mitchell: The right hon. Gentleman will have to await the choice of project before he can have full details on such matters.

Mr. Robert Hughes: In deciding on which type of link to have, taking into account the safety aspects, will the decision be made by the Cabinet after full discussion of the Secretary of State's recommendation, or by the Prime Minister by political prejudice? If the latter, are we to expect further ministerial resignations?

Mr. Mitchell: The decision will be made by the Prime Minister and the President of France on 20 January. As always, my right hon. Friend the Prime Minister will consult her Cabinet colleagues before reaching a major decision.

Bus Fares

7. Mr. Hardy asked the Secretary of State for Transport what information he has as to the average increase in bus fares since 1979; what information he has as to the likely trend in bus fares in South Yorkshire in 1986-87; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. David Mitchell: The average increase in bus fares nationally since 1979 has been 84 per cent. In the same period, South Yorkshire county council has chosen to place the entire burden of mounting costs on its ratepayers rather than increase fares for passengers. Future bus fare levels in South Yorkshire will be a matter for the passenger transport authorities and for bus operators.

Mr. Hardy: Is the Minister aware that when the Secretary of State announced his bus policy, he offered the House the firm prospect of better services and lower fares? Will not the result of Government policy be to push up fares in South Yorkshire by such an enormous amount that it will imperil our services?

Mr. Mitchell: South Yorkshire county council has pursued a high subsidy policy, which has meant that there has been no rise in fares for 10 years. Where a subsidy policy has been followed in that way there have been high rates, with all the consequences of that on employment and business, and the damage that it does to the community.

Mr. Parris: Does my hon. Friend agree that if politicians in South Yorkshire insist on increasing bus fares at one jump as a political gesture, instead of gradually, as the professional busmen on South Yorkshire passenger transport want, it would be a cruel and unnecessary abuse of South Yorkshire's passengers?

Mr. Mitchell: My hon. Friend is right. The professional advice that must have been received by politicians in South Yorkshire is that they should already have started a gradual increase to carry their passengers with them. If they decide to play politics, the result will be a sharp rise in fares, a loss of passengers, and a consequent loss of jobs for those employed in the bus undertaking.

National Bus Company

8. Mr. Stephen Ross asked the Secretary of State for Transport if he will make a statement on the progress of the privatisation of the National Bus Company and its subsidiaries.

Mr. Ridley: The process for the disposal of the NBC has now started. I have suggested to general managers that they and their staff should consider whether they wish to buy control of the companies for which they work. I understand that the NBC will be canvassing bids in the near future.

Mr. Ross: I read the Secretary of State's press statement on 9 December. What steps is he taking to prevent asset-stripping by possible purchasers whose prime intention may be speculative rather than to run a bus company?

Mr. Ridley: We are prepared to consider selling the companies with the property assets already removed and leased back to the companies, which would effectively avoid the problem that the hon. Gentleman mentioned.

Mr. Maxwell-Hyslop: Is my right hon. Friend aware of the danger of what is happening now where NBC subsidiaries, while still nationalised, are uncommercially underbidding the private sector for the bids that must be tendered shortly? Is he further aware that the private sector, unlike the public sector, cannot match those bids because it is not backed by public money, and it may be frozen out of routes which must be contracted for within a few weeks' time, and which will be operated later in the year only if they are contracted for? Does my right hon. Friend agree that that is not an equal or even-handed situation?

Mr. Ridley: I agree with my hon. Friend that it is vital to strive for an equal and even-handed situation. However, it is not yet time for the receipt of tenders for unremunerative routes to local authorities. No tenders have yet been called for. If any publicly owned bus company were to contract at unviable rates, the consequences would fall on the company at a later stage, when it would find that it made losses as a result. Where managers may be taking a controlling interest in their company, they would wish to avoid that.

Mr. Gregory: When my right hon. Friend denationalises the NBC, will he consider breaking it into sufficiently small units so that as many employees as possible can participate in the purchase of shares? In that way, he will move from the present monolithic system to one where employees can receive benefits from the privatisation of the company.

Mr. Ridley: Yes, Sir. The expected break-up of the NBC will result in about 60 operating subsidiaries. I am happy to tell the House that more than two-thirds of them have already said that they want to mount bids for their company. My hon. Friend's point is well made.

Mr. Stott: If that is the case, can the Secretary of State guarantee those who are at present employed in the NBC that the pension provisions they enjoy will remain the same?

Mr. Ridley: The hon. Gentleman knows full well that there is no guarantee of the present pensions. There will be no formal guarantee of the pensions in future, but there are options before the trustees of the NBC pension funds which enable them to choose whether they prefer greater security to other considerations.

Railway Passenger Services (West London)

9. Mr. Greenway asked the Secretary of State for Transport if he has received any proposals for the withdrawal of any railway passenger services in the west London area; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. David Mitchell: The British Railways Board has proposed the closure of Marylebone station and the withdrawal of passenger services between Marylebone and Harrow on the Hill and Northolt Park stations. In reaching a decision on the board's proposal I and my right hon. Friend will take into account all relevant factors.

Mr. Greenway: In addition to objecting to the proposal to close the Marylebone-Northolt Park line, is my hon. Friend aware of British Rail's proposal to withdraw a third of the services to Hanwell and west London? Does he agree that British Rail is at present receiving a much higher subsidy in real terms than in 1979, in addition to having recently increased fares to Hanwell and elsewhere by 8 per cent.? Will he support me in demanding that British Rail retains a proper and full service for my constituents in Hanwell and west London?

Mr. Mitchell: British Rail intends next year to reduce suburban services from Paddington. These services are among the most lightly used and heavily loss making in the London area. It is for British Rail to determine what level of services to operate in the light of the broad financial and other objectives set by Ministers.

M25 (Dartford Crossing)

10. Mr. Proctor asked the Secretary of State for Transport what factors he intends to take into account in meeting the demands for additional crossing capacity at Dartford on the M25; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. David Mitchell: My right hon. Friend will make these clear soon in an invitation to promoters to make proposals for a third crossing at Dartford.

Mr. Proctor: Is my hon. Friend aware that that additional capacity at Dartford is urgently required? Will he take into account the fact that the present tolls on the Dartford tunnel will pay off the capital costs by the early 1990s and that it would be inappropriate for tolls to continue after that date?

Mr. Mitchell: I agree that the matter is becoming urgent, but consideration as to whether tolls should be applied thereafter would depend upon the method by which any additional crossing was financed.

Mr. Cartwright: Does the hon. Gentleman intend that only the third crossing will be privately owned and operated, or is it the Government's longer-term intention that the whole Dartford tunnel complex will be transferred from public to private hands?

Mr. Mitchell: It would not be precisely as the hon. Gentleman has suggested, but more the latter than the former.

Mr. Squire: May I underline to my hon. Friend the Under-Secretary of State the comments of my hon. Friend the Member for Billericay (Mr. Proctor), that throughout most of the day the flow of traffic in either direction through the two Dartford tunnels is much higher than they were ever intended to carry? Even when the east London river crossing is constructed—if it is constructed—the central problem of Dartford will not be resolved.

Mr. Mitchell: I accept that capacity is important. It is one of the crucial factors in assessing the promotors' proposals, which we shall be inviting.

Shipping Cabotage

11. Mr. Sayeed asked the Secretary of State for Transport whether any progress has been made in negotiations with his colleagues in the European Economic Community towards agreeing free access to European Economic Community shipping cabotage; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Ridley: Almost all member states now accept the principle of early liberalisation but further negotiations will be needed on this and a number of other aspects of European Community shipping policy before regulations can be agreed. If negotiations are not successful within the next few months, I shall have to consider taking other steps to ensure fair and equal treatment for United Kingdom flag vessels.

Mr. Sayeed: I am grateful to my right hon. Friend for that answer. Will he consider, as one of those steps, denying access to our shipping cabotage to those countries which improperly prevent our merchant vessels from enjoying freedom of their cabotage? In addition, will my right hon. Friend consider going to the European Court of Justice?

Mr. Ridley: I agree that it is inequitable that our cabotage is open to all members states of the European Community whereas, roughly speaking, the northern European states have agreed to open their cabotage to our vessels but the southern European states have not yet done so. I shall certainly have to take account of the two ways of proceeding which my hon. Friend suggests—either closing our cabotage to those countries which will not open theirs or proceeding through the European Court of Justice. I would prefer it if we could obtain agreement by negotiation this year. That would be the best solution.

Dr. Godman: Did the discussions on cabotage involve in any way the trade in offshore supplies in the North sea gas and oil industries? At the moment, Norway, which is not a member of the EEC, enjoys a clear lead over British maritime interests. Is the EEC conducting negotiations on Britain's behalf with Norway to restore balance to this trade?

Mr Ridley: The matters that the hon. Gentleman mentions touch upon the cabotage issue, although they are slightly different, because Norway is not a member of the European Community. When my hon. Friend the Member for Hampshire, North-West (Mr. Mitchell) the Parliamentary Under-Secretary of State for Transport was responsible for those matters he succeeded in persuading the Norwegians to withdraw a charge for pilotage which discriminated against our fleet in favour of the Norwegian fleet. If there are any examples of unfair competition in the Norwegian part of the continental shelf I am prepared to pursue them further. I believe that it is better to have both markets open on fair terms rather than have both markets closed.

Mr. Higgins: Is my right hon. Friend aware that it is wrong that these restrictions on competition within the EEC should exist so long after we joined? Will he fight that matter as strongly as he possibly can? He will have the support of both sides of the House in doing so.

Mr. Ridley: I entirely agree with my right hon. Friend. I am glad to be able to tell the House that I reached a bilateral agreement with the West German Government that they will open their cabotage to us in practice. I intend to pursue this matter relentlessly with the other members of the European Community. At a meeting of the Council of Transport Ministers last week it appeared that my colleagues agreed that cabotage should be liberalised by at least 1992, but that was an informal meeting and I should like to see the agreement in writing.

Mr. Stott: I thank the Secretary of State for what he said to his hon. Friend the Member for Bristol, East (Mr. Sayeed) about this matter. I am not at all surprised that he is having some problems with the Greeks on this issue. As I understand it, the regulations concern the nationality of the company. In other words, they do not concern British companies which flag their ships out and whose ships are manned by foreign crews. When we achieve greater freedom of cabotage, will he ensure that it is carried out by British ships carrying British seamen, and not by British ships that are flagged out under flags of convenience?

Mr. Ridley: The Greek difficulty to some extent relates to defence and the Greek's ability to resupply islands off the coast of Greece for possible defensive action. We should seek to open up the cabotage of all member states of the Community to the fleets of those who fly the flags of the member states.

Airedale Route

12. Mr. Waller asked the Secretary of State for Transport when he expects construction work to commence on the A629/A650 Airedale route.

Mr. Michael Spicer: A decision will be announced very shortly on the outstanding statutory orders for the Kildwick to Beechcliffe section. The timing of the start of work depends on the decision.

Mr. Waller: When considering the speed at which future decisions about this road are reached, will my hon. Friend bear in mind the strongly held feeling in the whole of the Aire valley that the new road is vital to the area's future economic prosperity? Is he aware that plans and inquiries relating to this route have been going on for over 20 years, and that a long period has elapsed since the public inquiry on the side road orders relating to the Kildwick to Beechcliffe section?

Mr. Spicer: I am aware of the great interest that my hon. Friend has taken in this matter. I cannot, however, prejudge or prejudice the decision, which, as I have said, will be made soon.

Mr. Pike: Does the Minister recognise how important north-east Lancashire feels the completion of the Airedale route and the link of that route to the M65 and the M1 are, because it is important to have another east-west Lancashire to Yorkshire crossing?

Mr. Spicer: I am aware of the great interest that is felt about this road in the area that the hon. Gentleman has mentioned. I must repeat that I cannot say anything that will prejudice the decision.

Docklands Light Railway

13. Mr. Spearing asked the Secretary of State for Transport what approaches he has received from potential future purchasers of the London docklands light railway.

Mr. David Mitchell: I have received two approaches, including the one from the consortium which plans to develop Canary wharf, about which my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State made an announcement on 27 November.

Mr. Spearing: Is it not a fact that even if the western extension is built, about nine tenths of the route mileage of that railway will have been provided with public money? On what basis can there be private profit from public expenditure? Will the Minister reconsider the Secretary of State's decision not to require private operators to fit in with the system of travel cards and general traffic and fare levels which have been arranged by London Regional Transport?

Mr. Mitchell: The railway is not expected to make a profit. Therefore, the hon. Gentleman is wrong to assume that this is a case of public investment designed to create private profit. I am sorry to have to say that it will create a running loss.

Mr. Adley: Is there not cause for slight concern about the manner in which permission for the westward extension of this railway has been granted? Can my hon. Friend say whether I am right in assuming that the decision by the private operator to proceed was made only on the basis of his receiving planning permission at the other end of the line for a project which was originally rejected not only by the local authorities but by the Department of the Environment? Is this not a somewhat dangerous proposition?

Mr. Robert Hughes: Just say, "I do not know."

Mr. Mitchell: I was going to say that they are dependent one upon the other.

Fixed Channel Link

14. Mr. Teddy Taylor asked the Secretary of State for Transport how many letters he has received in his official capacity about the fixed Channel link; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Ridley: Approximately 1,700 letters about the Channel fixed link have been received since the promoters submitted their proposals on 31 October 1985. Of these, about 1,500 have been from members of the public.

Mr. Taylor: Does not this correspondence show that the public would much prefer a third Dartford tunnel to a Channel tunnel? Will the Minister issue a warning to innocent investors who might be tempted to put their savings into this project that if private enterprise funds run out before the project is completed, there is no question of the Government bailing out the project or their savings with taxpayers' money?

Mr. Ridley: In relation to the first question, I do not consider that 1,700 letters from a population of 54 million is statistically significant. Secondly, I agree entirely with my hon. Friend that no public finances will be made available if either of the projects that might be selected runs into financial difficulties halfway through.

Mr. Dalyell: Since the Under-Secretary of State most courteously answered my Consolidated Fund debate on 19 December, have the Government got any further in considering the problems of microsleep, driver hypnosis, and what could happen if people attempt to drive from Edinburgh to France and are fatigued when they enter the tunnel and do nuttish things?

Mr. Ridley: As my hon. Friend the Under-Secretary of State said, those matters have been analysed and considered, and the hon. Gentleman would do well to await the decision and the White Paper that will follow it. It will be impossible to publish that White Paper on the day of the decision, because the decision must come first, and the White Paper must be written thereafter, but it will provide the answers to the hon. Gentleman's worries.

Mr. Colvin: I apologise to you, Mr. Speaker, and to the House for not being here earlier when my question was called. How many letters has my right hon. Friend received about Britain's ability to fulfil its NATO defence commitments should the Channel fixed link lead to a reduction in our ferry fleet? What mechanism will be used to monitor the position as the impact of the Channel fixed link becomes clearer?

Mr. Ridley: I have received 19 letters on that subject, and I do not consider that 19 letters can be taken as expressing major national concern. The impact on the ferry fleet of any fixed link depends radically upon which fixed link is chosen. The White Paper will attempt to provide an analysis of the impact of our choice on the ferry fleet.

Mr. Robert Hughes: Can the Secretary of State confirm that his noble Friend the Earl of Caithness advised the Merchant Navy and Air Line Officers' Association that the Government intended to maintain a ferry service and fleet? How will that be done? Can he also confirm that no treaty between Britain and France will be signed before the House has had an opportunity to analyse and debate the White Paper?

Mr. Ridley: I am not sure what my noble Friend might or might not have said. However, the impact of any choice upon the ferry fleet and the defence consequences will be spelt out in the White Paper. Debates in the House are a matter for my right hon. Friend the Leader of the House.

Berkhamsted Bypass

15. Mr. Richard Page asked the Secretary of State for Transport what is his best estimate of when construction of the Berkhamsted bypass will start.

Mr. Michael Spicer: Subject to the outcome of the outstanding statutory procedures, construction could start in the second half of 1988.

Mr. Page: I thank my hon. Friend for that reply. Does he accept that many of my constitutents want the bypass to be built urgently? As there seems to be an increase in traffic along the existing road through towns and villages, will he ensure that the road is dual tracked?

Mr. Spicer: My hon. Friend is right to imply that a revision of traffic forecasts caused the delay. He is also right to say that we are considering the whole question of dualling along that stretch of the road.

ATTORNEY-GENERAL

Latent Damage

31. Mr. Chapman asked the Attorney-General when he proposes to introduce legislation to amend the law relating to latent damage.

The Solicitor-General (Sir Patrick Mayhew): It is hoped to introduce a Bill in the near future to amend the law of limitation in negligence cases involving latent damage, based on the recommendations of the Law Reform Committee.

Mr. Chapman: Is my hon. and learned Friend aware of the disquiet among professional organisations in the construction industry that the proposed date of breach is vague and imprecise? Does he agree that that is the problem in existing legislation? Will he consider sympathetically the suggestion that the period of liability should begin on a date which is definite and leaves nothing to chance?

The Solicitor-General: I shall draw my hon. Friend's views to the Lord Chancellor's attention. The Government have accepted the Law Reform Committee's reasons for rejecting the date of completion approach. The date of completion would be difficult to apply to the many other types of cases, other than construction, for which legislation is intended. Moreover, date of completion might cause injustice in lengthy construction projects, when completion occurs many years after the relevant date of breach of duty.

Mr. Ryman: Regarding the law relating to latent damage, can the Solicitor-General confirm that he wrote a letter to the former Secretary of State for Defence accusing him of uttering a material inaccuracy?

The Solicitor-General: I admire the hon. Gentleman's ingenuity, but his question does not arise out of the main question.

Fraud Investigations (Manpower)

32. Mr. Dykes asked the Attorney-General whether he now has any plans to increase manpower dealing with fraud investigations.

The Attorney-General (Sir Michael Havers) rose——

Hon. Members: Hear, hear.

The Attorney-General: I am grateful to the House. The Director of Public Prosecutions is increasing the number of lawyers on his staff who are assigned full-time to fraud cases from the present 15 to a total of 24—a 60 per cent. increase. There will also be increases in support staff. It is especially important that those staff should have considerable relevant experience, and we are exploring the use of some form of short service contract so as to permit the recruitment, for this purpose, of experienced practitioners from the Bar and solicitors' firms.

I shall, of course, continue to monitor the position closely.

Mr. Dykes: I warmly welcome my right hon. and learned Friend on behalf of hon. Members in all parts of the House and express the hope that he has recovered. I thank him for the answer. Does he now believe that, at long last, we have the basis, in terms of the number of people available, coupled with the Roskill recommendations, for a real and serious attack on the growing problem of fraud?

The Attorney-General: This involves the operation of the fraud investigation group. Roskill's first recommendation involves something even better than FIG and of course the Government will look closely at that. That might need even more resources, in which case I shall welcome them.

Mr. Skinner: Does the Attorney-General realise that he has a lot to live up to in view of his statement some months ago that the level of City fraud was unacceptable? Will the right hon. and learned Gentleman give a guarantee that, based upon these new recruits, including lawyers, he will be able to state unequivocally——

Mr. Cormack: —and categorically.

Mr. Skinner: —and categorically, as well as without ambiguity, that Peter Cameron-Webb, who is now living in Miami, will be brought back to Britain to face charges that relate to him getting rid of a sum approaching £130 million? According to yesterday's newspaper reports, Cameron-Webb, along with Peter Dixon, made £13 million for himself. Will the right hon. and learned Gentleman give a guarantee that law and order applies to people such as Cameron-Webb and Dixon as well as to those in the inner cities, and that they are subject to the law like the rest of the British people?

The Attorney-General: I shall answer the hon. Gentleman's supplementary question by giving him an idea of the resources that we are applying to the PCW and Howden frauds. There is the Deputy Director of Public Prosecutions——

Mr. Campbell-Savours: Will the right hon. and learned Gentleman bring them back?

The Attorney-General: There is an assistant director and a professional officer——

Mr. Campbell-Savours: Answer the question.

The Attorney-General: I shall come to it. There are two detective superintendents and other police and five counsel, including two QCs. The problem lies in tracing the funds so that we can ascertain who were the ultimate beneficiaries. There are several countries involved as well as a bank in Switzerland which was acquired by Howden. More than 1 million documents have been seized from Howden. There are extradition problems to face in getting back Cameron-Webb and others, and it may be that they are in Costa Rica and not Miami.

Mr. Skinner: The newspapers say that they are in Miami.

The Attorney-General: I do not mind what is in the newspapers. If Cameron-Webb is in Costa Rica, the House will be aware that we do not have an extradition treaty with that country. If he is in the United States—this applies to Cameron-Webb and to Dixon — the extradition procedure will be a lengthy business. Grob is another person who we would like to see back in this country. He has dual nationality—Swiss and British—and the Swiss do not extradite their own nationals.

Mr. Spencer: Does my right hon. and learned Friend agree that outside London the country forces have been dealing effectively with cases of long-firm fraud and fraudulent trading for many years and bringing those guilty of such offences to book, with the courts passing appropriate sentences?

The Attorney-General: Long-firm frauds are some of the easiest frauds to investigate and to prosecute. It is the much more complex frauds that have been causing difficulties. It is interesting that the Director of Public Prosecutions informed provincial police forces last year that if they wanted the assistance of FIG they had only to ask for it. A number of provincial fraud cases of great complexity—there are stock exchanges outside London —have been referred to FIG.

Mr. Nicholas Brown: My right hon. and learned Friend the Member for Aberavon (Mr. Morris) and I extend a warm welcome to the Attorney-General on his return to our proceedings. I hope that he has made a full and robust recovery from his recent operation. In taking up the issues raised by the committee on fraud trials, is it now the Government's view that too few reported fraud cases are brought to trial, and that this is primarily because of a lack of resources? What consideration is being given to the issues of expertise that are raised in the report, especially the training in accountancy and information technology that is suggested for barristers and judges, and especially for fraud squad investigation officers?

The Attorney-General: I am very grateful for the kind words of the hon. Member for Newcastle upon Tyne, East (Mr. Brown) and the right hon. and learned Member for Aberavon (Mr. Morris). I feel very much better.

There has been a great deal of extra training in FIG. Lawyers, including counsel, have been to Lloyd's and learnt the reinsurance processs. They are now much more skilled. The purpose of FIG is to gain a highly skilled group of experts—lawyers, accountants and the rest—who are much better able to get on quickly with what we hope are better trained police officers. So far, FIG has been a great success story. Indeed, it has been so successful that it is almost overwhelming.

Official Secrets Acts

33. Mr. Dalyell asked the Attorney-General if he will make a statement on the progress of the Director of Public Prosecutions' inquiry into alleged breaches of the Official Secrets Act involving the right hon. Member for Hertsmere (Mr. Parkinson) and Miss Sara Keays.

The Solicitor-General: The Director of Public Prosecutions announced on 7 January that there was no evidence available which could support a prosecution in respect of any infringement of the Offiial Secrets Acts arising out of this matter. In these circumstances, the Director has decided to take no further action and has advised the Metropolitan police that no further inquiries by them are required.

Mr. Dalyell: Does the DPP or the police have access to the relevant Cabinet papers?

The Solicitor-General: No, Sir.

Mr. John Morris: In view of the principle of equality under the law, will the Solicitor-General consider prosecuting under the Official Secrets Acts those responsible for disclosing the contents of his recent letter to the Secretary of State for Defence? Can he assure the House——

Mr. Speaker: Order. The same rules must apply to everyone. The question relates to a completely different matter.

Mr. Morris: With respect, Mr. Speaker, I am anxious to ensure that the Official Secrets Acts are applied in the same way and——

Mr. Speaker: Order. But this question relates to the right hon. Member for Hertsmere (Mr. Parkinson).

Mr. Morris: Has the Director of Public Prosecutions been inhibited in any way in his inquiry into this or any other matter concerning possible breaches of the Official Secrets Acts? Can the Solicitor-General assure the House that the law will be applied equally, whether to the right hon. Member for Hertsmere (Mr. Parkinson), the press secretary at No. 10 or anybody else who leaks official documents?

The Solicitor-General: I am happy to give the right hon. and learned Gentleman the assurance that, in the discharge of all of their functions, Law Officers exercise an independent and impartial judgment.

OVERSEAS DEVELOPMENT

Aid Programme

37. Mr. Beith asked the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs whether he has any plans to increase the amount of basic agriculture development work undertaken under the aid programme.

The Minister for Overseas Development (Mr. Timothy Raison): Agricultural development is at the heart of our bilateral aid policy. In devising our programmes we have to take account of the wishes of recipient countries, but we aim to increase the agricultural content whenever we can.

Mr. Beith: Has there not been a drastic reduction in the proportion of resources and the number of people employed under our aid programme giving essential aid to subsistence agriculture? Would not the reversal of that trend do a tremendous amount of good and go some way towards altering the bad impression given by the Government's new year honours list recommendations?

Mr. Raison: The proportion of British bilateral aid to sub-Saharan Africa used for agriculture and related purposes rose from 27 to 33 per cent. between 1979 and 1983. I have just seen extremely valuable agricultural work in the Sudan and the Yemen being carried out under the Government's auspices, which is strongly directed towards the poorer partners.

Mr. Prentice: Bearing in mind the appalling background of what has happened in sub-Saharan Africa, is there not an urgent need for Western aid donors to co-operate more closely to identify medium-term projects which could raise food production in that area? To what extent is that happening and what machinery is being used to further such steps?

Mr. Raison: My right hon. Friend is right. I assure him that co-ordination between donors is increasing all the time and that there is general agreement about the great importance of developing agriculture in those regions.

Aid and Trade Provision

38. Mr. Stuart Holland asked the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs whether he will make a further statement on the aid and trade provision.

Mr. Raison: The new loan scheme announced to the House on 12 November by my right hon. and learned Friend the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry strengthens the existing aid and trade provision. We shall now be able to respond more flexibly to the preferences of developing countries and to match the practices of other donors.

Mr. Holland: The Minister will be aware that there is considerable concern about this matter and about the extent to which priority is being given to aid and trade schemes rather than rural development initiatives. What resources does he expect to go to the ATP? Is he really in the business of trade to aid development, or mainly in development to aid trade?

Mr. Raison: I remind the hon. Gentleman that the aid and trade provision was introduced in 1977 by the right hon. Member for Clydesdale (Dame J. Hart). The additions required over the next three years under the ATP provisions that are being extended to loans are £3 million in the first year, £10 million in the next year and £20 million in he third year. It is important to remember that under the aid and trade provision we provide development help to the countries concerned and we have provided about £1 billion of export orders for British industry over the past few years.

Mr. Robert B. Jones: Is my right hon. Friend aware that the ELE company in my constituency has developed a portable water purification testing centre that is far in advance of anything elsewhere? That is a prime candidate for trade aid and could benefit employment in this country as well as helping people overseas.

Mr. Raison: I shall be very happy to talk to my hon. Friend about that company.

UNESCO

39. Mr. Spearing asked the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs, pursuant to his statement of 5 December about the United Nations Educational, Scientific and Cultural Organisation, what arrangements he has made for additional sums for work on soil and water management in arid or semi-arid areas.

Mr. Raison: I have allocated £400,000 per annum to support work on soil and water management in arid or semi-arid areas.

Mr. Spearing: Does the Minister agree that, welcome though the allocation is, it does not fill the gap left by the decimation of the Land Resources Development Centre, which was cut by the Prime Minister-inspired Rayner review three or four years ago? If the Government take African famine seriously, will they restore the resources for the centre at least to the level that existed before the cuts insisted on by the Prime Minister?

Mr. Raison: The hon. Gentleman is exaggerating. The LRDC is an admirable body which is continuing to do admirable work.

Mr. Alan Howarth: In the wake of the decision to withdraw from UNESCO, will my right hon. Friend undertake to give the best support he can to the work of agricultural research institutes in this country, such as the national vegetable research station at Wellesbourne, which is doing work of proven value to Third world countries as well as to our own? Will my right hon. Friend encourage his colleagues at the Ministry of Agriculture and the Department of Education and Science to do likewise?

Mr. Raison: I agree with my hon. Friend about the great importance of agricultural research. My Department certainly does all that it can to propagate that.

Sudan

40. Mr. Tom Cox asked the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs what is the present amount of aid given by the Government to the Sudan.

Mr. Raison: British bilateral development aid to Sudan in the last financial year amounted to £27·5 million. We expect to spend about the same amount in 1985-86. We have also provided more than £29 million on bilateral famine relief for Sudan since October 1984, including over £10 million through voluntary agencies. Following my visit to Sudan earlier this month, I have agreed to make a further £5 million available through the Save the Children Fund, mainly to meet the costs of urgent food distribution in Darfur. In addition, I am allocating £200,000 to Oxfam for emergency work in the Red sea province and the south.

Mr. Cox: I thank the Minister very much for that reply, and especially for the fact that he has agreed to give money to the Save the Children Fund. In view of the superb work done by the fund in appalling conditions in Sudan, I am sure that his support will be warmly welcomed, not only in the House, but outside. I hope the right hon. Gentleman will assure us that the support will continue if the need exists.

Mr. Raison: I am grateful to the hon. Gentleman for his kind words. He might like to know that the £5 million that I have just announced, together with another £1 million that I announced a short time ago, will make it possible to distribute within Darfur 110,000 tonnes of badly needed food.

Mr. Moynihan: Does my right hon. Friend agree that development projects such as the Equatoria region agricultural scheme, which he recently visited, are the sorts of projects that could be developed elsewhere in Sudan?

Mr. Raison: I agree with my hon. Friend. I have just visited that project. It is an excellent project and it is the sort of thing that we are looking to do elsewhere.

Mr. Stuart Holland: One of the critical issues in the Sudan is whether there is adequate fuel for food aid distribution. What did the right hon. Gentleman learn about that on his recent visit? Shall we find, as we did last time, that he will be overtaken by Bob Geldof's transport convoys in getting the food distributed?

Mr. Raison: The hon. Gentleman is being ludicrous about this matter. Bob Geldof has done a very good job, but the British aid programme to Sudan has made a substantial contribution, both short-term and long-term. One of the factors that we are examining is the provision of fuel wood.

Vietnamese Refugees

41. Mr. Dubs asked the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs what financial support he has given to keep the Vietnamese refugees in the camps in Hong Kong in each of the last five years.

Mr. Raison: The Overseas Development Administration has made the following contributions to the Save the Children Fund for its programme of assistance to Vietnamese refugees in camps in Hong Kong:—£15,000 in 1981; £10,000 in 1982; £9,000 in 1983; £14,000 in 1984 and £15,000 in 1985. In addition, the ODA makes an annual contribution of approximately £3·5 million to the United Nations High Commissioner for Refugees, who also runs a refugee programme in Hong Kong.

Mr. Dubs: Does the Minister not accept that we in Britain have a great responsibility for supporting the Hong Kong Government in what they are doing for the Vietnamese in camps in Hong Kong? Does he accept also that the resources available are not adequate? He has only to look at the schools in the camps to understand that. Will he reconsider the possibility of Britain giving more support to those who need help?

Mr. Raison: I believe the facts show that we are already making a reasonable contribution. Indeed, the work that we are doing is fully appreciated.

Westland

3.31 pm

Mr. Neil Kinnock (Islwyn): On a point of order, Mr. Speaker. Several times in recent weeks, Ministers, including the Prime Minister, have told the House that they took a completely dispassionate view of the affairs of Westland plc. Disagreement about that issue has now led to the resignation of a Cabinet Minister. Following his resignation, the right hon. Member for Henley (Mr. Heseltine), the former Secretary of State for Defence, repeatedly made the grave allegation that the Prime Minister had been systematically following one course in the privacy of Government, while insisting both in public and in the House that she was following the opposite course—[Interruption.] The implications of that for the House are grave indeed—[Interruption.] They clearly—[Interruption.]

Mr. Speaker: Order. The right hon. Gentleman is putting a point of order to me.

Mr. Kinnock: When it is alleged that the Prime Minister has said one thing in private, but systematically said another in this House, the implications for this House are serious. They are that someone has been telling the truth, and that someone has not been telling the truth.

For that reason, I asked the Prime Minister to make a statement on the matter to the House today. The right hon. Lady refused. I believe that that is a craven evasion of her duty to the House and country. I therefore give notice that on Wednesday the Opposition will use their Supply day to debate these issues. During that debate I shall demand that the Prime Minister comes to the House and accounts for her role and her conduct in this matter of national importance. The Prime Minister can run, but she cannot hide.

Mr. Speaker: I understand that that matter is to be the subject of a statement.

Several hon. Members rose——

Mr. Speaker: Order. I call the Leader of the House to make a business statement.

Business of the House

3.33 pm

The Lord Privy Seal and Leader of the House of Commons (Mr. John Biffen): I should like to make a short business statement——

Mr. Robin Maxwell-Hyslop (Tiverton): Further to the point of order raised by the Leader of the Opposition——

Mr. Speaker: Order. I have called the Leader of the House to make a business statement.

Mr. Maxwell-Hyslop rose——

Mr. Speaker: Order. I have dealt with the point which was not a matter for me—as the hon. Gentleman well knows.

Mr. Maxwell-Hyslop rose——

Mr. Speaker: Order. It is a matter, not for me, but for the Leader of the House.

Mr. Maxwell-Hyslop rose——

Mr. Speaker: Order. The hon. Member, who is very experienced in these matters, and the whole House know that the matter that was raised is not a matter for me. [Interruption.] Order. I have called the Leader of the House to make a statement on this very matter.

Mr. Maxwell-Hyslop: On a point of order, Mr. Speaker.

Mr. Speaker: Order. I am not prepared to take any further points of order — [HON. MEMBERS: "No."] Order. I am not prepared to take any further points of order on this matter because that would tend to lead to a debate, which is not a matter for me.

Mr. Biffen: I should like to make a short business statement. In view of the remarks of the Leader of the Opposition, the business of the House for Wednesday will now be as follows:

Opposition Day, Third allotted day. There will be a debate on Westland plc, on an Opposition motion. Afterwards, a debate on a motion on the Statutory Sick Pay Uprating Order.

Mr. Maxwell-Hyslop: On a point of order, Mr. Speaker.

Mr. Speaker: Order. If the hon. Gentleman will be patient, I shall call him later.

Mr. David Steel (Tweeddale, Ettrick and Lauderdale): Presumably the business statement is open to question. I should like to ask the Leader of the House whether he is aware that every newspaper, every radio and television programme, and every pub in the land is discussing the issues that have arisen — [Interruption.] — from the resignation—[Interruption.]——

Mr. Speaker: Order. This begins to sound like every pub in the land.

Mr. Steel: —of the Secretary of State for Defence? Is it not the right hon. Gentleman's responsibility, as Leader of the House, to arrange for the Prime Minister to make a statement on the wider issues, not on the narrow issues, which are the responsibility of the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry? The wider issues are Cabinet responsibility and the balance of defence procurements between Europe and the United States. If no such statement is forthcoming, will the right hon. Gentleman give an undertaking that the Prime Minister will participate in the debate that he has just announced?

Mr. Biffen: Obviously it will be within your competence, Mr. Speaker, to decide how wide the debate may go on Wednesday. However, I should be surprised if the right hon. Gentleman were disappointed.

Mr. Geoffrey Dickens (Littleborough and Saddleworth): May I ask the Leader of the House whether we may know the terms of the motion that we shall be asked to debate on Wednesday?

Mr. Biffen: The terms are not yet available, but they will be in good time.

Mr. Gordon Wilson (Dundee, East): Is the Leader of the House aware that many of us from Scotland knew that part of the debate on Wednesday would be given over to the problem of the Gart — er [HON. MEMBERS:" — cosh."]

Mr. Speaker: Order. We all suffer from slips of memory.

Mr. Wilson: Given my anger about the matter, it is hardly surprising that that should have happened. Why is the debate to be abandoned, particularly as people have been marching down from Scotland to England? When will we have a debate on that crucial matter, in which Scotland is far more interested than it is in the Westland Helicopters' problem?

Mr. Biffen: I am sure the hon. Gentleman will understand at once that the decision not to proceed with the debate was in the gift of the Opposition. I shall look at the wider issues that he mentioned.

Mr. Patrick Cormack (Staffordshire, South): Will my right hon. Friend the Prime Minister take part in the debate on Wednesday?

Mr. Biffen: My hon. Friend need not fret. He will not be disappointed.

Mr. Ian Wrigglesworth (Stockton, South): Can the Leader of the House be a little more precise? Is he not aware that the statements made last week by the former Secretary of State for Defence have profound implications both for national security and for the whole conduct of government in this country? Is he not also aware that the House will be disappointed to learn that the Prime Minister is not to make a statement this afternoon? Will he therefore make it clear that the Prime Minister will speak during the debate on Wednesday?

Mr. Biffen: I am sure that the hon. Gentleman will in no sense be disappointed by the content and outcome of Wednesday's debate.

Mr. James Couchman (Gillingham): Does my right hon. Friend know whether the Opposition, in choosing this subject for debate, propose to treat it as a matter for the various spokesmen of the sponsoring Departments, in opening and winding up the debate, or whether they propose to throw in some heavier guns?

Mr. Biffen: I shall not respond to the mean remarks that have been made from behind me. The actual participants are for the Opposition themselves to determine, but the Government will be fielding the highest and foremost team.

Westland plc

3.41 pm

Mr. Speaker: Statement, the Home Secretary.—[Interruption.] Order. Even I can make mistakes! Statement, the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry.

The Secretary of State for Trade and Industry and President of the Board of Trade (Mr. Leon Brittan): With permission, Mr. Speaker, I should like to make a statement.—[Interruption.] Perhaps I should add, in my present capacity.

Throughout last year, Westland plc was facing financial difficulties. The company's position reflected, among other things, a worldwide slump in demand for civil helicopters. Against this background Sir John Cuckney, who became chairman in June 1985, sought a partnership with a substantial industrial group which could offer both finances and commercial strength. United Technologies expressed an interest in taking a substantial minority shareholding.

Subsequently, Fiat joined United Technologies in a joint proposal to take a minority shareholding in Westland. The Government, however, encouraged Westland to explore fully in addition the possibility of an alternative European-based proposal. This led to the development of proposals from a consortium comprising Aerospatiale, Agusta and MBB, which were later joined by British Aerospace.

I announced in my statement to the House of 16 December that the board of Westland had decided to recommend to shareholders the proposals put forward by United Technologies and Fiat. I explained that the Government were not bound by the recommendation of the national armaments directors of the United Kingdom, France, Germany and Italy that certain helicopter requirements should in future be met solely from helicopters designed and built in Europe. That remains the position. I also explained the action that the Government had taken to ensure that Westland had an alternative European-based offer to consider, but emphasised that it was for Westland to decide the best route to follow to secure its future and that of its employees. At no stage did the Government collectively determine on a preference for a particular solution.

At its meeting on 19 December the Cabinet confirmed the policy that I had previously announced. It was also decided that no Minister was entitled to lobby in favour of one proposal rather than another. That decision was unanimously approved by the members of the Cabinet.

On 1 January my right hon. Friend the Prime Minister set out clearly in a letter to Sir John Cuckney that as long as Westland continues to carry on business in the United Kingdom the Government will support the company in pursuing British interests in Europe. My right hon. Friend also made it clear that the Government would resist to the best of their ability attempts by others to discriminate against Westland.

The alternative solutions put to Westland have been presented in some quarters as offering a choice between collaboration with Europe and collaboration with the United States. In fact, the Government welcome collaboration with both Europe and the United States. Both the proposals put to the board have a European involvement. The Government will continue to support Westland in pursuing British interests in Europe, whichever solution is implemented.

A number of assertions have been made in recent days about my own and the Government's position on this matter. I shall be happy to answer questions on these specific points.

The position now is that the board of Westland has unanimously recommended revised proposals from United Technologies and Fiat to shareholders. Revised proposals from the European consortium, now joined by GEC, have also been circulated to shareholders. The Government hope that the matter can be resolved quickly in the interests of the company and its employees.

Mr. John Smith (Monklands, East): Is the right hon. and learned Gentleman aware that it is rather curious for a Secretary of State to come to the House after a series of detailed allegations have been made by a former colleague and say nothing whatever about those allegations? Will he understand that the Opposition, at least, do not think that he is the appropriate person to answer questions about the Government's conduct? The Prime Minister should have come to the House today to answer questions posed by a colleague in whom she placed sufficient confidence to give him substantial responsibilities on behalf of her Government.

So far as the Secretary of State, with his responsibilities, is involved, is it not clear that his statement today adds little to what has already been said? May I ask him one detailed question to which I should like his answer? In his statement on 16 December he told the House:

> "In view of the urgent necessity for a deal to be concluded quickly, the Government decided that from 13 December they would not be bound by the national armaments directors' recommendation unless Westland had by then received a firm offer from the three European companies, which the board would recommend to its shareholders." — [Official Report, 16 December 1986; Vol. 89, c. 35.]

When and how did the Government reach that decision —[Interruption.]—collectively?

The Secretary of State told us that the Government had decided that Ministers would not lobby for either solution. May I ask him about his activities in connection with an interview that he had with Sir Raymond Lygo, the chief executive of British Aerospace, in his office at the Department of Trade and Industry? The Secretary of State will be aware of what has been said in recent days about that interview. Is there a contemporaneous written record of the interview between Sir Raymond and himself, bearing in mind that it would be normal Government practice for such a record to be taken by his private secretary or by officials in his Department? Does that record exist, and, if it does, can it be made available to Members of the House so that they can make a judgment as to what happened and test the accounts that we have been given? Will the Secretary of State understand that what we are interested in in that regard is the contemporaneous written record, which would automatically be made?

If it was the Government's decision that Ministers should keep out of the matter and leave it to the shareholders to decide on both proposals, which were clearly in circulation, why on earth did the right and learned Gentleman decide to speak to Sir Raymond Lygo at all? What was his purpose in calling him into his room and discussing the matter with him? Why was there an admitted reference in the course of that conversation to anti-United States sentiment and to the consequences of British Aerospace's involvement in Airbus, leading to a cancellation perhaps of American orders for Airbus? Why did the Secretary of State think that it was relevant to raise that matter with Sir Raymond Lygo in the context of a discussion on Westland Helicopters? What was his purpose in raising it if it were not to influence him in one direction or another?

If the Secretary of State says that he was merely discussing the state of orders for British Aerospace, does he not think it remarkable that that very evening Sir Raymond Lygo took the matter of his conversation sufficiently seriously to telephone each of his directors on the board of British Aerospace to acquaint them with the communication that he had received from the Secretary of State that very afternoon? Does the right hon. and learned Gentleman not understand that unless he gives a full account of what was said to Sir Raymond Lygo the impression will continue to circulate widely in Britain that the right hon. and learned Gentleman was saying one thing to Parliament, that he was even-handed, and doing another thing in practice and seeking to influence the outcome of the deal?

If Westland is unable, because of its articles of association and its constitution, to decide effectively in favour of either of the proposals, what do the Government propose to do?

Mr. Brittan: The right hon. and learned Gentleman asked, first, when the decision that I announced on 16 December as having been taken by the Government with regard to the national armaments directors' recommendation was made, and in what form. The answer is that the decision was taken collectively at a meeting of Ministers on 9 December.

The right hon. and learned Gentleman went on to ask a number of questions about my meeting with Sir Raymond Lygo. The circumstance of the meeting was that Sir Raymond was, in any event, due to meet my hon. Friend the Minister for Information Technology to discuss, among other things, the Airbus. Therefore, it seemed to me that it would have been wholly artificial if I did not see Sir Raymond as well, and I shall explain why that was so.

Let me make it clear that it is untrue to say that in the course of the meeting I made any suggestion that British Aerospace should withdraw from the European consortium or that its participation was contrary to the national interest. On the contrary, the Government's position was that it was for Westland to decide which course to follow. However, what I said then, and continue to believe, is that the nature and tone of some of the campaigning, and only some of it, on behalf of the European consortium could fuel protectionism and damage the commercial interests of British Aerospace and its European partners, especially in the United States.

The House and the right hon. and learned Gentleman might like to know that Sir Raymond said that the United States subsidiary of British Aerospace had expressed concern about its United States' business being halved. I also said that it was not in the national interest that the uncertainty involving Westland should drag on.

The right hon. and learned Gentleman referred to conversations which he said took place after that meeting. I do not know of them, but I can say that others gave a different impression of what was said or intended at the meeting, and I naturally regret that. If the right hon. and learned Gentleman wants to know why I was concerned about the implication for Airbus sales and thought it appropriate to raise the matter, he will recall that I have already said that Sir Raymond said that the British Aerospace subsidiary had expressed concern about its business being halved. British Aerospace has a substantial stake in the A320 airbus and, as its sponsoring Minister, I am naturally concerned to protect this interest.

The House also knows that the Government are committed to advancing £250 million launch aid for that project. The recovery of all but £50 million is dependent upon the sale of the aircraft. For all those reasons, I was naturally concerned at the possibility that Airbus sales might be made more difficult, not by the participation of Sir Raymond and British Aerospace in the consortium, but by the tone of some of the things said.

The right hon. and learned Gentleman asked for collaboration of what I have said about the meeting with Sir Raymond. Present at the meeting were a number of civil servants, as well as my hon. Friend the Minister for Information Technology. I have checked the recollection of all those present against mine, and the account that I have given to the House has been confirmed by every official present, as well as by my hon. Friend the Minister for Information Technology. The disclosure of the note is not a matter for me, but I shall consider the right hon. and learned Gentleman's request.

What happens at tomorrow's meeting may be inconclusive. It would be unwise, faced with the meeting of shareholders tomorrow, for the House or for me to speculate on the many alternative possibilities that could arise. It would be wrong to attempt to do so today.

Mr. Michael Heseltine (Henley): May I ask my right hon. and learned Friend whether the Government have received any letters from British Aerospace giving its views of the meeting?

Mr. Brittan: I have not received any such letter.

Mr. Paddy Ashdown (Yeovil): I wish to return from the wider issues to the matters of the affair which particularly affect my constituency. Does the Secretary of State accept that the vast majority of both the work force at Westland and the smaller shareholders back the decision of the Westland board? Will he confirm that the Anglo-Italian helicopter project, which is vital to Westland's future, is founded on an agreement between the two Governments, not on an agreement between the firms, and that Westland's position as the British Government's chosen instrument cannot be affected? Does the Secretary of State agree that future helicopter projects, which also rest on agreements between Governments, will depend on whom the British Government choose as their representative, and that neither of the two decisions before shareholders tomorrow can threaten Westland's position as the British Government's representative on future European collaborative projects?

Mr. Brittan: The views of the work force are well enough known, and the hon. Gentleman has said what they are. The shareholders must give such weight as they think appropriate to those views.

With regard to the Government's support for Westland, as my right hon. Friend the Prime Minister made clear in her letter of 1 January, the Government will give their support to Westland in Europe and elsewhere so long as the company carries on business in Britain, irrespective of which consortium takes an interest in the company.

Mr. Patrick McNair-Wilson (New Forest): I congratulate my right hon. and learned Friend on his fair statement of events. Is he aware that for months suppliers to Westland and others have been desperately worried about the problems surrounding the company's finances, and whether they would be paid? That was even before the Ministry of Defence, the Europeans or anybody proposed anything resembling a rescue package. As Westland is not a nationalised industry, and as this is not a takeover bid, would it not be far wiser to have a moment of silence so that Sir John Cuckney, who is an able chairman, and his board can produce the best deal for the company?

Mr. Brittan: My hon. Friend is entirely right in saying that for some considerable time there have been anxieties about the finances of Westland. On his second point, although it is right that I should make the statement to the House, it is also right that we should be careful what we say, because there is a shareholders' meeting tomorrow and it would be wrong to apply any improper influence today.

Mr. Merlyn Rees (Morley and Leeds, South): Was the correcting letter from the Law Officers to the Secretary of State for Defence seen by the right hon. and learned Gentleman or his Department before it was sent to the Ministry of Defence?

Mr. Brittan: I saw the letter after it was sent.

Mr. John Wilkinson (Ruislip-Northwood): Does my right hon. and learned Friend see any potential conflict of interest in the fact that the head of the procurement executive, Mr. Peter Levene, was formerly the chairman of United Scientific Holdings? Is my right hon. and learned Friend aware that Mr. Levene was appointed at a salary vastly in excess of that of the chiefs of staff by the former Secretary of State for Defence, who assured the House that there would be no potential conflict? Yet United Scientific Holdings is now being blackmailed by the French Ministry of Defence, which says that an order that it could have in France will be withdrawn if the European consortium's offer is not accepted.

Mr. Brittan: I was not aware of that latter fact. I am sure that Mr. Levene has conducted himself with complete propriety.

Mr. Lewis Carter-Jones (Eccles): As the sponsoring Minister for the Westland W30 helicopter, will the Secretary of State tell us in what ways he collaborated with the former Secretary of State for Defence in establishing the European consortium?

Mr. Brittan: I said to Westland before the matter came between me and my right hon. Friend the former Secretary of State for Defence that I thought it should look into the possibility of a European alternative to the United Technologies-Fiat offer which had already come forward. I therefore invited my right hon. Friend to begin that search. At a later stage—last October—at a meeting attended by, among other people, my right hon. Friend the then Secretary of State for Defence, I indicated my strong view that the search for a European alternative should continue and go ahead.

Mr. Jerry Wiggin (Weston-super-Mare): Is my right hon. and learned Friend aware that there is substantial concern among the work force, because of the extraordinary circumstances surrounding this affair, that neither proposition will come to fruition? In such circumstances, does my right hon. and learned Friend accept that the Government have a firm responsibility to save Westland from receivership?

Mr. Brittan: I very much hope that the matter will be resolved. I must make it clear that I cannot accept responsibility on behalf of the Government. As a result of the actions taken by the Government, including my right hon. Friend the former Secretary of State for Defence, the company is faced with two alternatives, both of which are better than anything that any fair-minded person could reasonably have expected was likely to come forward several weeks ago.

Mr. Stephen Ross (Isle of Wight): Is the right hon. and learned Gentleman aware that Westland Aerospace, a totally owned subsidiary, is the largest industrial employer in my constituency and is therefore vital to the well-being of the Isle of Wight? Does the right hon. and learned Gentleman know also that that company is profitable? Does he further know that most of that profit comes from the work of Boeing and de Haviland—de Haviland now being a subsidiary of Boeing? Does he know also that the work force and middle management voted overwhelmingly the other day in favour of the deal with Sikorsky—by, I think, 1,200 to seven? Will the right hon. and learned Gentleman confirm that Sikorsky has behaved impeccably throughout this trauma? Does he not believe that that should be taken seriously into account by the shareholders at tomorrow's meeting?

Mr. Brittan: The House will have heard the hon. Gentleman's expression of views on the opinions of his constituents. On the question of Sikorsky's behaviour, I am not at the Dispatch Box to make criticisms of either side in this deal.

Sir Peter Tapsell (East Lindsey): In view of the important national defence interest involved, and irrespective of the bid that one might favour, how is it possible for the Government not to have a view on which bid is better for this country?

Mr. Brittan: One reason is that the security of supply of helicopters for the armed forces is assured. That is not, therefore, a problem. Another reason, which is of some importance, is that Westland's board has told shareholders that United Technologies has made it clear that it wishes Westland to retain its own helicopter research, design and development capability.

Mr. Michael Foot (Blaenau Gwent): I refer the right hon. and learned Gentleman to the important answer that he gave to my right hon. Friend the Member for Morley and Leeds, South (Mr. Rees). From where did the information come that misleading information had been given by the former Secretary of State for Defence, if his Department did not know about it? How did the Law Officers know that there was misleading information if they had not consulted the right hon. Gentleman's Department? Was the right hon. and learned Gentleman surprised when the matter was "leaked", if I may use that offensive word, a few hours later? Is the right hon. and learned Gentleman a party to the wishes of those hon. Members who seek an investigation into how that possible breach of the Official Secrets Act 1911 occurred?

Mr. Brittan: The right hon. Gentleman is well enough experienced in government to know that it is inconceivable that anyone asking such questions when his party was in power would have obtained an answer.

Dr. Keith Hampson (Leeds, North-West): My right hon. learned Friend said in his statement that the Government had asked that the European rescue option be fully explored. In replying to a question a few moments ago he said that he had confirmed at the 18 October meeting his strong support for pursuing the European option. Yet a few weeks ago he rebutted press speculation that he had expressed a preference for a European option. Would it not be in the interests of my right hon. and learned Friend and everyone involved in this affair if he were to make the position clear by placing in the Library the minutes that he wrote for 4 and 18 October?

Mr. Brittan: I think that I can make the position perfectly clear without doing that. There is all the difference in the world between wishing for an alternative to be explored and taking the view that the alternative, which at that stage had not been explored, was preferable.

Mr. Gavin Strang (Edinburgh, East): Is the right hon. and learned Gentleman aware that he has failed to satisfy the House about what he said to British Aerospace? Is it not clear that at that meeting he expressed a preference implicitly, and perhaps even explicitly, for the American deal? If so, was that not incompatible with Government policy as stated to the House?

Mr. Brittan: The account that I have given of the meeting is accurate. I do not think that to warn people of the consequences of pursuing matters in a particular way, which they had accepted, and of which they had had word from their subsidiary—I am not accusing a particular person, but certain things had been said involving anti-Americanism which were likely to damage their interests—is the same as expressing a preference for the deal.

Mr. Teddy Taylor (Southend, East): Has my right hon. and learned Friend not been subjected to unjustified and cruel criticism? Will he confirm that on 19 December the Cabinet unanimously agreed that Ministers would not campaign for either option and that that agreement was consistently and repeatedly breached, not by my right hon. and learned Friend, but by the former Secretary of State for Defence?

Mr. Brittan: It is true that the Cabinet agreed that no one should campaign for either option. I understand, of course, that my right hon. Friend the former Secretary of State for Defence strongly felt that the European option should be pursued vigorously. I imagine that some of the things that were said in the course of that led my right hon. Friend to the conclusion that he reached.

Mr. Andrew Faulds (Warley, East): Is not the central problem the fact that the Prime Minister always intends to have her own way, however deviously she does so, in contravention of collective decision-taking? Is not her greatest strength her unawareness of her limitations?

Mr. Brittan: No, Sir.

Mr. Michael Mates (Hampshire, East): Did my right hon. and learned Friend report the substance of his conversations last Wednesday evening with Sir Raymond Lygo to his Cabinet colleagues the following morning?

Mr. Brittan: No. There was no reason to do so. It was agreed at the Cabinet meeting the following morning to affirm the previous policy, which I had already expressed to the House. There was nothing at the meeting with Sir Raymond Lygo that would have led me or anyone else to wish to change that policy.

Mr. Ian Wrigglesworth (Stockton, South): In view of the Government's assertions of even-handedness in this matter, can the right hon. and learned Gentleman shed any light on the suggestion that there were discussions between the Prime Minister and President Reagan about the Sikorsky bid and aid for Westland Helicopters? Were there any discussions with the American Administration?

Mr. Brittan: I am not aware of any such discussions.

Mr. Anthony Beaumont-Dark (Birmingham, Selly Oak): In answering my right hon. Friend the Member for Henley (Mr. Heseltine), my right hon. and learned Friend said that he had received no such letter. In view of the importance of the conversation that is purported to have taken place, has any other member of the Government received any representations or letter from Sir Raymond Lygo or British Aerospace?

Mr. Brittan: I can only speak for myself.

Mr. Jeff Rooker (Birmingham, Perry Barr): Will the Secretary of State address the first question that was asked my right hon. and learned Friend the Member for Monklands, East (Mr. Smith)? On 16 December, why did the Secretary of State refer to the Government's decision to abandon the national armaments directors' recommendation from 13 December? In his answer, he said that the matter was relevant to 9 December. What happened on 13 December which caused him to refer to 13 December if there was no meeting of the Government on that day?

Mr. Brittan: The meeting on 9 December decided that if by 4 pm on 13 December there was no offer from the European consortium which the Westland board felt able to commend to its shareholders, from that moment the national armaments directors' recommendation would not continue to have any effect. The decision was taken on 9 December as to what would happen on 13 December. What had happened was announced on 16 December.

Mr. Michael Grylls (Surrey, North-West): As the Ministry of Defence is Westland's major customer, is it not desirable that if possible there should be a European alternative to the Sikorsky terms so that there can be competitive tenders?

Mr. Brittan: I see the advantage of competition. The implications of that aspect of the matter must be considered.

Mr. Tam Dalyell (Linlithgow): In answer to the right hon. Member for Henley (Mr. Heseltine), the former Secretary of State for Defence, the Secretary of State referred to the crucial British Aerospace letters and emphasised to the House, "I did not." He was then asked by the hon. Member for Birmingham, Selly Oak (Mr. Beaumont-Dark) if he knew whether other members of the Cabinet did, to which he replied, "I can only speak for myself." Would it not be more candid for the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry frankly to tell us that if he did not read them, the Prime Minister did?

Mr. Brittan: I have given an account of the meeting, and I have nothing further to add.

Mr. Patrick Cormack (Staffordshire, South): Why should the House of Commons have more confidence in my right hon. and learned Friend's judgment of the defence implications of this matter than in the judgment of our right hon. Friend the Member for Henley (Mr. Heseltine), bearing in mind that throughout his distinguished tenure of office he enjoyed the Prime Minister's wholehearted confidence?

Mr. Brittan: I am not inviting the House to do what my hon. Friend suggests I am inviting it to do.

Mr. Martin Flannery (Sheffield, Hillsborough): In view of the profound interest in this matter throughout the nation and Europe, and the almost unprecedented attendance here on a Monday afternoon—[Interruption.]—Tory Members may laugh, but they have something to hide. Why is the Secretary of State treating this serious subject so cavalierly, by not giving proper answers to the questions that he is being asked? Has he something to conceal? Has he read the advertisement in The Times this morning about the mess that British science is in? Does he realise that we are all fearful that our technology is about to disappear to the United States and that our armaments and defence industries are being sold for a mess of potage to a group of shareholders who have no interest in British working people?

Mr. Brittan: That is a view which the hon. Gentleman is entitled to hold. If he is worried about the interests of British working people, he will no doubt also have noted the clear view of the British working people working for Westland in Yeovil.

Mr. Ivor Stanbrook (Orpington): Is my right hon. and learned Friend aware that the motives of my right hon. Friend the Member for Henley (Mr. Heseltine) have wide support in the country and in the House? If the Government are sincere about their commitment to Europe, why did they not prefer European participation from the beginning?

Mr. Brittan: The answer is that it was not forthcoming.

Mr. Dennis Skinner (Bolsover): The Secretary of State for Trade and Industry has been asked two questions about the meeting with the chairman of British Aerospace. The right hon. Member for Henley (Mr. Heseltine) asked whether the Government had received a letter from the chairman, and the Secretary of State was subsequently asked the same question again. He dodged answering it on both occasions by meekly saying that he could only speak for himself. Does he not understand that the conviction politician has dodged the column today and that he has been put in her place to answer question? Now that he has been put there, it is his job, not just to answer for himself, but to answer for the Government. That is why he is at the Dispatch Box. He should come clean.

Mr. Brittan: If it helps the hon. Gentleman, I am not aware of any letter from Sir Raymond Lygo to anyone else either.

Mr. Geoffrey Dickens (Littleborough and Saddleworth): Will my right hon. and learned Friend explain why the former Secretary of State for Defence places his store firmly behind the British-European option, which I support, when he had the solution for saving Westland in his own hands while he was Secretary of State for Defence? Why did he never place orders for more helicopters with Westland?

Mr. Brittan: The Ministry of Defence took the view, which I wish to make clear I am not in any way criticising, that it was unable to confirm a requirement for support helicopters, for which Westland had been hoping. The Ministry also declined a request from the company to place additional orders for W30 helicopters to help with its short-term problems because there was no military requirement for such helicopters. I wish to make it clear that those are the facts, and that I am not criticising the former Secretary of State for Defence for coming to those conclusions.

Mr. D. N. Campbell-Savours (Workington): If the contents of the letter from Sir Raymond Lygo are at variance with the statement by the Secretary of State, in order to secure the fullest possible disclosure will the Secretary of State attend, and allow his officials to attend, a hearing of the Select Committee on Defence so that they may be questioned by members of the Committee?

Mr. Brittan: I assure the hon. Gentleman that all Select Committees of the House will be treated with the normal respect to which they are entitled.

Mr. Robert Adley (Christchurch): Is my right hon. and learned Friend aware that three years before he—my right hon. and learned Friend—came to the House I accompanied the right hon. Member for Chesterfield (Mr Benn) to New York and Washington, at the suggestion and request of the then Minister for Aerospace and the Conservative Government, to defend the concerted attacks on the Concorde project by the American aerospace industry, which was determined to kill it? In my right hon. and learned Friend's opinion, is the American aerospace industry any less determined to neuter or takeover the British aerospace industry? Does he believe that the Government are interested in protecting this country's national aerospace interest? Does he accept that a Rolls-Royce 1971 proposition for Westland is infinitely better than bankruptcy?

Mr. Brittan: Happily, as a result of the action taken by the Government, including my right hon. Friend the former Secretary of State for Defence, something very much better than that now faces Westland. I was protecting British Aerospace, in its capacity as a member of the Airbus consortium, which is an example of European co-operation, from the threat to the orders which it has successfully secured in the United States, against tremendous opposition from Boeing, being jeopardised.

Mr. D. E. Thomas (Meirionnydd Nant Conwy): Will the Secretary of State comment on press reports that if Westland were to become a subsidiary of United Technologies it would become involved in strategic defence initiative work as a subcontractor, and that that might be contrary to the memorandum signed by the former Secretary of State for Defence and his United States counterpart?

Mr. Brittan: I cannot comment on those press reports. I do not know of their validity.

Mr. Robert Jackson (Wantage): Does my right hon. and learned Friend consider that this episode has advanced or retarded the cause of European defence industrial collaboration?

Mr. Brittan: Neither.

Mr. James Callaghan (Cardiff, South and Penarth): On a point of order, Mr. Speaker. It is some years since the matter arose, but it is my recollection that Ministers are entitled to refer to Government documents and those documents need not be published. However, it is my recollection that if a Minister quotes from a document, the document is then published. I believe that I heard the Secretary of State quote to the House what Sir Raymond Lygo said to him about the British Airbus. In those circumstances, I ask you to consider whether the substance of that conversation should be published.

Mr. Speaker: I did not hear the Secretary of State quote from a Government document

Mr. Brittan: I assure the right hon. Gentleman—I know of his interest in these matters—that I did not quote from the document.

Mr. Gerald Howarth (Cannock and Burntwood): Is it the case that, for the shareholders of Westland to have a choice, the recommendation of the national armaments directors had to be rejected by the Government? As a result, the work force and shareholders have a choice. Does my right hon. and learned Friend agree that it is intolerable that a private sector company has had to endure so much pressure at a time when it had found a solution to its problems and was within sight of achieving that solution, which could now be in jeopardy?

Mr. Brittan: The board of Westland came up with proposals which it believed would lead to a solution of the problems. It is also the case that as long as the national armaments directors' recommendation remained on the table, the Sikorsky-Fiat proposals could not go ahead.

Several Hon. Members rose——

Mr. Speaker: Order. I must have regard to the fact that there is other important business to follow this statement. I shall allow questions to continue for a further five minutes, by which time we will have had a full half hour for Back-Benchers' questions.

Mr. Callaghan: Further to my point of order, Mr. Speaker. It is my clear recollection, because I noted it at the time, that the Secretary of State was reading the answer given by Sir Raymond Lygo. I am ready to admit that I may be wrong, but I noted the fact especially because I have had this matter in mind. I ask you to check Hansard carefully to ensure what happened and to give a ruling on the matter.

Mr. Speaker: The House heard what the Secretary of State said on that matter.

Mr. Callaghan: Further to that point of order——

Mr. Speaker: Order. The right hon. Gentleman asked me whether I would check the record, and I shall do so.

Mr. Robin Maxwell-Hyslop (Tiverton): A similar point was raised in the debate on the Second Reading of the Maplin Development Bill, when my right hon. Friend the Member for Henley (Mr. Heseltine) was purported to quote from a document which he declined to lay on the Table of the House, although he was pressed to do so. Perhaps the Father of the House would consider that precedent and the ruling was made on it.

Mr. Speaker: Order. We must not be distracted by Maplin today.

Mr. Robert C. Brown (Newcastle upon Tyne, North): Further to the question asked by the right hon. Member for Henley (Mr. Heseltine), is the Secretary of State aware of any letter received by Her Majesty's Government from British Aerospace? Is the Secretary of State aware that when he states from the Dispatch Box that he can only speak for himself he is seriously misleading the House? Any Minister of any rank who speaks from the Dispatch Box speaks for the Government.

Mr. Brittan: I have already answered that point in reply to the hon. Member for Bolsover (Mr. Skinner).

Mr. Doug Hoyle (Warrington, North): Will the Secretary of State explain in more detail how the Government took the decision of non-intervention, in view of the defence implications of a Westland takeover? Can he say whether it was considered that Sikorsky might not be satisfied with a partial shareholding and that it might try to take over the entire company in the future?

From the explanation in the statement about the interview with the chairman of British Aerospace, when the Minister said that British Aerospace was aware of the American implications, could it appear that he was bullying the chairman of British Aerospace? Has he considered following the example of the right hon. Member for Henley (Mr. Heseltine) and resigning from the Cabinet in view of the fact that he broke his undertaking of non-intervention to the House on 16 December?

Mr. Brittan: The answer to the latter point is no.

In taking their decision the Government took into account all questions, such as defence procurement and other matters, and took the view that the options available did not justify Government intervention.

Mr. Dave Nellist (Coventry, South-East): What confidence can the workers of Westland have in the job guarantees from either of the teams of big business which have been gazumping each other during recent days, especially from the team led by Lord Weinstock, who, during the past four to six weeks, has axed more than 1,000 jobs in GEC in my constituency?

If defence is the national priority which the right hon. and learned Gentleman and the Prime Minister consistently state it is, why do the Government not follow the example of the right hon. Member for Old Bexley and Sidcup (Mr. Heath) in 1971 and nationalise Westland and give guarantees to the work force that any surplus capacity will be used to make socially useful goods?

Mr. Brittan: The hon. Gentleman is merging defence considerations with industrial considerations. For defence, the Government must be able to ensure that helicopters are available from a secure NATO source. For industry, the Government's aim must be to further the rescue that would be in the company's best interests. The two offers would secure those objectives. I believe that the Government have not done all that badly.

Mr. Ken Eastham (Manchester, Blackley): The right hon. and learned Gentleman mentioned the millions of pounds invested by the Government — which is taxpayers' money. Regardless of which company is successful, will the right hon. and learned Gentleman state whether there will be any protection of technical design in Britain? Will the Minister discuss the offset problems and the possibilities for companies such as Rolls-Royce which make helicopter engines?

Mr. Brittan: Rolls-Royce has expressed an interest in this matter. However, in view of the commercially sensitive position, I should not discuss that matter before tomorrow. That could appear to favour one side — [Interruption.] I hear one of my hon. Friends say, "In favour of Sikorsky", but that must be a matter for Rolls-Royce.

Mr. John Smith: With regard to the meeting with Sir Raymond Lygo, the Secretary of State said that he had cheched the recollections of colleagues and officials. Did he check a written record? Does a written record exist? It has been drawn to my attention that in a newspaper yesterday an allegation was made that during the discussion the Secretary of State indicated to officials that he did not wish that matter to be recorded. Can the Secretary of State give his reaction to that allegation? When will that record be made available to hon. Members?

As to the so-called concern about the adverse impact on British Aerospace sales, it is clear from the Secretary of State that he does not accuse Sir Raymond Lygo or British Aerospace of creating the problem. To whose statement was he referring?

Mr. Brittan: There is no truth in the hon. Gentleman's point about a matter not being recorded. On the point about what in the campaign led me to take that view, I can safely state, without referring to any statements, that many things were said during the course of the campaign implying that the sole interest of any United States involvement was to reduce Westland's status to low technology. Any suggestion to that effect is contrary to the expressed statement of United Technologies. It is entirely open to people to take one view or another as to which offer is to be preferred, but such allegations are completely untrue —[HON. MEMBERS: "Check the record."] I have already said that I will look into that.

Imported Goods (Safety)

4.30 pm

Mr. Conal Gregory (York): I beg to ask leave to move the Adjournment of the House, under Standing Order No. 10, for the purpose of discussing a specific and important matter that should have urgent consideration, namely,

"the death and injury sustained through the sale of dangerous imported consumer goods over the Christmas period."

Christmas should be a time of happiness as we celebrate the anniversary of the birth of Jesus Christ. In too many homes this festive time has been marred by injuries received from imported goods, especially toys, and even by death. The present legislation, which does not require importers to show a duty of care that any goods have been checked on safety grounds, is clearly inadequate.

I urge you, Mr. Speaker, to recognise that the matter is so urgent that it should have priority over the business that has already been arranged for the House. The urgency stems from the fact that the goods which cause injury and death have not been prohibited from sale. Exporters from the far east are still shipping dangerous products to the United Kingdom and apparently not testing them against the criteria employed by the British Standards Institution. Britain cannot become the home of cheap, shoddy goods that have deadly consequences.

The debate requested is specific since it seeks to deal with dangerous imported consumer goods. New regulations are overdue, as foreshadowed in the Government's White Paper. Their absence from the statute book can be quantified in the human suffering endured in too many homes during the recess. This is the first opportunity to raise the subject in the House since Christmas. It is also an opportunity for all sides to recognise that prohibition notices and orders, together with voluntary codes of practice, have proved inadequate.

The subject is important. On 20 December, in Yorkshire, a five-month-old baby boy died as a direct consequence of playing with a dangerous imported toy. He was asphyxiated by the nylon hair on a toy pony imported from Taiwan. This was a new and tragic development since my hon. Friend the Minister responded to my Adjournment debate last year. Customs officers must have powers to seize and control dangerous imports, and trading standards officers must be given powers to protect the public. Such goods should not have the ability to maim and kill. Far too many non-United Kingdom goods, especially toys, purchased before Christmas and still being traded have potentially lethal consequences. We owe it to the nation to amend the legislation. I hope that you, Mr. Speaker, will permit the time to debate this matter.

Mr. Speaker: The hon. Gentleman asks leave to move the Adjournment of the House for the purpose of discussing a specific and important matter that he believes should have urgent consideration, namely,

"the death and injury sustained through the sale of dangerous imported consumer goods over the Christmas period."

I listened with great care to what the hon. Gentleman said, but I regret that I do not consider that the matter that he has raised is appropriate for discussion under Standing Order No. 10 and I cannot, therefore, submit his application to the House.

Statutory Instruments, &c.

Mr. Speaker: With the leave of the House, I shall put together the three motions relating to statutory instruments.

Ordered,

That the Representation of the People (Northern Ireland) (Amendment) Regulations 1985 be referred to a Standing Committee on Statutory Instruments, &c.

That the draft Asian Development Bank (Extension of Limit on Guarantees) Order 1985 be referred to a Standing Committee on Statutory Instruments, &c.

That the Local Government Reorganisation (Transitional Provisions) Order 1985 (S.I., 1985, No. 1781) be referred to a Standing Committee on Statutory Instruments, &c. — [Mr. Lennox-Boyd].

Orders of the Day

Public Order Bill

Order for Second Reading read.

4.34 pm

Mr. Speaker: Before I call the Secretary of State, I should tell the House that I have selected the amendment in the name of the Leader of the Opposition.

The Secretary of State for the Home Department (Mr. Douglas Hurd): I beg to move, That the Bill be now read a Second time.

I must start with the principle that underlies the Bill. Public order is the fundamental social good. It is a principle of which we were reminded several times during 1985. We shall hear much today and in the debates to come about human rights and freedoms, and rightly so. But let us not forget that the right to go about one's lawful occasions in peace is the underlying human right without which all others are nugatory.

Quiet streets and a peaceful framework for our individual lives can never be taken for granted. For short periods of our history it seemed that public order was established for ever. Other periods, such as the first decade of this century, on which we may look back wistfully, included plenty of public violence. The threat to public order comes in different shapes at different times. That means that the measures needed to safeguard public order and protect the public must be re-examined from time to time. It is half a century since Parliament set itself to that task, and society and its habits have changed radically. It is not unreasonable that the Public Order Act 1936 should be followed by a Public Order Act 1986.

Change must be steadily and carefully considered, and panic and anger are bad guides to this. That is true of all legislation, but especially of Home Office legislation, and even more especially of public order legislation. I make it clear that the Bill was not cobbled together in hasty reaction to last autumn's riots. That is self-evident from its content, and everyone who has followed the proposals knows that their ancestry is older than that and different. When rioting of the sort described in the Metropolitan police report in today's newspapers breaks out, the problem confronting the police is not a shortage of legal powers, but one of enforcement. As I shall try to show, the Bill does not detract from our traditional philosophy of policing, which is based on the principles of policing by co-operation with the public and the minimum use of force. The police are anxious to maintain that tradition, and so am I.

Part I is drawn largely from the English Law Commission's report published in 1983. We agree with the commission that public order offences should be clearly stated in modern language, and part I revises and codifies the common law offences in England and Wales. No change is made to the common law in Scotland, where the Scottish Law Commission is still considering the law on mobbing and rioting.

In England and Wales, the common law offences are replaced by new statutory offences of riot, violent disorder and affray. Clause 1 defines the new offence of riot, which will be committed when 12 or more people use or threaten violence to achieve a common purpose. Only those using violence will be guilty of the offence. The White Paper suggested a maximum penalty of 10 years' imprisonment for this offence. However, it is the most serious public order offence, and we have provided a maximum penalty of life imprisonment. It does now have a maximum penalty of life for an offence drawn rather more loosely than we propose. On balance, we decided to propose the retention of the present maximum sentence of life imprisonment for the new offence, which will be more strictly defined and which will have a higher threshold.

Clause 2 creates the offence of violent disorder to replace the existing offence of unlawful assembly, with a maximum penalty on indictment of five years' imprisonment or an unlimited fine. Violent disorder will be used in the future as the normal charge for serious outbreaks of public disorder.

Clause 3 largely restates the existing common law offence of affray, with minor changes. I shall not dwell on that. However, I should dwell on clause 5, because the new offence of disorderly conduct has proved controversial in some quarters and is likely to remain so.

The proposal in clause 5 will penalise behaviour which is not itself violent but which is "threatening, abusive, insulting or disorderly, and"

—I emphasise the word "and"—is likely to cause alarm, harassment or distress.

The right hon. Member for Manchester, Gorton (Mr. Kaufman) at one time welcomed such an offence in principle. I can understand why. Right hon. and hon. Members who represent inner cities know how many of their constituents suffer from the mischiefs of hooliganism.

The new offence is aimed at protecting those in our communities who are most vulnerable to loutish and abusive behaviour—particularly the elderly and people from the ethnic minorities. Many hon. Members will be only too familiar with the type of behaviour to which I refer. It casts a blight upon an area, whether it be a shopping precinct or a city housing estate, and makes the lives of people living there fearful and miserable. People are frightened to open their own front doors. They are kept awake by rowdy behaviour late at night. Ethnic minority families are victimised with racialist slogans and abuse. Gangs of hooligans make some pedestrian and shopping areas places where ordinary people fear to go. There cannot be many right hon. and hon. Members who do not have examples in their postbags and at their surgeries.

Mr. Harry Cohen (Leyton): The Secretary of State rightly refers to ethnic minorities being the victims of racial harassment. Why have the Government not taken the opportunity of the Bill to make racial harassment a specific criminal offence?

Mr. Hurd: If the hon. Gentleman examines the events which constitute racial attacks he will find that they are offences anyway. It seems better to encourage the police in London and elsewhere to take the matter seriously, to issue new guidelines and to let the offence be treated as it is, seriously, with a racial connotation, but within the existing definition of offences. That is better than to single out an offence as the hon. Member for Leyton (Mr. Cohen) suggests.

Clause 5 takes account of the many helpful comments that we received when we asked for suggestions on how the new offence of disorderly conduct should be defined. First, we have abandoned the requirement of proof of actual alarm, harassment or distress. That would have required the victim to give evidence in court. Several bodies represented strongly to us that the more vulnerable victims were most unlikely to be prepared to face their persecutors in case things went wrong and the persecution became worse.

Mr. Robert Maclennan (Caithness and Sutherland): This is the single most important departure from the White Paper. Who made the representations? How does the Secretary of State answer the argument that he set out so clearly in paragraph 3.26 of the White Paper, which makes it clear that safeguards are required?

Mr. Hurd: We have said throughout that the clause would be difficult to draw. My predecessor set out fairly and clearly in the White Paper the arguments for and against this offence and the considerations in drawing it. Those who commented on the reluctance of victims to go to court to give evidence included the police, the Magistrates' Association, the Association of Metropolitan Authorities, the Society of Prosecuting Solicitors and a number of individuals. When I came to office and considered the Bill, I thought that the case was strongly made out.

We have also dropped the requirement that the alarm, harassment or distress be substantial, in response to criticism that this would present the court with an impossible measurement task. We have introduced a limited power of arrest, which will apply only if a defendant fails to desist from disorderly conduct after a police warning, and we have raised the maximum fine to £400.

Those are the principal changes that we have made since the White Paper foreshadowed this offence. The offence has not been easy to draft. We know what we are aiming at and we do not intend to lose that purpose, but we are certainly open to suggestions on drafting.

Mr. Gerald Kaufman (Manchester, Gorton): Paragraph 3.26 of the White paper is clear. It says:

"Any degree of annoyance or disturbance will not suffice."

At what stage did the Home Secretary decide that "Any degree of annoyance or disturbance" would suffice when his predecessor had said that so categorically?

Mr. Hurd: I decided after studying the representations and arguments. The right hon. Member for Gorton is referring to the "substantial" argument — a different point. Setting the courts the task of measuring is unreasonable. However the right hon. Member is entitled to argue his case in Committee.

The response to the White Paper convinced us that we must act to provide the police with more effective powers to protect the public against hooligan behaviour. But we have no desire to use the criminal law to enforce a particular social standard or to worsen relations between young people and the police. This is a law against hooliganism, not against high spirits. It is carefully drafted to avoid the risks of reviving a sus law. Before the right hon. Member for Gorton shakes his head too definitively, I ask him to follow the argument. I hope that we have avoided the risk of reviving a sus law by requiring that the person committing the acts must know or have reasonable cause to believe that his behaviour is likely to cause alarm, harassment or distress. It is the concept of alarm, harassment or distress which distinguishes what we now propose from the old sus law. Let us look carefully at the drafting, but I hope that before any right hon. or hon. Member opposes the clause he will reflect for a minute on the fear and unhappiness that hooliganism inflicts on so many of our fellow citizens. We believe that we have the job of finding a remedy.

Mr. Douglas Hogg (Grantham): I note that the Home Secretary is anxious to avoid this part of the Bill being abused. He will appreciate that the Bill as drafted enables a constable to arrest without warrant in the event of the conduct being repeated after warning. Would it not be a good idea for the power to arrest to arise only if the constable has given warning that an arrest will follow if the offender does not desist from his conduct?

Mr. Hurd: I should like to consider whether that is practicable. It points in the direction in which I wanted to move when considering whether there should be a power of arrest at all. Some people believe that there should not be such a power and others say that the Bill would be pointless without it. I shall consider my hon. Friend's suggestion.

Mr. William Cash (Stafford): I have corresponded with my right hon. Friend about riots. Will he consider proposing that a warning be given in advance of action by the police?

Mr. Hurd: My hon. Friend has put that suggestion to me and it has been considered. My hon. Friend might have the opportunity to argue his case but we do not believe that his proposal is likely to be practicable in real life. One of the difficulties is that people might be caught up in a riot but not have committed an offence. If it were an offence to be present after the equivalent of the Riot Act had been read, a person might become caught up. For the moment, we do not think that my hon. Friend's suggestion should find a place in the Bill.

Part II of the Bill deals with processions and assemblies. It establishes a new legal framework for the holding of processions, demonstrations and assemblies, building on the framework already provided by the Public Order Act 1936. We want to ensure that the right to protest, to march and to picket peacefully is regulated only to the extent necessary to preserve order and to protect the rights of others. We have therefore concentrated on trying to ensure that the law provides the police with adequate powers to prevent and deal with violence and disorder, while freedom of speech and the right to protest continue to be safeguarded.

Clause 11 deals with advance notice and sets out a new national requirement for the organisers of marches to give seven days' notice to the police. The requirement exists already in Scotland and there are advance notice requirements in local legislation in parts of England and Wales. Lord Scarman and the Select Committee both supported a requirement of advance notice, which would enable discussions between the organisers of marches and the police to take place in good time. The vast majority of march organisers already give notice to the police, and we think it absurd that the police should have to rely on chance and rumour to learn about marches that are organised by a minority of irresponsible groups, which could give rise to violence on the streets and serious disorder.

In March 1985, the Metropolitan police learnt about a proposed National Front march in Greenwich only as a result of leaflets left at a London railway station, yet the march and opposition to it posed a sufficient threat to public order that the police had eventually to seek consent to a ban.

Mr. David Winnick (Walsall, North): I take the Home Secretary's point about National Front marches, and I accept, as I am sure my hon. Friends do, that there are certain problems. However, does he recognise that his proposals will cause a great deal of concern to genuine demonstrators? We are living in a democratic country and we must bear in mind always that people have a right to demonstrate on the spur of the moment as strikes develop, for example. Another example is when residents feel strongly that something should be done immediately on their behalf. Therefore, the provisions in the Bill could undermine important and basic democratic rights.

Mr. Hurd: I direct the hon. Gentleman's attention to clause 11(4). We believe that we have provided there for exactly the sort of case that he has in mind. There is a specific relaxation of the requirement for marches called at short notice because of some emergency. The hon. Gentleman thought of one example, and another is when a dramatic event abroad suddenly blows up, against which some people want to protest.

Clause 12 widens the existing powers of the police that are contained in section 3 of the Public Order Act 1936 to impose conditions on marches. At present, the sole ground for imposing conditions is to prevent serious public disorder. We propose to add three new tests—the need to prevent serious damage to property, serious disruption of the life of the community, and the intimidation of others. The second test—serious disruption of the life of the community — was proposed by the Select Committee. I shall not repeat the way in which it described vividly the sort of disruption that can be caused by marches. We believe that the police should have the power to re-route a march to limit the resulting congestion of traffic, to prevent a bridge being blocked, for example, or to stop a city centre being brought to a standstill.

The third test of intimidation is a libertarian safeguard that will prevent demonstrations being used by those whose real purpose is to intimidate and coerce and not to persuade. The National Front provides examples. The provision that we propose would enable National Front marches in suitable instances to be routed away from racially sensitive areas.

I should stress that the new tests will not enable the police to ban a procession. The power to ban marches does not rest with the police. That power remains unchanged and it is re-enacted in clause 13. Nor are the new powers open-ended. The police will be able to impose conditions only if they reasonably apprehend serious disorder, damage, disruption or intimidation. As now — this is crucial — any decision by the police to impose conditions will be subject to judicial review.

Mr. Alex Carlile (Montgomery): The Home Secretary has spoken about tests and referred to clause 11(4), which provides that the full period of notice will not be required when it is not "reasonably practicable" to give it. Does he not recognise that the application of the tests could be purely arbitrary and that the provisions of clause 11(4) are likely in some instances to be completely ineffective unless there is some immediate and available way of testing the merits of a decision that has been made? Does he agree that judicial review is not a way of testing the merits of a decision? Does he not accept that the Government should provide that those wishing to hold a procession or assembly should be able to apply to the local county court or to a Crown court judge for a review of the decision made by the police?

Mr. Hurd: I think that judicial review has proved itself effective. It provides a means of dealing speedily with matters of the sort that we are discussing. That is why we inserted "reasonable" in clauses 12 and 14, especially. I shall consider what the hon. and learned Gentleman says about clause 11(4). However, if someone goes ahead and does not give clear notice, he might expect to have to argue the matter before the courts and persuade them that he was covered by clause 11(4). It would not be too late because he would not have given notice.

Mr. Peter Bruinvels (Leicester, East): Is my right hon. Friend aware that nearly two years ago in Leicester there was a possibility of three different marches taking place in the city on the same day, directed mainly to getting the troops out of Northern Ireland? The council made it clear that it would not apply for the Home Secretary to grant a banning order, even though the Chief Constable appeared to want one. What is my right hon. Friend's advice to chief constables when local authorities refuse to grant such applications on political grounds?

Mr. Hurd: My hon. Friend is tempting me on to ground that I do not intend to cover with the Bill. As I have said, I do not think that we should change the arrangements by which it is the responsibility of councils, outside London, to take a decision on a ban. I am aware of the difficulties that arise occasionally but it should remain a matter of local persuasion.

I shall try to deal with the provisions of clause 14 in full before giving way to further interventions. The clause breaks new ground by conferring upon the police certain preventive powers in relation to open-air assemblies. These powers fall short of those in relation to marches which I have been describing. There will be no requirement of advance notice and there will be no power to ban. The clause introduces a new power to impose conditions. Assemblies and static demonstrations may just as often be the occasion of public disorder as marches and the Government believe that it is unacceptable for gatherings, such as those at Greenham common, or the mass pickets of the miners' strike, to be outside the framework of controls. The clause therefore confers on the police powers to impose conditions on open-air assemblies to prevent, on the same three tests I have mentioned, serious disorder, serious disruption or intimidation.

We stopped short of a power to ban because we believed that that would be an excessive limit on the right of assembly and freedom of speech. For this reason, clause 14 does not permit the police to impose conditions changing the date and time of an assembly. They will be able only to impose conditions limiting its size, location or duration. As with clause 12, any decision by the police to impose conditions will be subject to judicial review. Where a rally threatens serious public disorder, the police will in future be able to relocate it. Where, as in the Stop the City campaign, the demonstrators set out deliberately to be obstructive, the police would have the power to take preventive action. Where pickets obstruct deliberately, or try to, the passage of those going to work, as they did at Grunwick's and Warrington and during the miners' strike, the police would be able to limit their numbers or move them further away from the workers' path.

There is an important point, which has not been grasped fully. As we know from experience during the miners' strike, the police have already substantial powers under the common law to remove people who are threatening a breach of the peace. These existing powers enable the police to take action when trouble is imminent or when it has begun. It seems sensible to us that they should have a preventive power that will enable them to negotiate reasonable ground rules that would prevent trouble happening at all. If the police were to try to impose unjustified conditions, that could be challenged by way of judicial review. As the House will see, the right of peaceful picketing will not be infringed.

Mr. Kaufman: It will.

Mr. Hurd: It will, but it depends on what the right hon. Gentleman thinks is the purpose of picketing. Pickets whose purpose is peacefully to dissuade or communicate information will not be touched by the new measure because this picketing will not be disorderly, disruptive or coercive. But where the purpose of picketing is physically to obstruct or to intimidate rather than to persuade, it is right that the police should have preventive powers.

Mr. David Ashby (Leicestershire, North-West): This clause has a lot to do with the miners' picketing of last year. Is there anything in this Bill that assists with the evidential aspect of the offences that were committed at that time? The problem that arose out of the miners' picketing was the great difficulty in bringing people, who had clearly committed offences, successfully to trial due to evidential difficulties. Is there anything in this Bill that will assist?

Mr. Hurd: I hope when my hon. Friend studies in depth the new definitions of riot and violent disorder he will find that they have been tightened. Areas of uncertainty have been cleared up. We have made it more difficult to obtain a conviction for riot because we have tightened up the definition of that offence. I hope that when my hon. Friend looks at part I as a whole, he will see a tidier framework, which should remove some of the present uncertainties.

Mr. D. E. Thomas (Meirionnydd Nant Conwy): The Secretary of State spoke earlier of the right of protest and demonstration. Does he not accept that clause 14 means that the right of assembly is now to be defined in its formal context by the police? This is a major change to existing legislation.

Mr. Hurd: Where the police have reasonable grounds —I am sure that the hon. Gentleman knows more about the law than I do and he will know the importance of the word "reasonable"—the court can make a test. When the police have reasonable grounds for supposing that there would be serious disorder, serious disruption or intimidation, they can impose conditions which are subject to judicial review. That is the nub of the change that we are proposing.

Part II applies in Scotland, except for clause 11 and clause 13. Scotland has a separate regulatory structure for the control of marches and certain minor changes to the structure are made by the amendments to the Civic Government (Scotland) Act 1982 in schedule 2.

Mr. John Mark Taylor (Solihull): I am most grateful to my right hon. Friend for giving way. He has dealt most tolerantly with so many interventions. Will my right hon. Friend turn his mind to the anxiety of many people about gatherings and so-called festivals at archaeological sites and ancient monuments? At an appropriate stage, will my right hon. Friend consider amendments to part II to assist the police to deal with these matters?

Mr. Hurd: Such amendments will be considered, as I know that many hon. Members feel strongly about this. My hon. Friend the Minister will deal with this in the winding-up speech.

I will not dwell on part III, which deals with racial hatred and provides additional protection against incitement to racial hatred. I hope that the provisions will be acceptable to the House.

Mr. Tony Marlow (Northampton, North): Will the Secretary of State comment on part III?

Mr. Hurd: I am prepared to say a great deal, but in the interests of brevity I will leave it to my hon. Friend to find other ways of making his point.

Part IV consists mainly of measures against football hooliganism. Last summer, with the help of all parties, we passed an Act to control the sale and possession of alcohol at football matches. We now propose to introduce an exclusion order scheme, which will enable the courts to ban convicted hooligans from attending football matches. The purpose of this scheme is to exclude the troublemakers and especially the ringleaders who instigate much of the violence. Anyone found guilty of a football-related offence may be subject to an exclusion order and any breach of that order would be a further offence for which he could be sent to prison. It has been said, since we published the Bill, that exclusion orders will be hard to enforce without membership cards. Certainly I hope that the scheme will stimulate the clubs to make greater speed on membership cards. It is a powerful scheme, even without membership cards. An offender who has an exclusion order added to his sentence will have his photograph taken. He will know that photographs are circulated and he will also know that, more likely than not, there will be closed-circuit television on any ground he is tempted to visit. This knowledge will be a powerful deterrent against his defying the order.

The exclusion order scheme will not apply in Scotland but the further measures against football hooliganism in schedule 1 will apply there as in England and Wales. There will be a new offence of possessing a smoke bomb at a football match, as recommended by Mr. Justice Popplewell in his interim report. In the light of experience and protest, mini-buses are brought within the scope of the alcohol ban which applies at present to coaches and trains.

Mr. John Carlisle (Luton, North): I am grateful to my right hon. Friend for giving way and I shall be brief. Most of the football industry will welcome this clause. Can the Secretary of State clear up two points? Will those people who are excluded because of violence during a game or on the approach to a game be subject to the law in other forms? The Bill talks about certain football matches—I think the words are "the football ground concerned". What about other grounds? Will offenders be excluded from grounds other than those where the offence took place?

Mr. Hurd: It is not a substitute for other penalties or other sentences. It would be for the court to decide the scope, both in terms of the geography and duration of an exclusion order.

Sir John Farr (Harborough): Photography has attracted a great deal of interest. Can my right hon. Friend comment on the possibility of adding fingerprinting to clause 30 as well as photography? Will my right hon. Friend seek to take some action relating to the hooligans' passport when an exclusion order has been served? These are the people who behave badly in Britain and then go abroad and besmirch our name at soccer matches on the continent.

Mr. Hurd: I am prepared to think about the second point. Photography is crucial. It would not be possible to take people's fingerprints at football grounds. Photographs can be circulated and there is an increasing use of closed-circuit television. I will consider what my hon. Friend said, though I consider that the circulation of photographs will probably be the effective technique.

Mr. Merlyn Rees (Morley and Leeds, South): I understand that parts of this Bill include some of the recommendations of Popplewell part one. I understand that Popplewell part two—the final report—is expected shortly. Will its recommendations be absorbed in this Bill at a later stage or will there be separate piece of legislation?

Mr. Hurd: I hope to make a statement about Mr. Justice Popplewell's final report possibly later this week. Much of his report deals with matters that do not fall within the scope of this Bill.

It is 50 years since the Public Order Act 1936 was passed. It has stood the test of time pretty well, but the events of recent years have confirmed the need to update the framework of public order law to ensure that it is strong enough to protect the public in 1986 and hereafter. We have tested each proposal in the Bill against that standard. In Standing Committee, if the Bill gets a Second Reading, the House will repeat those tests—quite rightly, that is what Standing Committee is for. Some will speak, quite naturally, as they have begun to do from the Opposition Benches, this afternoon, for those who define liberty in terms of the right to march, picket and demonstrate, to go unhindered to a football match, to do what they like on housing estates and in shopping precincts without police interference.

Mr. Kaufman: Nonsense.

Mr. Hurd: Well, we shall judge what happens in debate. We have to balance those rights, which are understandably of concern, against the rights of the public to be protected from disorder, destruction, intimidation and hooliganism. We shall listen carefully to suggestions that might improve the balance that we have tried to strike. I hope that, like its predecessors, the present team of Home Office Ministers has a reputation for constructive listening.

Before the discussion of detail gets under way, can I leave the House with just one thought? The Government do not believe that there is any intrinsic merit in piling up fresh powers for the police. The police need their powers, not for their own satisfaction or aggrandisement, but to protect the public more effectively. This is a Bill for the better protection of the public. I am certain that the public stand four square behind that argument. In no respect is it more important than in public order. I commend the Bill to the House.

5.9 pm

Mr. Gerald Kaufman (Manchester, Gorton): I beg to move, to leave out from "That" to the end of the Question, and to add instead thereof,

"this House declines to give a Second Reading to a Bill which, at a time when serious crime has increased by 40 per cent. under this Government and the crime clear-up rate has markedly declined, contains no proposals which are likely to be effective in preventing disorder, while diverting scarce police resources from fighting crime and at the same time seriously undermining traditional civil liberties."

This debate takes place against a background of a crime wave which continues to be the most alarming that the country has experienced in modern times, and the collapse of the Government's policy on law and order. The newly published volume of "Social Trends" documents that 3·5 million serious crimes are now committed in Britain each year — nearly 1 million a year more than when the Government came to office. In urban areas, the crime increase in places such as greater Manchester and south Yorkshire is more than twice the national average. "Social Trends" confirms that, over the nation as a whole, little more than one third of those crimes are being cleared up —a reduction from 42 per cent. when the Government came to office.

Fear of crime has now become a plague, casting a grim shadow across Britain. No fewer than 12 per cent. of all inner-city residents say that they never go out alone at night because of crime. More than 60 per cent. of women living in inner cities feel at least somewhat unsafe and 60 per cent. of those aged over 60 say that they feel very unsafe.

Against that background of soaring crime and a serious decline in proportionate police success in combating it, the pressure on overstretched police forces grows ever greater and more oppressive. Chief constables and police authorities in many parts of the country document those severe problems that seriously hamper their strenuous efforts to combat crime.

Three months ago, the greater Manchester police authority sent a plea to the Home Secretary, documenting the cuts that it might have to make, including a stop on recruitment entailing a fall in police numbers and closure of some police stations. It said that increased insurance costs alone, consequent upon the abolition of the greater Manchester council, will cost the force £700,000. Although the Home Secretary has partially increased the greater Manchester police authority's determination, he has still not met its full needs, yet he claims that his response to such requests will be based on need.

The district auditor recently completed an inquiry into the west midlands police authority. His conclusions included the verdict that that force suffers from insufficient resources for operational policing. He reports:

"Several senior officers told my staff that their sole objective is to get through the day without a major catastrophe."

The district auditor declared:

"The manpower available for operational policing is often frighteningly low."

The chief constable of the west midlands, Mr. Geoffrey Dear, says in his report on the Handsworth riots:

"currently we are training all personnel in relation to the Police and Criminal Evidence Act 1984. Such commitments inevitably reduce the uniformed control capacity."

The Commissioner of Police of the Metropolis, Sir Kenneth Newman, forecast a few weeks ago another huge increase in crime in London. He warned that, without extra manpower, some burglaries would not even be investigated—that when, in London, the clear-up rate for burglary is only 10 per cent. Today's press reports the estimates submitted by Sir Kenneth to the Home Office and comments that they do not provide even half of the manpower increase that Sir Kenneth says that he needs.

The Government are so ashamed of their response to the financial requests of the police that they have done their best to confuse and mislead Parliament by throwing up a smokescreen around the true figures. Last month, in the House, the Home Secretary, obediently followed by the Parliamentary Under-Secretary of State, tried to imply that the Government are planning an increase in finance for the police in real terms for the next financial year. The operation was renewed with a planted story in The Times only last week. However, on the most favourable estimates, the Government are planning a reduction in expenditure on the police in real terms this year.

A study of the fine print of ministerial answers shows that the Government's claims of an increase are based on a comparison of this year's budget with that of next year. The problem for the Government is that the pressure on the police this year has caused them to spend £101 million more than their budget. The Home Secretary tried to imply last month that the increase is due to expenditure on police overtime during the miners' strike. When I asked him, the Minister of State admitted to me that the Government had no idea of the cost of police overtime during the miners' strike and that their estimate of all special payments in connection with that dispute is about £9 million—only a small fraction of the £101 million overspent.

If the previous Home Secretary had tried to deceive the House with such manipulation of statistics, I would have accused him of deliberate sharp practice. The present Home Secretary being what he is, all I say is that he has got himself into a muddle. It is unquestionable, however, that the only realistic way in which to compare expenditure levels is to set one year's expenditure, when it is known or can be estimated, against the next year's plans. Such a comparison shows clearly whether there is to be an increase or a decrease. To base comparisons on spending plans that have been exceeded is financial chicanery.

If Mr. Roberts, the Grantham grocer, had based his accounting not on what he spent but on the smaller sum to which he would have liked to limit himself, Mr. Roberts would never have been awarded an alderman's robe, let alone be able to lay it down with honour, as he would have been an undischarged bankrupt at the time.

On the Government's present inflation estimates, they are budgeting for an expenditure reduction of 0·75 per cent. on the police next year. On today's inflation rate, the reduction is 1·8 per cent. Far from doing their best to ease the burdens of the police, in this Session the Government are legislating to increase them. The Shops Bill is before the House of Lords at the moment. Mr. Andrew Mackinlay, the excellent and enterprising prospective

Labour candidate for Peterborough, recently wrote to the Association of Chief Police Officers asking about the expected effect on the police of the Sunday opening of shops. I have here the reply that he received from the honorary secretary of the Association of Chief Police Officers, Mr Brian Hayes, the chief constable of Surrey. About the deregulation of Sunday shopping, Mr Hayes says:

"Traffic . . . police presence on Sundays might need to be increased and the current practice of minimum manning would need to be re-assessed. Parking regulations would require major revision to incorporate Sundays, as many existing regulations do not apply after 6.30 pm on Saturdays. The increased restrictions would then need to be enforced."

Mr. Nicholas Lyell (Mid-Bedfordshire): Will the right hon. Gentleman give way?

Mr. Kaufman: No. May I conclude this quotation from a very respected chief constable? About the potential increase in crime as a result of the deregulation of Sunday shopping, Mr. Hayes says:

"Longer opening hours would provide increased opportunities for persons, particularly juveniles, to commit offences of theft, and there could be an increased risk to shop staff, especially females, who are required to take cash to the bank or to travel home during the hours of darkness. There is also a possibility of an increase in offences of public disorder, criminal damage and violence if late night shoppers come into contact with early evening drinkers."

In summing up, the chief constable of Surrey said:

"It would be difficult to be more precise on the matter of cost, but if Saturdays are any yardstick, we should not underestimate the possible difficulties."

Mr. Lyell: Before the right hon. Gentleman drags away this smelly red herring, will he tell the House what he estimates it would cost local authorities if they set out to enforce the present law on Sunday trading?

Mr. Kaufman: The hon. and learned Member for Mid-Bedfordshire (Mr. Lyell) must follow the creditable example of the future Labour Member for Peterborough and write to the secretary of the Association of Chief Police Officers. What the hon. and learned Gentleman describes as a smelly red herring is, in fact, a letter from the secretary of that respected body. I would bet that if I had quoted from him something derogatory about the miners, the hon. and learned Gentleman would have cheered.

Mr. Hurd: Does the right hon. Member for Manchester, Gorton (Mr. Kaufman) not expect to be called when the House debates the Shops Bill?

Mr. Kaufman: I do not know. After what has happened in the Cabinet, there may be other changes in the House. Who can tell?

If the chief constable of Surrey is correct, the Shops Bill may even increase the number of disturbances with which the Public Order Bill claims to deal.

Public order offences are only a tiny fraction of the crimes committed in Britain each year. Despite the costs caused by their ugly destructiveness, the financial costs to the economy of disorder and rioting—as distinct from the grave, human and social costs,—are small compared to the cost to the nation of financial fraud which is estimated to exceed £3 billion a year. Yet despite the Financial Services Bill, which the House is to debate tomorrow, the Government are taking little more than token action in dealing with fraud, compared with this extremely heavy-handed Bill.

On 20 December the Financial Secretary to the Treasury admitted to my hon. Friend the Member for Hammersmith (Mr. Soley) that criminal prosecutions are undertaken in only a small number of fraud cases. On Saturday The Times gave the excuse:

"The cost of trials, an average of £500,000 in such complex City cases, makes the Department of Public Prosecutions or the tax authorities reluctant to press cases unless they can safely predict conviction on serious charges."

Such considerations of cost and difficulty did not deter the public order trials connected with the miners' strike. One Orgreave trial cost £500,000 and a trial in Nottinghamshire cost £1·5 million. In total, the estimated cost of trials arising from the miners' strike is said to be millions of pounds and all, without exception, ended in ignominious defeat for the prosecution.

The Government's approach to such offences reveals a great deal about their real definition of law and order which they apply very differently in a socially and discriminatory way to working people on the one hand and to City swindlers on the other.

There is great public concern about disorder and riots because such crimes are the most visible of all. They are catapulted into our living rooms by the vividness of television. The nation would welcome firm and effective action to prevent such disorders, provided that such action is compatible with civil liberties. The Opposition would support such action.

Although the Bill is stuffed with new offences and penalties, there is no evidence that it would have the tiniest effect in preventing disorder. I have read press accounts today of the Metropolitan police report on the Broadwater Farm disorders. Having studied the accounts I have no reason to doubt the veracity of that inquiry. Yet it cannot be denied that if this Bill had been an Act at the time of the Broadwater Farm riot, not one event described in the Metropolitan police report would have been prevented and the riot would have proceeded as scheduled. Even people like Mrs. Donna Kiffin, who warned the police several days in advance that such a disturbance was in the offing, could not have influenced the outcome.

It is unlikely that, if the Bill had been in force, there would have been more arrests for public order offences at Broadwater Farm. Another official inquiry prepared by Chief Constable Dear into the Handsworth disorders revealed that only a small proportion of the offences with which people were charged after the disturbance were public order offences—48 out of 355. All the Bill will do, at best, is to create new offences for which people involved in riots can be arrested. However, the evidence shows that sufficient offences are already available to the police and that the courts can already impose heavy sentences, as happened with the recent life sentence on a football hooligan.

At best, the Bill is innocuous and in some ways even comic. At worst, it will impose unnecessary new burdens on our sorely pressed police forces, will invade civil liberties and create new tensions between the police and the public at a time when it is essential that relationships between the police and the public should be strengthened and improved.

Before the Christmas recess, the Opposition assisted and expedited legislation giving powers to ban alcohol from football grounds. In so far as that legislation has been successful, the Opposition are glad that they did so. But the Opposition are still waiting to hear about the Government's success in their other objectives. In April the Government called upon the football authorities to report within six weeks on a practical scheme of membership cards. Nine months later no progress has been made and a group of northern football clubs which I met a few weeks ago assures me that such a scheme continues to be impractical, whatever the Home Secretary has said this afternoon.

[Mr. Kaufman]

The Government asked the football authorities in April to accelerate the introduction of closed-circuit television. The Home Secretary seems to have little idea of what is happening, as he said on BBC radio on 6 December:

"closed-circuit television is now becoming quite usual in football grounds."

Yet the Minister responsible for sport told me six days after the Home Secretary's categorical statement that only 27 grounds in the football league and the Scottish football league have closed-circuit television systems. That is a mere 21 per cent. of the total, yet the Home Secretary has said that closed-circuit television is an adjunct of the other proposals in the Bill. On that basis, the Bill can have no helpful effect on 80 per cent. of football grounds.

In place of the Government priorities which now seem to have been abandoned, the Bill contains two new proposals. One is the creation of exclusion orders by which football hooligans will be banned from matches. In principle, the Opposition see no objection to that. We are baffled, however, about how that will work. The police organisations with which my hon. Friend the Member for Hammersmith and I have discussed the matter are just as baffled. No one has the slightest idea of how the orders are to be enforced or what will happen if an excluded person turns up at a ground from which he has been banned. The Home Secretary seems to say that such a person would be photographed. The clause dealing with photography is one of the most obscure clauses that I have ever seen.

Clause 30 empowers a court to make an order that a person subject to an exclusion order should be photographed. However, the Bill does not state what will be done with the photographs. When the Bill was published, I had meetings with the Police Federation and the Association of Chief Police Officers. At each of those meetings with some of the most distinguished police officers in the country, we sat round the table, with cold towels figuratively round our heads, trying to puzzle out the implications of the photography clause. We agreed that a direct consequence would be an encouraging increase in the sales of the magazine Amateur Photographer. We were equally agreed that that could not be the Government's entire objective. We mused upon the possibility that the photographs could be pasted into albums and that police officers could while away long winter nights turning the pages and admiring these mugshots.

We were sure that it would be impracticable for such photographs to festoon the turnstiles of football grounds, with stewards comparing, one by one, the faces of customers in the queue with these pin-up pictures. It would be impossible to imagine any situation more likely to provoke a riot rather than keep out a rioter. So we must take it that clause 30 is the Home Secretary's little joke.

Mr. John Carlisle: The right hon. Gentleman is giving a graphic description of what could happen and those of us involved in the football industry have some sympathy with what he says. However, will he accept the point made by my right hon. Friend the Home Secretary, which was that there would be a deterrent effect on those photographed after committing a violent offence inside or outside a ground? In the same way, there is a deterrent effect in the curfew orders in the Criminal Justice Act 1982. That is partly what this Bill is about. If it deters offenders from going to grounds, it will have gone some way to remedy this awful problem.

Mr. Kaufman: If I thought that the act of photography would turn a hooligan into a law-abiding citizen, I would advocate the mass sale of cameras. In "A Clockwork Orange" the gentleman was tamed by listening to Beethoven. Perhaps we should try that solution if the photography does not work.

Mr. Tony Lloyd (Stretford): The people who would recognise those who had been excluded from football grounds, but subsequently got into the grounds, are their colleagues at those grounds. They would quickly realise that the provision was almost unenforceable and it would come into contempt.

Mr. Kaufman: I accept what my hon. Friend says, which implies that they would gain entry to football grounds; exclusion orders are designed to prevent that.

Let us look at other parts of the Bill that are far from a joke and, indeed, have the most serious implications, for example, clause 10. I hope that the Home Secretary will follow this, because the implications of what I have to say are serious.

Following the Handsworth riots in October, I asked the Home Secretary what action could be taken to speed up the payment of compensation under the Riot (Damages) Act 1886 and to expand the scope of that Act to take account of loss of income after riots. The Home Secretary gave me assurances that those issues were being considered. Indeed, he said that he shared my desire that the 1886 Act should be implemented in such a way as to bring as effective and prompt relief as possible.

However, far from assisting with such matters of great importance to innocent citizens who have suffered great material damage, the Bill ensures that in future very few people, if any, will be compensated under the 1886 Act. That is because the new offence of violent disorder will largely replace the old offence of riot. That is the view of ACPO and of the Home Office, which stated in its press release on the publication of the Bill:

"Riot . . . will be the least commonly used public order offence, reserved only for very serious cases" and the Home Secretary confirmed that view today. Yet far from reassuring us that this grave charge will be sparingly used, the Home Secretary's assertion is worrying, because clause 10 confines eligibility for compensation under the 1886 Act and the Merchant Shipping Act 1894 to those affected by clause 1—the riot clause—which creates the new offence of riot which is rarely to be used.

It is unacceptable that those suffering material loss to their livelihood as a result of disorders should be deprived of compensation by the Government's juggling and manipulating the law in this way. We shall insist that the Bill be amended to remove that unjust treatment.

Both the new offence of riot and the other new offences of violent disorder and affray are defined far too widely, in a manner which goes against previous Government assurances and against the authoritative views of others.

In proposing the new offence of riot, the Law Commission stated that the offence should deal with persons using or threatening violence

"such as would cause a person of reasonable firmness present at the scene to fear for his personal safety."

Paragraph 3.17 of the White Paper said that the Government agreed with the Law Commission's proposed statutory definition. In proposing the new offence of violent disorder, the Law Commission defined it in relation again to a "person of reasonable firmness present at the scene".

Again, the White Paper stated:

"The Government is content to accept the Law Commission's proposed statutory definition."

The same proposal and the same criterion apply to the new offence of affray. Yet for each of these new offences, the Bill, in clauses 1, 2 and 3, negates the Law Commission's proviso by the subsection which states:

"No person of reasonable firmness need actually be, or be likely to be, present at the scene."

That dilution of necessary safeguards in the creation of the new offences, each of which carries substantial penalties, is all the more disturbing in view of the judgment of the House of Lords in the Kamare case, in which the present Lord Chancellor participated. The judgment stated:

"The essential requisite was the presence or likely presence of innocent third parties not participating in the illegal activities in question; it was the danger to their security which constituted the threat to public peace and the public element necessary for the commission of the offence."

Nowhere are the protections more glaringly absent than in the Bill's version of the new offence of disorderly conduct. When the White Paper was published in May, I welcomed its proposal for the new offence. As an inner city Member of Parliament I am daily made aware of the misery caused to defenceless people—often pensioners, often women—by loutish conduct that goes far beyond boisterous high spirits. The Home Secretary has taken to quoting my welcome of what the White Paper said as some sort of endorsement. I only wish that he would require my endorsement of everything he does and that when I give my endorsement he would do what I endorse.

I should still welcome the creation, with appropriate safeguards, of such a new offence as was described in the White Paper. However, I have to say that clause 5 creates a new offence which has not the slightest chance of accomplishing what I advocate and what the White Paper proposed. Instead, it is fraught with the most serious dangers by its breadth of scope and lack of clarity.

Moreover, clause 5 seriously departs from specific commitments contained in the White Paper, which said of the proposed offence of disorderly conduct:

"The Government recognises that there would be justifiable objections to a wide extension of the criminal law which might catch conduct not deserving of criminal sanctions."

The White Paper went on:

"For this reason, the offence contains the safeguard that the behaviour must actually cause someone to feel alarmed, harassed or distressed (not that it is merely likely to do so)."

Yet the Bill scraps what the White Paper says is a necessary safeguard and specifically lays down that an offence is committed if behaviour or the use of words is "likely to harass, alarm or distress another person."

That was repudiated by the White Paper.

Again, the White Paper insisted, in italics, that the victim—as the White Paper called her or him—should have suffered substantial alarm, harassment or distress. The Bill does not contain the word "substantial". Yet again, the White Paper proposed what it called "a sufficient maximum penalty of £100."

The Bill provides for a £400 penalty.

The Home Secretary seems to misunderstand what he is proposing. On the day of the publication of the Bill, he claimed on "The World At One" that the new offence of disorderly conduct would "cover the kind of hooliganism where a group rushes up and down outside a block of flats terrorising people who live inside without actually causing a breach of the peace."

That is precisely what the Bill will not do.

First, the new offence does not require a victim, as was required in the White Paper. Secondly, the provision that the person charged is committing an offence only if he ignores a warning by the police is a complete fantasy. Can anyone imagine a gang harassing an old person on a housing estate, on hearing that the police had been called, deciding to wait until they arrived, wait to be warned and then persist in their behaviour? They would have run off long ago.

The Government, quite rightly, have included in the Bill a requirement for a police warning before arrest —

Mr. Douglas Hogg: Before charge.

Mr. Kaufman: Yes, before charge.

Mr. Hogg rose—

Mr. Kaufman: I accept the hon. Gentleman's point, even before he makes it. I apologise for my error.

The police are well aware that the offence is so widely drawn that it could be used at whim. That is a power that the police do not want, as the chief constable of Essex, on behalf of the Association of Chief Police Officers, told me in a letter stating:

"We are anxious to see a balanced approach which gives police adequate powers to maintain public order but does not lose the British police its reputation for restraint and impartiality."

Mr. Ken Weetch (Ipswich): Clause 5 is somewhat controversial. I have experienced a large number of complaints about loutish behaviour in shopping precincts in Ipswich. I have attended meetings with residents, shopkeepers and the police, who want to do something about the problem. However, they cannot do anything about such behaviour because it must relate to specific incidents, which they do not observe happening.

I would appreciate a strong lead from my right hon. Friend. Is he rejecting the clause in principle, or does he believe that the principle is worthy but the clause needs substantial amendment in Committee?

Mr. Kaufman: I am saying what I said when the White Paper was published last May. From my experience in my constituency, which is similar to my hon. Friend's experience, I know of the profound concern felt by those subjected to loutish behaviour that frightens them, but with which the police cannot deal under the present law. That is why I immediately welcomed the proposal in the White Paper. This clause will not deal with that sort of behaviour —

Mr. Ivan Lawrence (Burton): Why not?

Mr. Kaufman: I was about to explain why not. Clause 5(5) requires a person to be warned by a constable and then to persist in his behaviour before an arrest without warrant can take place. Let us take the example of old ladies who are regularly harassed. It is inconceivable that the louts would hang around for the arrival of the police, wait for a warning from a police officer and then meekly accept arrest. That is why I describe the clause as a fantasy. The behaviour to which my hon. Friend the Member for Ipswich (Mr. Weetch) and I object, and which we want dealt with in the Bill, will not be caught by the clause.

If the Government could draft a clause that effectively dealt with the sort of complaints that so many hon. Members have experienced, I would, as I said nine months ago, look upon it with great favour. The problem is that the Government, after nine months, have found it impossible to draft such a clause. The clause that they have drafted fails to deal with the sort of behaviour that concerns my hon. Friend and myself, while creating an offence that has grave implications—not for those with whom we are trying to deal, but for other people. That is why I cannot accept the clause. If the Government put forward amendments in Committee to deal with such behaviour, clearly I should be prepared to consider them.

The offence in the clause will provide no protection for the vulnerable about whom I am primarily concerned, but will create circumstances in which the police will have the power to pick up anyone they choose of whose behaviour they disapprove. The Times, on 7 December, warned that the offence was "extremely broad in its potential application" and that

"police application of it will require tough monitoring if the old 'sus' problems are not to recur."

The Daily Telegraph leading article on 9 December described the disorderly conduct offence as "questionable", and went on to say:

"Parliament will have to ensure tight drafting to deter police excesses reminiscent of 'sus' and to prevent those who merely give vent to boisterous high spirits from obtaining criminal convictions."

I endorse those words. Unless appropriate amendments are tabled, the Opposition will oppose the clause.

Even more dangerous are the proposed limitations on the right to peaceful assembly, whether marches or open-air gatherings. Again, the Daily Telegraph rightly warned:

"The controversial new powers to impose conditions on the size, location and duration of demonstrations will clearly require sensitive policing if they are not to undermine freedom of assembly."

We object to the length of notice that will be required for marches and processions. The Bill provides for six clear days, while the Select Committee on Home Affairs recommended three days and the Association of County Councils said that 36 hours would be adequate. Ministers may point to Scottish legislation, which lays down a seven-day period, but there is a major difference between the Civic Government (Scotland) Act 1982 and this Bill. The Scottish Act provides that notice should be given to a local authority—the Regional Islands council. This Bill requires that notice is given to the police.

It is one thing for a decision about a march to be in the hands of a democratically-elected body, but another to force on to the police responsibility for imposing conditions that rest on political judgments. That is unfair to the police. Moreover, it is a role that the police simply do not want, as the chief constable of Essex has made clear.

Representatives of the Police Federation with whom I have discussed that point said:

"We do not want to have put into the hands of the police decisions which can be interpreted as political decisions."

I fully concur with the statement of Mr. Leslie Curtis, the chairman of the Police Federation, who said:

"The police of Britain must not be seen either as Maggie Thatcher's boot boys or as a people's militia."

The trouble is that the Bill goes a long way towards turning the reluctant and unwilling police into Maggie's boot boys.

The conditions in the Bill allow the police to impose on marches what can, in effect, amount to a ban by the police rather than by an elected authority. Of course, the police will use their discretion. They may, without conditions, allow a march by parents protesting against a road accident blackspot—but not one protesting against the arrival of cruise missiles. Indeed, the Home Secretary mentioned Greenham common in his speech. By doing that, inevitably they will be expressing a judgment on the merits of one against the other.

Moreover, if parents wish to demonstrate speedily and effectively, following an accident to one of their children, they will be able to do so only if the police agree to accept shorter notice. That limitation, based on value judgments that are inevitably subjective, is an unacceptable invasion of civil liberties.

Mr. Douglas Hogg rose——

Mr. Kaufman: Perhaps the hon. Gentleman will allow me to proceed.

What applies to marches applies even more to peaceful open air assemblies, since the restrictions imposed in the Bill are unprecedented and, once again, can result in a de facto ban, although no banning power is contained in the Bill. The Government may claim that the new power of imposing conditions on open air meetings and gatherings can deal with disorder, for example, by providing powers to stop violence on a picket line, but, as the Home Secretary said, there are already ample powers to deal with violence and obstruction, whether on a picket line or elsewhere.

The Bill will give the police the power to limit peaceful picketing by small numbers of people. That the police may not necessarily use the power does not detract from its existence and, moreover, as there is no notice provision —we would completely oppose it—the power to impose conditions on assemblies is even more random and capricious than the limitations on marches. I cannot do better than quote a letter sent to the Home Secretary by the secretary of the Police Federation which, speaking of that power over assemblies, scornfully declares:

"It is ill conceived, totally impractical and entirely inappropriate to deal with the type of spontaneous disorder resulting from static demonstrations, pickets or football matches . . . we can see absolutely no merit in legislation that seeks to close a stable door after the horse has bolted and we suggest that this part of the White Paper has little or no merit from the point of view of practical application."

That is said by the Police Federation.

That dangerous innovation has less merit from the point of view of our traditional civil liberties. It is significant that in stating the circumstances in which conditions can be applied to marches, the Bill adds to the present limited criterion of "serious public disorder" the alterntive criterion of "serious disruption to the life of the community".

It is significant that the "serious disruption" criterion can be applied also to open air meetings and gatherings. What is more, the Home Secretary has given an example of what that can mean. He referred to a demonstration outside Selfridges about South African oranges, and suggested that under the new powers the demonstration could be moved away from Selfridges. However, the whole point of such a demonstration is that it should take place at the point of grievance. By moving it away, the police would be making a political judgment. Moreover, they would be making an even greater and more fundamental judgment that the right to demonstrate is less important than the right to shop. It is a provision based on the view that demonstrations on matters of principle are not part of the life of the community. In a democracy, the right peacefully to state a point of view is at least as precious as the right to buy oranges, but the Bill tips the law against that right to state a point of view. The only defence for the Government is that at least they are consistent. The Prime Minister is ready to give to those attending open air meetings the same right of free expression as she gives to those attending Cabinet meetings.

Mr. Hurd: May I press the right hon. Gentleman—on the oranges rather than on the Cabinet? As he accurately said, the test is one of serious disruption. Is he saying that in his view there is no balance to be struck, and it would be reasonable for the demonstration that he said I gave as an example to disrupt Oxford street to such an extent that it was closed to shoppers in the weeks before Christmas? Would he think that that was carrying the right to demonstrate a little too far? Does he accept that there is a balance to be struck?

Mr. Kaufman: Of course, there is a balance to be struck, but it will not be struck by the provisions in the Bill because the police will define subjectively what "serious disruption" means. All that I say to the right hon. Gentleman is that there are powers already in the law to deal with the disturbance that he mentions. It was he who chose the example of Selfridges and the oranges. It was a good example because it shows that he regards shopping as more important than the right, in a democracy, of peaceful protest. If that is his point of view, it is as well that we should know that it is.

Apart from odd corners, this is in parts a silly Bill and in parts a pointless Bill, but above all it is a dangerous Bill. The Home Secretary talks of a Government strategy for dealing with crime but in fact the Government have no strategy for dealing with crime. It is likely that the main outcome of the crime prevention seminar at No. 10 last week, in so far as it has any result at all, is that burgled householders will find it even more difficult in future to get their insurance companies to pay up. The Police and Criminal Evidence Act, now coming substantially into force, imposes bureaucratic burdens that will reduce police effectiveness. The Public Order Bill will reduce further that effectiveness, through dragging substantial numbers of police away from fighting real crime to supervising and interfering with the rights of free peaceful assembly, and it will do so against the wishes of the police themselves.

What do police who have been involved in coping with disorder say about the underlying causes of that disorder? In his report on the Handsworth riots, Chief Constable Dear declared:

> "I would never seek to minimise the problems of being young, black and unemployed in a decaying inner city environment. Black youths suffer particularly from the effects of prejudice, unemployment and scarce resources. These and other ills cannot be ignored and deserve to be addressed by society as a whole."

There is not a word in the Bill, nor any other action by the Government, that addresses the ills that Chief Constable Dear says cannot be ignored.

Last month, Commander Alex Marnoch, who was in charge of Brixton at the time of last autumn's riots, and in whom the Home Secretary has such confidence that he is now being transferred and given responsibility for both the Palace of Westminster and Buckingham palace, stated: "if unemployment continues to rise and the stabilising middle-aged black population continues its exodus to safer areas, further major disturbances will be inevitable".

The article quoting Commander Marnoch stated:

> "He called for fresh initiatives from the Government, the local council, and education, housing and social services departments."

Commander Marnoch said:

> "'Unless there is an influx of extra jobs, or the population moves away, we are going to have serious problems.'"

Yet there is not a word in the Bill, nor any other action by the Government, designed to ward off the further major inevitable disturbances of which he warns. Indeed, last month's housing investment programme allocations for capital spending on housing are only 29 per cent. of the level when Labour left office. Last month's rate support grant settlement for the partnership authorities increases by £400 million to £2,600 million the amount of rate support grant that the partnership authorities have lost under the Government. Youth unemployment in Britain stands at 1,250,000, nearly three times what it was under Labour. Nearly half a million of those under 25 have been out of work for over a year.

While those scandalous facts persist, no legislation will have any hope of dealing with the dreadful disorders from which this country has suffered so grievously in recent years and months. At the end of his report on the Handsworth riots, Chief Constable Dear quoted these words:

> "'Utopia is not a republic of fraternity to be taken by violence. Neither can it be taken by men who have no vision of better things for mankind.'"

We in the Opposition reject the violence that is a curse upon the Britain whose values we cherish. We also reject the men and women who have no vision, the men and women who sit on the Government Front Bench. I call upon the House to vote for the amendment.

6 pm

Mr. Mark Carlisle (Warrington, South): The right hon. Member for Manchester, Gorton (Mr. Kaufman) addressed the House for 49 minutes. For somewhat over half of that time we heard what might be looked upon as the right hon. Member's set speech on crime. It seemed to me to have precious little to do with the Bill that we are debating, although it may have a considerable amount to do with consolidating the right hon. Gentleman's position in his party. He spent the other half of that time making what seemed to me to be Committee points. With great respect, most of them were wrong, certainly as regards affray and clause 5. At no stage did the right hon. Gentleman give any reason for his announcement that the Opposition intend to divide the House against the Bill.

Before I turn to the Bill, upon which I intend to speak briefly, may I point out to the right hon. Gentleman that

[Mr. Mark Carlisle]

I am sure that a general debate on crime would be welcomed, but that is not what we are debating today. In answer to his set speech on crime, I would point out to him that today there are 13,000 more policemen than there were when his party was in office, and that we are spending a third more, in real terms, on the police than was spent at that time.

The right hon. Gentleman attacked my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State for the Home Department and suggested that one ought not to talk about increases in proposed expenditure. He ought to talk to his right hon. Friend the Leader of the Opposition and to all his colleagues. From 1979 to 1982 they did nothing but attack the present Government. However, their attack was based on the figures of proposed expenditure, for instance, upon education. I was told, not that we were spending more, but that we were cutting what was being spent; not on the basis that we were spending less than had been spent in the year before, but on the basis that we were spending less than it had been proposed by the previous Government should be spent on education. Therefore, the Opposition must get their act together.

As for the right hon. Gentleman's dissertation on the Shops Bill, I appreciate that he likes to parade his intelligence before the House, but he took rather a long time to tell us that if shops were not open there would be no shoplifting! That point may be factually accurate, but it does not add to this debate. I turn, therefore, to the Bill that we are debating.

There are two principles upon which both sides of the House may be able to agree. First, the maintenance of public order—the right for people to be able to walk about freely and to pursue their lives without fear of attack and intimidation, and particularly without fear of attack from the mob—is a fundamental responsibility of the Government. Secondly, the traditional freedom to protest, march and demonstrate is an equally important right, as is the right peacefully to picket. Those rights must be preserved in a democratic society. However, while we preserve those rights, we must safeguard the rights of other people so that the right to protest peacefully is conducted without interference, violence, intimidation or threats, and without infringing the rights of other citizens. That balance, to which my right hon. Friend the Home Secretary referred this afternoon, is the balance that the Bill tries to assess.

I hope that the right hon. Member for Gorton will at least agree with me that we as a society are not being very successful about either of those issues. One has only to consider the degree of hooliganism and the riots in various areas of this country to realise that our society has not been very successful in maintaining order so that people can go about their lives without fear and intimidation. The scenes at the Warrington Messenger and during the miners' dispute show that we have not been successful in creating a balance between, on the one hand, the right to picket peacefully, and on the other the right not to be intimidated by threats. These are basic problems which the House should consider and which the Bill attempts to tackle.

The right hon. Gentleman is right when he says that the inadequacies of the existing law are not nearly so important in terms of controlling football hooliganism and maintaining public order as is the inability to enforce the existing law. I repeat, therefore, that it is far more relevant that now there are 13,000 more policemen than anything that the Bill can do. However, the fact that there are inadequacies and difficulties over enforcing the existing law does not mean that there are not certain areas of the law that are inadequate and need to be reformed. They have been identified by the Law Commission, by the Government and by Select Committee on Home Affairs, and they are referred to in the Bill. Despite what the right hon. Gentleman says, the Bill attempts to tackle the problems without the graphic widening of police powers that he suggests.

Many other hon. Members want to speak in this debate. I intend to deal with parts I and IV. I understand that part I follows the Law Commission's proposals. It is a sensible codification of the common law. With great respect to the right hon. Gentleman, I suggest that he should speak to his right hon. and learned Friend the Member for Aberavon (Mr. Morris) who is about to leave the Chamber. If he does so, I think he will find that he was wrong about the point that he made concerning affray. The law, as provided for in the Bill, on both riot and affray is consistent with the current law and the Law Commission's proposals. In any event, this is a Committee point. I may be wrong, but I am prepared to risk saying that I believe that I am right and that the law on affray at the moment is as is set out in the Bill.

As for clause 5, I agree with the right hon. Member for Gorton that there is room for argument about whether it is necessary to show that what was done was with the belief that it was likely to harass someone, or whether it is necessary to call witnesses to prove that someone has been harassed. But these are Committee points. There is genuine concern about a type of behaviour which causes alarm and harassment, but which is not dealt with at the moment. Again with respect to the right hon. Gentleman, his points on clause 5 were completely misconceived. He said that, because one cannot arrest a person without a warrant, it is similar to saying that one cannot proceed against him for that offence.

As for part II, the major part of the Bill, the background against which we have to consider it is the enormous increase in demonstrations and marches of all kinds in recent years. We are told that during the last 20 years there has been a fourfold increase in marches and demonstrations in London, and that during the last 10 years they have doubled. Demonstrations and marches take a great deal of police time and money. This has an enormous effect upon police morale. Saturday after Saturday and Sunday after Sunday large numbers of policemen are involved in policing demonstrations and marches. It is right, therefore, to examine whether the balance is right, or whether it can be varied to relieve the police of those problems.

The House ought to accept that "serious disorder" is not the only ground on which the police may impose conditions. The volume of traffic and the way in which people move around the country compared with 1936 makes serious disruption of the life of a community an equally fair test in deciding where the balance lies between the rights of the protester and the rights of the individual.

The Bill therefore needs to be tested against three questions. First, should those who organise marches have to give notice? Secondly, should there be a general power to impose conditions on the basis of serious disruption as well as serious disorder? Thirdly, should those conditions as a whole be applicable to static demonstrations as well as to marches? Any sensible assessment of those three questions leads to the answer, yes, there is a case for asking those who organise marches to give notice; yes, there is a case for imposing conditions affecting serious disruption as well as serious disorder; and yes, there is a case for imposing similar conditions on demonstrations.

Mr. Douglas Hogg rose——

Mr. Carlisle: I hope that my hon. Friend will not mind if I do not give way. I am trying to make a short speech. I have almost finished, so it would be unfair to give way.

There may be arguments about whether seven days' notice is the right length, but again that is a Committee point. Many people have argued for the right to give notice to the police. The right hon. Gentleman says that he is worried about the additional pressures that will be put on the police, but surely it is better for the police to be informed in advance of marches and to be able to discuss informally with those organising them the routes to be taken to reduce the risk of disorder than to have the pressure of having to police at short notice marches over which the police have not been consulted.

Surely it is right that we should allow conditions to be imposed on the number, location and duration of demonstrations. The right hon. Gentleman says that that is an interference with the right to peaceful protest, but one must remember that those conditions can be imposed only where the police have reason to believe that there is likely to be serious disorder. Therefore, the right hon. Gentleman is saying that the conditions imposed by the police when they fear serious disorder are a direct attack not on the fundamental right to picket or to protest peacefully, but on the fundamental right, which does not exist, to cause serious disorder, damage and disruption to others. One cannot look at the power to impose the condition without looking at the basis on which it is made. Therefore, the right hon. Gentleman is wrong.

The right hon. Gentleman's amendment has three parts. First, it declines to give a Second Reading to the Bill because of the general increase in crime, which is irrelevant to the Bill. Secondly, it says that the Bill will not be effective in preventing disorder. Much of that is a matter of numbers rather than of the law. It goes on to say that the Bill will divert scarce police resources into this area. By requiring advance notice, by giving the power to impose conditions where the police believe disorder will occur, the Bill will not divert scarce police resources from other areas, but will in fact allow fewer people to be involved in policing demonstrations and more to be involved in other work. At the same time, the amendment says that the Bill seriously undermines traditional civil liberties. It is not civil liberties that are undermined by the Bill, only the abuse of civil liberties where those liberties are used in such a way as to intimidate or attack the rights of others.

Mr. Michael Foot (Blaenau Gwent): The right hon. and learned Member for Warrington, South (Mr. Carlisle) underlined how necessary it is to strike a balance between the need to protect public order and civil liberties. Of course, that is correct and all of us can accept that. But the Opposition's complaint — my right hon. Friend the Member for Manchester, Gorton (Mr. Kaufman) made it extremely effectively—is that almost every aspect of the Bill enlarges police powers and may diminish civil liberties while no measures are being taken to try to restore the balance. It is my right hon. Friend who is seeking to do that.

It is illustrative of the Government's attitude to these matters that the first Bill to be introduced since the Christmas recess, after all the experience that we have had over the past year or two, should be one that enlarges the power of the police, often without the police wishing to have their powers enlarged, and diminishes the rights of protest and does so in the face of much opinion — Liberal as well as Labour—throughout Britain. That is the major defect of the Bill which my right hon. Friend has so skilfully underlined.

The Home Secretary said that we must not act in panic or anger in dealing with such matters and I am sure that when he says that he means it. But some aspects of the Bill are undertaken and presented to the House in panic or anger, or at least as a result of panic and anger, as, for example, that which was felt in many quarters during the miners' strike. I remember vividly how panic and anger was pressed into the service of the Government on some of those occasions.

I remember the terrible night on which someone was killed when a boulder was pushed off a bridge in Wales just next door to my constituency. That was a tragic and terrible affair. I remember the panic in which the prosecution took place. I remember the charge of murder and the Prime Minister appearing on television that night and saying that it was murder. I remember the chief of police saying that it was murder. I remember the mood in my constituency at the time that those things happened and the mood in the court case that occurred soon after. I remember how the Director of Public Prosecutions, as some of us believed, went ahead with the prosecution in a mood of panic and anger, and how the jury, I am sorry to say, were also affected by panic and anger, as can happen.

But thanks to British justice—and all honour to those who did it—thanks to the Appeal Court and thanks to what happened when the matter was taken to the House of Lords, the charge of murder was changed to manslaughter, as it should have been from the beginning. That should be a lesson to us all. The fact that a person was killed was the worst part of the tragedy but the families concerned also suffered a terrible tragedy and I am glad to say that eventually the British courts upheld the proper sense of proportion. That is what we seek to maintain in the Bill and that is what my right hon. Friend was striving to sustain, and he did it extremely well.

Mr. Douglas Hogg: Is the right hon. Gentleman trying in some way to diminish the gravity of the offence committed by those who toppled a boulder over a bridge into a car?

Mr. Foot: I cannot understand why the hon. Gentleman should make that intervention when I have underlined exactly the opposite part of the case. Indeed, I said so at the time and I have said so on every occasion that I have referred to it. My hon. Friend the Member for Merthyr Tydfil and Rhymney (Mr. Rowlands) has referred to the same matter. We have never diminished the horror of that event, but that is not a reason for British courts to operate in an atmosphere of panic and anger. That is what I was saying. It is a great credit to the British judicial system that eventually the highest court in the land said that those of us who protested at the time were right and not some of those who joined the panic and anger. We should deal with all such matters as coolly as possible and not seek to exaggerate the dangers.

The Government have rushed ahead with establishing new penalties and crimes which interfere with the rights of protest. The new charge of disorderly conduct was criticised when it was proposed, not only by my right hon. Friend and the Labour party, although we criticised it strongly—not in the terms in which it was put in the White Paper, as my right hon. Friend has rightly said—and a fair judgment was made about that. According to The Times, there was a change. I do not know whether the accounts are correct. I know how reticent the Secretary of State has to be in revealing discussion in his Department but according to The Times his Department objected originally to the way in which the new charge of disorderly conduct was proposed. That may be a complete fiction on the part of The Times and may be dismissed, but I believe that many people in his Department rightly had anxieties about giving the police these powers which, in some instances, the police do not want. They may add to one of the many perils to our public order at present — the deepening division between the public and police in many areas. We must overcome that by Acts of Parliament, wisdom and a lack of panic and anger in dealing with such questions, including picketing.

It is rather suprising that the right hon. Gentleman said so much about picketing. He said that there has been no panic and anger but there has been a little action in panic and anger in proposing to deal with picketing under the Bill. The Bill does not say that it will deal with that at all. There is no reference in the decription of the Bill to dealing with picketing, and the name of the Secretary of State for Employment does not even appear in it. As far as I know, this is the first time that, in a Bill dealing with picketing, the Secretary of State for Employment has not had any say. We know that we have a peculiar Secretary of State for Employment in the other place, and one with other interests. A Bill to deal with picketing, its consequences and how the policing of it may be operated, has been introduced without any say by the Department of Employment in the matter. That means to say that the Government and the Home Secretary in particular did not make any effort to have any discussions with the trade unions about these provisions. It would have been more sensible if they had, because some of the parts of the Bill dealing with picketing will not be workable.

There are also major changes in the way that demonstrations can take place and are governed by police decisions. Again, the police do not necessarily want this power, but if they do, they are unwise. I believe that many policemen would prefer the process of decision-making to be similar to that in Scotland. There, matters are referred to the local authorities rather than the police, and we should consider extending that provision to this country. It is a great mistake in a Bill that generally enlarges the powers of the police at the same time greatly to interfere with the rights of demonstration. It puts the police into the position of having to judge which demonstrations are to be tolerated and allowed in particular circumstances.

The balance is against the Government. There was a good leading article in The Guardian when the Bill was published at the beginning of December and its conclusion still stands. It said:

> "Overriding all these serious problems, however, are the bill's new powers for advance police control over meetings, assemblies and mass pickets. Let there be no mincing of words. These powers mean that the police will be able to decide whether crowds of every kind can gather. They will undoubtedly be used to stop strikers from picketing peacefully. They will undoubtedly be used to stop protesters from gathering outside the South African embassy. They will undoubtedly be used against people who gather at nuclear bases. They will make protesting citizens into licensed visitors to their own streets. Yet it need not be so, not if the bill contained a positive right to assemble and march."

The last provision would require a balanced approach, but there is none in the Bill. The Government have not sought to protect the right to demonstrate as they should have done and therefore the Bill has rightly been condemned by all champions of civil liberties.

Mr. Jerry Hayes (Harlow): The right hon. Gentleman has just quoted from The Guardian leader:

> "They will undoubtedly be used to stop strikers from picketing peacefully."

The right hon. Gentleman is referring to clause 12, so will he point out, under that clause, where and how that can be so?

Mr. Foot: The police have the power, in certain circumstances, to say whether they will allow a demonstration, and that proves my point. The hon. Gentleman can join me. If he wishes picketing to be dealt with separately, that can be done. That would be the proper way to go about it. It is not right for the Government to have included propositions to govern picketing, as they have done, without any consideration of the contrary arguments and the general points concerned. As a result, there will be grave future industrial disputes about whether the Bill infringes the right, which many people thought was absolute, to picket peacefully. I am not talking about picketing with violence, because that is against the common law. Already, powers exist for dealing with that, as the right hon. and learned Member for Warrington, South said.

I shall comment now on another aspect of the Bill, which I dare say was a reason why the Government introduced the Bill so speedily—I am not objecting on that account. There has been tremendous publicity about football hooliganism and the Government have had to take some action. I do not object to some of the propositions, but some, as my right hon. Friend the Member for Gorton has said, are unworkable and will not assist in solving the problem, but will make it more acute. It would have been more sensible to think out a proper solution.

Again, these provisions are unbalanced, because dealing with football hooliganism is only one aspect of the matter. We should ensure that football thrives. I sometimes think that the Government think that the way to stamp out football hooliganism is to stamp out football. If they do not take a whole series of other actions, football will be stamped out. The imposition of demands on both small and large football clubs are so great that the Government will drive many of them out of business. What will happen to law and order then? What happens if large numbers of football clubs cannot keep going? Many are trembling on the verge of bankruptcy now.

After the terrible tragedy at Bradford, lessons had to be learned. The Government should have come forward then and offered financial assistance to all football clubs to enable them to carry out the measures required to make their premises safe. In my constituency there are not so many football clubs as small rugby clubs. Rightly, they are having to carry out new safety provisions as soon as possible, but they do not have enough money and therefore should have much more assistance from the Government, which would not cost all that much. The Welsh Sports Council has only about £3·5 million to spend and therefore could not possibly deal with the problem. However, if the Government had any imagination they could deal with the problem. The Home Secretary should not have introduced such restrictive measures without also introducing measures that would have allowed football clubs to carry on and to prosper.

This is not a minor matter. If many football clubs were driven to bankruptcy, the addition to hooliganism and to the dangers of riot or people expressing their feelings in violent ways would be enormous, but the Government do not make such book-keeping or understand it. After the Bradford disaster, they told the football clubs that they must speedily put their houses in order and put in new stands so that such things would never again occur. The Government are a good deal swifter in telling football clubs that they must spend money that they do not have in making their grounds safe than they are in dealing with manufacturers who, for example, offend against health and safety provisions. That is a different affair. The Government linger, do not take any action, cut the number of inspectors and do not mind if there are more breaches of the law.

I do not understand why the Government have such a hatred of football—perhaps it is because no one in the Cabinet understands what football is about or what happens at the weekends. Huge numbers of people depend for their excitement and interest on the way in which sport is conducted. All that the Government do is impose a few impractical restrictions—not all of the restrictions are impractical—and say that football clubs must carry them out. The Government will not give the clubs any aid to do so, and seem to feel that if the clubs go bankrupt, so much the better, because that is how the market system works. That is a mad way to deal with such a critical position.

The inner cities may have a worse problem, but other parts which are not described as inner cities face the same problem. In my constituency we have had 20 per cent. unemployment since 1979, and three out of four young people have never had a hope of a job in the area. That is the case in many parts, not only in inner cities. The Government have taken the largest amount of rate support grant from our areas—just as they have taken huge resources from the partnership areas—although we are hit by the heaviest unemployment, and are threatened with the gravest forms of disorder.

The huge increase in crime is not an accident, nor utterly undecipherable. I am not saying that it is all due to one cause, but anyone who imagines that mass unemployment, especially among young people, does not contribute to an atmosphere in which crime grows has not the faintest notion of the mood that prevails in many areas today. The division between north and south, or however it is described, is a division between favoured areas and those which are left to take the Government's brutalities on the chin and on every other part of their industrial anatomy. Those areas face the dangers, but the Government have not a glimmer of understanding for them.

The Government talk of balance in these matters. It may be no coincidence that the Bill is being introduced this Session when the greatest judge we have had in recent years retires from the Bench. I wish that the Government had listened to what Lord Scarman had to say, instead of to those who urged them to introduce the Bill. Lord Scarman held a balanced view. He said:

> "The social conditions in Brixton—many of which are to be found in other inner city areas—do not provide an excuse for disorder. They cannot justify attacks on the police in the streets, arson or riot."

> "At the same time the disorders in Brixton cannot be fully understood unless they are seen in the context of complex political, social and economic factors. In analysing communal disturbances such as those in Brixton and elsewhere, to ignore the existence of those factors is to put the nation in peril."

Lord Scarman made many proposals, many of which have never been carried out. I have not the slightest doubt what his view would be about the withdrawal of money from inner cities and areas such as my constituency. I have little doubt of the contempt he would have for this pitiful measure to deal with such a giant disease.

6.32 pm

Mr. John Wheeler (Westminster, North): It is a pleasure to follow the right hon. Member for Blaenau Gwent (Mr. Foot) who displayed his immense anxiety for liberty and freedom. That anxiety is as keenly felt by hon. Members on this side of the House as by the right hon. Gentleman. He raised many points about the Bill, but the Bill seeks to balance the rights of people and to define their freedoms and obligations.

This is not a hasty piece of legislation, as has sometimes been implied in the debate so far. It emerges from one of the most careful and profound considerations which began when my right hon. Friend, now Lord President of the Council and Leader of the House of Lords, introduced a review of public order in 1979. Many people, groups and institutions have contributed to the work of the review, the inquiry and the Bill. They include groups who have already been referred to, such as the Associations of Chief Police Officers of England and Wales, and of Scotland. They were carefully consulted, and as a consequence of some of their suggestions the proposals were amended before coming to the House for our detailed consideration. The Police Federation of England and Wales submitted a substantial review on public order, which my right hon. Friend the Home Secretary took into account. Lord Scarman's report has also contributed to the Bill, as has the report of the Law Commission on public order offences, and the works of many other bodies and institutions.

Clearly, the Bill touches on important, difficult and controversial matters affecting freedom and liberty, but the degree of contribution to its clauses has been considerable during recent years. The Bill does not markedly depart from our philosophy of policing. On the contrary, an underpinning principle of the Bill is that the police will continue to employ the minimum force in the preservation of public order on the streets. The Bill does not dramatically extend police powers, but represents a careful effort to uphold traditional freedoms, such as the right to protest, march and picket peaceably, within a framework of law. Surely that is what we all want to achieve.

I am especially pleased to see a better definition of riot, and of the supporting offences of affray and disorderly conduct. The old common law definitions were in need of review. We should remember that riot involves the deployment of 12 or more people committing grave and serious offences. The Bill gives courts greater sentencing flexibility, and reflects the gravity of the offence of riot. It is right that it should be defined as one of the rarest and least prosecuted offences, and I hope that that will always be so.

The offence of disorderly conduct, which is new and is at the bottom of the scale of crimes that may be committed, is a necessary offence that should be included on the statute book. All hon. Members will have experienced residents' associations complaining about what a minority of people, usually youths, have done to terrify an estate and disrupt the peace and tranquillity of a community. We all know of the difficulty of the police in dealing with such incidents. The offence of disorderly conduct is satisfactorily set out.

I agree with my right hon. Friend the Home Secretary that it was sensible to drop the word "substantial" which appeared in the White Paper. I speak from the point of view of one who has served as a magistrate and has had to try cases. It is extremely difficult for a court to say whether what occurred was "substantial" because it is a question of debate, degree and interpretation of what "substantial" may mean. The offence of disorderly conduct as defined in the Bill makes it clear that there must be a victim or group of victims who have originated the complaint to the police. It has been said in the House and elsewhere that this is a type of sus law offence. I was Chairman of the Select Committee that prepared the report that led to the House repealing the sus law.

Mr. Alex Carlile: The hon. Gentleman says that there is a requirement in clause 5 that someone—presumably a member of the public—should make a complaint to the police. I should be grateful if the hon. Gentleman would point out that provision, because I have overlooked it.

Mr. Wheeler: The clause does not specifically say——

Mr. Carlile: Then why say that it does?

Mr. Wheeler: If the hon. and learned Gentleman will allow me to continue, he will perhaps understand my point. Of course the clause does not state that there shall be a victim. I suggest that that is not said in almost all of the criminal law. The provisions create a series of offences based upon events. It is the prosecution's duty to produce the evidence to buttress its case before the courts. The offence of disorderly conduct is not a victimless crime. It requires a group of people or an individual to pose a complaint to the police and say, "We have trouble on our council estate. We need your attendance. We need you to take some action."

Mr. John Ryman (Blyth Valley): Surely that is an oversimplification. There are many cases in which prosecutions are brought in which, for one reason or another, the victim has not complained or cannot be traced. The evidence to the prosecution therefore consists of a police observation or something like that. Is not the hon. Gentleman wrong in saying that there must be a victim to produce affirmative evidence of the offence?

Mr. Wheeler: There must be a victim, even if it is only the state. If a vehicle excise licence is not obtained, there is a loss of revenue and the victim is the community. It is in that context that I deploy the term "victim".

The disorderly conduct offence is not a new sus law. I was Chairman of the Select Committee that prepared a report that led eventually to the House repealing that part of the Vagrancy Act 1824 which so many of us thought offensive and undesirable. Clause 5 is in no way a sus law. If it were, I would determinedly oppose it. I welcome the provision. It will make a significant contribution towards improving the quality of life of many ordinary people, especially in the urban areas where they are often at a great disadvantage because of the conduct of a minority.

It is important that the police should be notified about marches and parades. It is a matter of debate whether it should be seven days' notice or less. During the 17 months between 12 February 1983 and 20 July 1984 there were 112 marches in the city of Westminster in the heart of London requiring the deployment of more than 100 officers of the Metropolitan police. When a large march is taking place and the resources of the police have to be called in from all over the Metropolitan police area—this affects the lives of people elsewhere in London who are thus deprived of a police presence—it is reasonable that the police should have the opportunity to prepare for the march and to summon their resources.

The new power to deal with static demonstrations is reasonable and should help the police to control the type of events that cause distress. I remind hon. Members of the particularly unpleasant incident in St. James's square a year ago, which had such awesome consequences. I welcome especially the clause dealing with incitement to racial hatred. I strongly believe that people of every race and colour deserve the protection of the law against racial abuse and the kind of hate campaigns that some hon. Members, especially those from inner London, know can occur. It is right to give reasonable protection to all sections of the community. I welcome the provision to cover behaviour, words or written material intended to cause racial hatred.

The proposal for a new exclusion order system, which depends to some extent on the provision of a photograph, is reasonable and should offer some deterrence to football hooliganism. There is nothing new in this, because, 85 years ago, a black book was maintained in most police stations containing the photographs of habitual drunkards who caused disorder on the streets. Police officers who were going out on duty could peruse the photographs to ascertain those people from whom they might expect trouble and the action that they might need to take. With this measure the police will be able to use photographs through their collators' offices to prevent hooligans from going to football matches.

The Bill will be subject to the inevitable scrutiny of the Standing Committee, but it is a balanced package which seeks to ensure that the police and the courts have reasonable, but fair, powers. It tries to deal with the most controversial aspects of public life — the use of the highway and the behaviour of people on it. I commend the legislation. I believe that it will be successful in reaching its objectives.

Mr. Robert Maclennan (Caithness and Sutherland): The hon. Member for Westminster, North (Mr. Wheeler) was right to remind the House that the genesis of the Bill was not recent. Since Lord Whitelaw initiated the inquiry into public order, a succession of events have accentuated the need for the review that was introduced in the wake of the Southall riots. From time to time the Government give the impression, not of carrying out a deliberate review, but of responding by legislation to events as they arise. I take no general exception to that — indeed, the alliance supported, for the most part, the Sporting Events (Control of Alcohol etc.) Act 1985 to deal with football hooliganism. This Bill extends those proposals.

I listened with great attention to the Home Secretary, in the hope that he would underline and explain the Government's basic philosophy and objective in bringing forward this legislation with its sweeping changes in the codification of the old common law offences — in the light of the recommendations of the Law Commission — and with its important and, in some respects, controversial amendments to the Public Order Act 1936.

The introduction by the Home Secretary, in which he set out his thinking, was extremely exiguous. He merely stated that there were two considerations: first, that the citizen should be able to pursue his lawful business without interference or disruption by others exercising unreasonable means to threaten; and, secondly, that there should be rights of assembly. He did not say how he felt that the changes he was proposing in the Bill would increase police effectiveness to control an unacceptable breakdown of public order. That was the penumbra of his speech that was missing. It leads one to take the view that the Bill contains an element of gesture which is inappropriate when considering its merits.

The Government too often confuse law and order by linking them inextricably together. Of course it is right that the framework of the law should be such as to enable those who are charged with the responsibility of maintaining the law to do their job effectively. We must express considerable doubt about whether mere changes in the law render more effective the work of the law enforcement agencies. There is a strong onus of proof on those who seek to make changes in the law which in some respects curtail established principles and in others change practices and laws which over the years have been found adequate to provide for the needs of the police.

The Home Secretary has not explained the deficiencies in the existing public order law, or the fact that representations were made by some bodies and individuals, or why he thought it right to depart from the proposals contained in the Government's White Paper. His speech was empty of argument to persuade me that the changes are necessary or desirable. The right hon. Gentleman has conceded somewhat too much to those who feel less sensitive than they should about the rights of the individual in a democratic society. He produced a most convoluted argument to show that his proposal to extend controls over static assemblies and marches to those who threatened coercion was in some way a libertarian measure. He did not face the difficulty that traditionally the police have found little problem in controlling public meetings by the use of the criminal law.

The increase in the number of public demonstrations is not indicative of a growing problem of control. They might involve more police than before, and that perhaps is inevitable if we are to maintain the right of freedom of assembly to which we are, I believe, committed.

The common law powers, in particular the breach of the peace powers, available to the police have worked relatively well, and there is not the same pressing need for an extension of the controls contained in the Public Order Act 1936 as there was perceived to be in 1936. Merely because 50 years have elapsed is not a good reason, as the Home Secretary seemed to suggest, for enlarging the powers in the way that he proposes.

The issue which the Home Secretary hinted — he never stated it — was crucial in his thinking was the fact that it was necessary to exercise prior restraint over demonstrations which might threaten a breach of public order. I presume he feels that the common law remedies which have been customarily invoked by the police to deal with static assemblies are inadequate because they are exercised ex post facto. That is not strictly the case, because breach of the peace powers can be invoked before trouble occurs.

The argument about the need for such powers would have carried greater weight if the Government had shown the slightest inclination to use the civil powers which they took to themselves to control mass picketing during the miners' strike. It was conspicuous that those civil powers were not used. One can only assume that that was because the Government felt that it was inappropriate to use them.

Mr. Douglas Hogg rose——

Mr. Maclennan: The hon. Gentleman always provides a descant to my speech, and because I enjoy his speeches I am delighted to give way.

Mr. Hogg: The hon. Gentleman frequently gets his facts wrong, but he is a nice chap and I always like listening to him. Civil powers belong to the employers in disputes, and they cannot be invoked by the Government acting as the Government.

Mr. Maclennan: The point at issue is whether the powers, be they civil or criminal, are effective. The Government went to great lengths to persuade the House that the civil power should be amended to deal with the circumstances which we now appear to be having to deal with by amending the criminal law. I am not persuaded that the Government were wrong to effect that change in the civil law, but they cannot claim that the civil law failed during the miners' strike and therefore the criminal law must be amended, because they never used the civil law.

Mr. Hogg: The Government do not have the power to invoke the civil law; that is for the employer.

Mr. Maclennan: The hon. Gentleman is not as naive as he would sometimes like us to believe when he suggests that there was no communication between the Government and the chairman of the affected nationalised steel and coal industries.

Mr. Lyell: Will the hon. Gentleman clarify his party's position on this matter? It is accepted by the National Union of Mineworkers — the NUM suggested it — that six was a reasonable number of peaceful pickets. If a great mob of people who are likely physically to try to prevent others from going into work are standing beside those six and blocking the way, does his party oppose the fact that the police should have the power to say, "No, you must stand over there as one of the conditions of your demonstration"?

Mr. Maclennan: The police already have the power to take action if they apprehend that a breach of the peace will result from the presence of more than six pickets. It is an offence to cause a breach of the peace. It is that provision that gives the police the authority that they enjoy.

I supported the Government's view that those who considered that their civil liberties or those of their employees were at risk could invoke the civil law. I am not persuaded that the balance of the argument favours giving the police the power in respect of static assemblies that the Bill proposes. A fine balance must be struck between the need to protect the right of freedom of expresssion and the right to peaceful assembly in association with others, and the duty to protect individuals going about their lawful business from violence, intimidation and harassment. The Government have not dispatched the onus of showing that the law that distinguished between marches and static assembly 50 years ago should be altered.

The Government have not only extended the controls to static assembly, but they have changed the grounds on which the police may exercise controls on marches. The scope of the Public Order Act 1936 has been widened unacceptably. It is no longer confined to circumstances where the police believe that there will be serious risk of public disorder. The additional circumstance, where serious disruption to community life is feared, or where it is feared that an individual could be faced with intimidation or coercion, are unacceptable extensions of that power.

We agree that the requirement of notification is acceptable in principle, although we can argue in Committee about the length of time. The right hon. Member for Manchester, Gorton (Mr. Kaufman) got it right when he distinguished between the Scottish case and that of England. Six clear days' notice is too long. The effectiveness of demonstration often comes from its spontaneity, but we can pursue that point in Committee.

My principal anxiety is that the Government have not given weight to the inhibition which the controls on assemblies and marches will place on freedom of expression. It is easy to drive opposition underground, but that can be considerably more dangerous to society than opposition that is freely expressed in an orderly way by a group of people appearing in public. The Government should not curtail freedom of assembly without producing more evidence to suggest that curtailment will have the desired effect.

I wish to discuss the new offence of disorderly conduct as defined in clause 5, which differs from the definition in the White Paper. This is one of the Government's more risky steps in the Bill and one which has been taken without any compelling reason. The alliance supported the view that there was a need for codification of the old common law offences, and we broadly supported the definitions of those new offences in the White Paper. We believe that there is a case for amending section 5 of the Public Order Act 1936 to create the new offences in clauses 4 and 5. However, the definitions in clause 5 are alarming.

With regard to disorderly conduct, when the White Paper was published we supported the view that there was a need to create an offence punishable by a fine for threatening or abusive words or behaviour which caused substantial alarm, harassment or distress. There is no such requirement in the Bill.

The Government strongly supported the original proposals in the White Paper, which set out the proposed limitations on the new offence. Paragraph 3.26 of the White Paper states:

"The Government recognises that there would be justifiable objections to a wide extension of the criminal law which might catch conduct not deserving of criminal sanctions. For this reason the offence contains the safeguard that the behaviour must actually cause someone to feel alarmed, harassed or distressed (not that it is merely likely to do so). Any degree of annoyance or disturbance will not suffice: because the offence would be concerned primarily to protect the weak and vulnerable, the proposed definition requires evidence that the victim suffered substantial alarm, harassment or distress."

The definition is not simply a matter for the Committee. An important issue of principle is raised. The Bill hands to the police a wide discretionary power which, if used insensitively, could degenerate into a serious exacerbation of the relations that exist between the more junior members of the police who come into contact with the public and those who are most likely to be involved in that type of offence, such as young people and ethnic minorities.

It is especially disturbing that the police will not be required to produce in court the person who is alleged to have been alarmed. In fact, there is no requirement that anyone has to be alarmed. The clause is sufficiently seriously defective to call into question whether the Bill should be supported on Second Reading. However, my objections are wider than that. The alliance supports the amendment tabled by the Labour party, and we broadly adopt its reasoning.

There have been some striking breakdowns of public order in Britain in recent years, which have understandably given rise to considerable public disquiet. Before we legislate to change the law, it is important to show that the proposed changes will produce the necessary effect. The Government did not discharge that duty in the speech of the Home Secretary tonight.

7.9 pm

Mr. Warren Hawksley (The Wrekin): I was glad to hear the hon. Member for Caithness and Sutherland (Mr. Maclennan) say how the alliance will vote tonight, because I was not sure about the position from the arguments that he put. However, the hon. Gentleman must be grateful that he succeeded in doubling the representation of his party in the House today when the right hon. Member for Glasgow, Hillhead (Mr. Jenkins) arrived during his speech. His speech showed the problems of the alliance, which does not know which way it is going on this and on many other issues.

I welcome the proposals in the Bill. I also welcome not only the Government's commitment but the Prime Minister's personal commitment to making law and order more relevant and giving it a high priority. We should welcome the holding of the conference last week to highlight the problems of law and order. That is what the public demands.

During the Second Reading debate on the Police and Criminal Evidence Bill, I spoke about the fine balance between the powers of police officers to carry out their duties and the work that the public expects of them and the civil rights of individuals. I said on that occasion—and I repeated it in Committee—that the civil rights lobby seemed to be winning the day on many occasions. I hope that when this Bill goes to Committee the Government will reject any moves to alter the emphasis of the Bill towards the civil liberties lobby. During the 59 Committee sittings of the Police and Criminal Evidence Bill, it was alarming to see that nearly all the Opposition amendments had the stamp of the National Council for Civil Liberties.

Mr. Alex Carlile: If the hon. Gentleman was so alarmed by the amendments tabled to the Police and Criminal Evidence Bill, why did he not express his alarm until about the 56th sitting of the Committee?

Mr. Hawksley: Had the hon. Gentleman attended the Committee as often as I did, he would have realised that I raised various matters in Committee. I was certainly there much more often than he was. It was interesting to hear the Opposition accuse the Police and Criminal Evidence Bill of creating bureaucracy for the police force, when their amendments to include so-called safeguards provided such bureaucracy. I do not understand how the right hon. Member for Manchester, Gorton (Mr. Kaufman) could have made that point earlier today.

The public demand that the police have the power to stop a small minority in society — whether they be football hooligans, illegal pickets or a threatening mob of youths — intimidating the young and the elderly and endangering innocent lives or their property. People want action and they believe that this legislation will give them action. The right of an individual to live in peace without threat to his life or his property must be protected by the House, and this legislation will do so.

Television has reported acts of violence, terrorist acts which cause anxiety to many members of the public. It is unacceptable that many of those acts do not result in court appearances. When they do, we often discover that the powers which we thought existed do not exist. That is why we must give the police the additional powers that the Bill suggests. The need for the new offence of disorderly behaviour will be clear to anyone who has watched what has happened on television and seen in their homes acts which the public believe should be stopped.

With other Members of Parliament, I received literature from the NCCL in preparation for today's debate. I suspect that the hon. and learned Member for Montgomery (Mr. Carlile) will, like me, have received a letter from the Shropshire and Mid-Wales branch of the NCCL, which states that the new proposals would mean:

"You could be arrested for: organising a demonstration without police permission, taking part in a demonstration that has been banned, ignoring police conditions . . . ignoring police directions."

So what? Most of my electors would be grateful if the police had those powers if it meant that demonstrations would show respect for their property and for their lives. They believe that the police would use those powers wisely. It worries me that a body such as the NCCL should believe that citizens go round in fear of being mugged or arrested by the police. That is not the case in my constituency. My constituents fear being mugged and attacked, and believe that the police act as a deterrent and are their friends. That is how it should be; that is how the majority of the public believe it is. They do not accept the NCCL's arguments on that matter.

Those who oppose the legislation, especially its proposals on marches, are the same people who expect the police to respond under the present legislation when the National Front proposes to march through a sensitive area. They should support this legislation on marches and static demonstrations, because it gives the police the power to respond to the fears of those who live in the areas where marches are likely to occur.

Most hon. Members seem to believe that the sentences provided in the Bill are about right, although there has been criticism of one proposal. I am not worried about the sentences available under the legislation, but I question whether they will be used to their full. The public showed great admiration for Judge Michael Argyle when he sentenced a Chelsea football fan to life imprisonment. They believe that that example should be followed.

Mr. Kevin Barron (Rother Valley): With regard to the Chelsea football supporter who was imprisoned for life for that vicious attack, does the hon. Gentleman believe that the law is likely to be ridiculed if, on appeal, that sentence is greatly reduced, which most people believe it will be? Is that not ridiculing the law instead of having sensible law?

Mr. Hawksley: I was about to say, without dealing with that case—although I admired the line taken by the judge — that we must ensure that the appeal judges respond to that sort of public attitude. We need tough sentencing.

Mr. Alex Carlile: On a point of order, Mr. Deputy Speaker. Is it right for an hon. Member to support a sentence passed by a court of first instance when that sentence is subject to a pending appeal in which notice of appeal has already been filed?

Mr. Deputy Speaker (Mr. Harold Walker): The sub judice rule does not apply when the House is considering legislation.

Mr. Hawksley: It is important to encourage and to support the judiciary in giving sentences that fit the crime. The time may come when the House considers the need not only for maximum sentences, but for minimum sentences, unless we see that the law is being used to the full. Our electors will insist that the House protects them.

One aspect of the Bill which causes me some concern —it will be considered in detail in Committee—is the Riot (Damages) Act 1886. We now have insurance and the Criminal Damages Act 1971 which help many people who would otherwise be out of pocket after their properties are damaged. I question whether, in this day and age, we need to retain that Act. Although riots may be less common under the new definition in clause 1, I should think that people could make their own arrangements to cover themselves against the risks covered in the Bill.

Also the Bill does not cover the people who deliberately trespass on private land with the purpose of committing a criminal offence. The National Farmers Union has brought that to our notice and I hope that the Committee will fill that gap in the Bill.

People have had enough. They have seen enough on television. They saw the violence by the miners last year.

[Mr. Hawksley]

They have seen enough of the hooliganism at football matches. They demand action. The Bill is a right response and I have great pleasure in supporting it.

7.20 pm

Mr. David Clelland (Tyne Bridge): I stand here today proud to represent the people of the Tyne Bridge constituency but conscious, as are we all, of the tragic events which brought about my presence in the House. My predecessor, Harry Cowans, was not only an excellent representative of the people and a first class Member of Parliament; he was a personal friend for many years. Harry and I met before we became members of the Labour party. We joined the party at about the same time. We served together on Gateshead county borough council and, following local government reorganisation, the Gateshead metropolitan borough council. We were even members of the same social club. It comes, therefore, as no surprise to me to learn that Harry was well respected by hon. Members on both sides of the House. Tyne Bridge, the House and the country are the poorer for his untimely departure.

I know that his wife Margaret and his family would wish me to express personally their deep appreciation to all those who have been so kind and who have expressed sympathy and sadness. It is a great comfort to his wife and family to be reminded so vividly of the high esteem in which that bonny lad from Tyneside was held by Members of the House and by the staff here.

In Harry's maiden speech to the House in November 1976 he spoke of the difficult task that he faced in filling the shoes of his predecessor, Lord Glenamara, or Ted Short, MP, as he then was. Harry lived up to that task. He gave good account of himself as a Member of Parliament and was loved and respected in his constituency. Indeed, only last week I attended a ceremony at which a Tyneside metro car was named Harry Cowans in his memory.

Now it is my turn to say, as Harry said in his maiden speech,

"That is, indeed, an eminent and enviable record to follow." —[Official Report,24 November 1976; Vol. 921, c.111.]

My task will be to match that record and to represent the best interests of the people of Tyne Bridge. In so doing I shall follow in the very capable footsteps of Harry Cowans.

It will be my task to stand up and fight for the thousands of decent families in my constituency who suffer the frustration and indignity of unemployment, the thousands of young people who have been denied the opportunity to build decent lives for themselves, the thousands of elderly people who suffer from inadequate incomes and insecurity and the thousands who have jobs but also suffer from worry and insecurity as redundancy announcements become an almost daily occurrence.

As leader of Gateshead council for the last two years I know of the efforts by the local authorities in the area to overcome those and other problems. Many improvements have been made. I have also suffered the frustration of being prevented from progressing on anything like the scale necessary, by continual attacks on our rate support grant, capital spending and housing programmes.

Tyne Bridge constituency is contained within the Newcastle/Gateshead inner area. It is an inner city constituency with all the problems currently typical of such areas, which are prominent in all our minds. Its people face the difficulties of escalating crime rates, plummeting housing starts, high unemployment and low incomes. Yet, despite these cruel ups and downs of inner city life, the people remain resilient and retain the Geordie friendliness and good humour which so impressed the many visitors to the constituency during the recent by-election campaign.

Unfortunately, some mistake our conviviality for contentment and our resilience for resignation. I say to the House that the people of our inner cities are neither content nor resigned to accepting that the problems cannot be resolved. Indeed, discontentment and a refusal to become resigned to accepting inner city conditions have too often spilt over into violence on city streets. It is the frustration of knowing that there can be—there ought to be—a better way of life for themselves and their families but being unable to achieve it that generates anger. It is the need, the desire to escape from the problems that too often drives people into drug or alcohol abuse.

If the problems of disorder in the cities are to be resolved, and if harmony is to prevail, more emphasis must be placed on tackling the causes rather than the effects. That does not mean that we should be soft on crime. I am not implying that the Bill is totally irrelevant to the problems. Indeed, I welcome the measures proposed to combat racism and the repugnant literature that promotes it. However, my constituents who suffer from such activities might well feel that it does not go far enough. I have always believed that prevention is better than cure and that rehabilitation is better than revenge.

In its present form the Bill is unlikely to promote better relationships between the police and the community. It gives chief constables, and in some cases more junior officers, the power to make political decisions and to exercise political judgments. It undermines traditional liberties. It is restrictive and will not achieve its goal. Worst of all, it diverts our attention from the real questions —why these problems have arisen in our society and how we so arrange things that we reverse the trends.

So long as we concentrate more of our time on talking about combating disorder than we do about creating the conditions in which disorder need not occur we are not using our time or our imaginations in the best interests of our children. They will inherit the consequences of our failures.

We have witnessed some ugly incidents in recent years and of course we cannot stand by while crime rises, riots break out and disorder threatens the peaceful lives of ordinary people. But equally — no, principally — we cannot ignore the link between rising unemployment, poverty and deteriorating social conditions with rising crime, vandalism and unrest, particularly in our inner cities.

We must take measures to cure the disease, not merely treat the symptoms. The measures should be designed to protect and enhance freedom and democracy, not—as I fear will happen if the Bill is enacted in its present form —damage civil freedoms and individual liberties while doing little or nothing to relieve the frustrations and tensions of inner city life.

The Home Secretary has said that public order is the essence of any civilised society. But surely, if order can be maintained only by increasingly punitive measures, it is an indication that civilised behaviour is deteriorating and that society itself is therefore becoming less civilised.

Last year was international youth year. Young people all over our country were encouraged to think about the society in which they lived and to develop an understanding of the importance of harmonious international relationships. Yet, despite some marvellous work —nowhere better than in my constituency—too many of our young people were unable to find contentment and were driven to violence, vandalism and crime.

This year has been designated as the international year for peace. We all hope and pray for peace, but if we want peace on our city streets we shall have to do more than hope. Peace is something for which we shall have to work, and in ways that the Bill does not address itself to or take into consideration. We must begin in earnest to encourage investment in Britain, to restore confidence and to bring new hope to the regions and the cities.

In 1979, we were offered hope and harmony, but a lack of hope and a growing pessimism have destroyed harmony and created discord and disorder. When we mobilise our construction industry to resolve the massive housing problems, many of which we inherited from the 1950s and 1960s, when we begin to show real support for our engineering and new technology industries, when we generate real jobs and meaningful training and when people can plan for their future because they have secure employment, the calls for new hope and harmony in the years of youth, peace and industry may be rewarded by some identifiable results.

In a truly civilised society, the Bill would be irrelevant. Therefore, the challenge to civilised people is to create conditions that make unnecessary the measures that are proposed in the Bill. That must be our real and only goal.

7.32 pm

Mr. Jerry Hayes (Harlow): It is with particular pleasure that I have the honour to congratulate the hon. Member for Tyne Bridge (Mr. Clelland) on his maiden speech. I think that Members on both sides of the House will agree that it was a maiden speech in the finest traditions of the House, being short, to the point, and from the heart.

I am sure that the hon. Member for Tyne Bridge will be the first to appreciate that Harry Cowans was held in great esteem and respect in this place. He managed to combine the ability to fight hard for his constituency and party with being well liked on both sides of the House. As I have said, I congratulate the hon. Gentleman on his maiden speech. It is obvious that he is a man to be watched. Anyone who can bring 30 members of the Labour party into the Chamber at 7.31 pm is bound to do well. The newly appointed Opposition Chief Whip is in his place, and I am sure that he will be watching the hon. Gentleman.

I turn to the less pleasant subject of public order. I welcome the Bill and I suspect that that welcome will be echoed throughout the country, especially by those who live on housing estates that have been subjected to the spiralling lawlessness of the past 10 years. I was disappointed when Opposition Members suggested that the Bill was ill thought out. Nothing could be further from the truth. This is not a panic measure that has been introduced because of the miners' strike. Labour Members should appreciate that consultations on public order legislation began as long ago as 1979.

I always find the right hon. Member for Manchester, Gorton (Mr. Kaufman) at his most unnerving when he tries to be nice, and he tried desperately to be nice this afternoon. I find it sickening when the Labour party masquerades as the party that cares for the aspirations of ordinary people. All in this House and all who watch television and read newspapers know that nothing could be further from the truth. We know what has been happening in the inner cities. We read reports about those who have been manipulating organised violence and intimidation. When it comes to the day of reckoning at the next general election and the electorate has to decide which party will form the next Government, perhaps it will ask where the Labour party was when the bricks were winging their way through the windows of miners' houses. Perhaps it will ask where the Labour party was when it came to condemning violence irrespective of its source.

On every occasion that the Government have brought legislation before the House to give the police the powers that they need so desperately to enforce the law and protect the citizen, what has the Labour party done? The answer is that it has voted against the proposed legislation. It even had the hypocrisy to vote against the prevention of terrorism legislation while almost at the same time condemning the bombing at Brighton. That is the party that is masquerading as the party of law and order. I believe that that charade will be seen through.

Labour Members have told us that they believe in civil liberties and the freedom of the individual. We know and they know for what their police committees stand. Civil liberties mean, in their terms, political control of the police.

I welcome the revamped offence of riot. It is only right and proper that its terms should have been changed to provide for 12 persons as opposed to three. Similarly, as a legal practitioner who prosecutes and defends, I am pleased that the law has been clarified and that a person of normal and reasonable firmness does not have to be present. The right hon. Member for Gorton seemed to think that that was a departure in the law. If he reads Smith and Hogan's Criminal Law, especially page 737, he will find that it has been the law for quite some time.

I move on to the more important offences regarding and affecting ordinary people. We talk about flashpoints and picketing and all that is involved when serious public disorder breaks out—we have seen shocking violence on picket lines and there has been shocking violence, and sometimes death, in public demonstrations — but although such events have increased in number over the past decade, it is merciful that they are still few and far between. They constitute the flashpoints and they are the matters that the media like to play up, sometimes, sadly, out of all proportion.

The Bill deals with everyday occurrences of violence and hooliganism and that is one reason why it should be welcomed, especially by many of those who are living within council estates and are terrified of opening their doors at night. They are terrified of going out on to the streets for fear of being assaulted or mugged. That is not a generalisation and it happens to be a fact. Only this morning I was prosecuting in a case in which young people had terrorised a whole community. They had set out to burgle flats in the area where they live. Indeed, they burgled the same block of flats in which they live. One of the prosecution's difficulties was that it could not get witnesses to say that these youngsters were terrorising the community.

Mr. Alex Carlile: So the hon. Gentleman lost the case.

Mr. Hayes: I am happy to say not. One of the difficulties in such cases, especially those involving hooliganism and harassment on the streets, is that members of the public telephone the police to complain but are not prepared to attend court as witnesses. They decline to do so because they are frightened. That is unfortunate but it is something that I can understand. That is why the offence of disorderly conduct is ideal for that sort of situation.

Mr. Alex Carlile: For attempted burglary?

Mr. Hayes: The hon. and learned Gentleman should pay more attention. I was giving an example of what happens on estates where young people control law and order — perhaps the hon. and learned Gentleman is listening now and will learn something. It does happen, people are afraid to come out; that was the example I was giving to the hon. and learned Gentleman. When this legislation is on the statute book, there will be added protection for the public.

I can understand some of the fears voiced by hon. Members and the National Council for Civil Liberties about harassment being substantial. This was in the White Paper — I think the hon. and learned Member for Montgomery (Mr. Carlile) would agree with me on that point. There was always the view that perhaps the younger police officers could take advantage of certain situations. That happened with the sus law, which we had to abolish, and quite rightly. It was open to abuse. There is a thin dividing line between what is harassment, what is riot and what is boisterous behaviour. For this reason I ask my hon. Friend the Minister, who is replying, to consider this carefully when the Bill goes into Committee.

Mr. Tony Lloyd: This is an important point and I think the hon. Gentleman should not simply ask the Minister but tell us precisely what he would do. If the hon. Gentleman is not prepared to do so, all his comments about recognising the doubts over this aspect of the Bill are simply pious nonsense. What would he do?

Mr. Hayes: With respect to the hon. Gentleman, I have just told him: the original word in the White Paper, "substantial", should be put in the legislation. The dividing line between boisterous behaviour, harassment and riot would then not be such a thin one.

Mr. Kaufman: Plus a victim.

Mr. Hayes: There is a very good reason why we cannot have a victim. I know that the right hon. Gentleman says that we should, as does the NCCL. People have been so frightened of their neighbours who have been terrifying them that they are not prepared to go to the police and become witnesses in court. Those of us who are practitioners recognise that this is a problem.

Mr. Kenneth Hind (Lancashire, West): Does my hon. Friend not feel that he will have the same problem as our right hon. Friend the Secretary of State in defining what "substantial" means and to what extent behaviour becomes substantial or less than substantial? Perhaps in those circumstances my hon. Friend will feel that it is better to leave the word out.

Mr. Hayes: I hesitate to disagree with my hon. Friend, who I know is very learned in these matters. However, by putting in the word "substantial" the difference between boisterous behaviour, harassment and alarm is absolutely clear. That is the point I want to get across.

With regard to processions and marches, the Opposition say that the proposals are a major infringement of civil liberties. Nothing could be further from the truth. Many of the powers that are codified by the Bill are contained in section 3 of the Public Order Act 1936. There is now the sensible requirement for consultation—this is what it is effectively — and contact between the organisers of the marchers and the police. Therefore, any flashpoints or any difficulties are likely to be sorted out beforehand. This has been the experience in the past. Many organisers go to the police and report precisely what they are doing. In the past local authorities have consulted with the police on these matters and it is absolutely proper that the police and the police alone make the decision.

It has been suggested by the Opposition that it is a political decision. How can the police be making a political decision when they are asked under clause 12 to consider the following:

"(a) it may result in serious public disorder, serious damage to property or serious disruption to the life of the community"?

Where is the political decision?

The NCCL has compounded that lie. In its press release it states:

"For the first time the police are going to be able to limit the duration, number or place at which an open air demonstration takes place on the grounds of serious public disorder, serious disruption to the life of the community, or intimidation. So a peaceful group of parents protesting outside the council offices about the lack of zebra crossings in their area, a picket outside a supermarket to persuade customers not to buy South African goods and even vigils outside churches could be moved on by the police even if there is no violence or threat of violence to persons or property."

Really, that is arrant nonsense.

Mr. Kaufman: No, it is not.

Mr. Hayes: I heard the right hon. Member for Gorton say, from a sedentary position, "No, it is not". I challenge him to look at clause 12 and tell the House how those examples from the NCCL briefing can possibly be banned within the terms of this Bill. The right hon. Gentleman has an opportunity—he shakes his head. Is he afraid to do so? It is more likely that he is unable to do so. The truth is that there will be no more major infringements of any public liberty or freedom of expression than there have been since section 3 of the Public Order Act 1936.

I view with certain concern the new test on major disruption in the community and I ask my hon. Friend the Minister to consider this when replying. We must never allow that test to become just a convenience and nothing more than that. The protection of the people must always come first.

The last matter I would draw to the attention of my hon. Friend the Minister is a point brought to the House's attention by the hon. Member for Caithness and Sutherland (Mr. Maclennan). I found it quite impossible, listening to the hon. Member, to know whether he was speaking on behalf of the alliance, because we are not sure what the alliance is saying. A few weeks ago the hon. Member said that the SDP was all in favour of this legislation. Then we hear that the Liberal party is not in favour. Evidently, from what we understand, the alliance, for what it is worth, is completely split asunder on this matter. For example, it appears that the Liberal party is against any form of requirement. [Interruption.] It is very difficult to make oneself heard.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order. There is too much noise.

Mr. Hayes: I am sure that there is an interesting conversation taking place on the Opposition Benches and I imagine that something exciting will happen when so many hon. Members have been removed from the various bars.

One aspect of the provisions concerning marches and processions worries me. People should have the right to a judicial review. That is a reiteration of section 3 of the 1936 Act. The difficulty is that that can be expensive and slow. I hope that my hon. Friend the Minister will consider that in Committee and see whether a legal aid fund could be established to help or, more importantly, will see whether some of the decisions could be transferred to a county or Crown court.

The Bill would in no way infringe civil liberties. It is an answer to the cry in the wilderness from many people in council estates who are desperately frightened because their estates have been turned into ghettoes of fear.

Mr. John Smith (Monklands, East): On a point of order, Mr. Deputy Speaker, arising out of the statement made earlier this afternoon by the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry.

The House will recall that the right hon. Member for Henley (Mr. Heseltine) asked the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry whether he had seen any letter from British Aerospace about the meeting between the Secretary of State and the chief executive of British Aerospace. The Secretary of State replied that he personally had not received any such letter.

As the House will recall, there was repeated questioning of the Secretary of State, and the impression that he conveyed was that he was not aware of any letter having come to the Government from British Aerospace. In reply to a specific question by my hon. Friend the Member for Bolsover (Mr. Skinner), the Secretary of State said—here I rely on my memory—"I am not aware of any letter from Lygo to anyone else either." I submit that that reply created the clear impression in the mind of the House that there had been no letter from British Aerospace to the Government, and questioning of the Secretary of State on that matter ceased.

I can only speak for myself, but I left the Chamber under the impression that the Government had rebutted the allegation that any letter had come from British Aerospace to the Government. The Secretary of State might claim that he was technically correct to say that no letter had been received from Lygo, but I am reliably informed—I do not think there is any dispute about this—that at noon today a letter was delivered by hand addressed to the Prime Minister, to No. 10 Downing street, from Sir Austin Pearce, the chairman of British Aerospace, and that the content of that letter related to a meeting between the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry and Admiral Sir Raymond Lygo, the chief executive of British Aerospace, and may well contain the recollections of the chief executive of British Aerospace about what transpired at that meeting.

There is no doubt that three and a half hours elapsed between a letter being given to the Prime Minister's office and a statement being made to the House of Commons by the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry in which he said that he had explained his own position and that of the Government. Despite repeated questioning, the information that I have given the House was not provided by the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry. In those circumstances, and as the Government will not deny that the letter was delivered at noon—I gather also that explanations of what he said have been given to the press on behalf of the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry by his press department—the least I can ask for is that the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry comes back to the House today.

So as not to do any more harm to this debate, which I apologise for having had to interrupt, I request, in the presence of the Leader of the House, that the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry comes to the House after the Division at 10 pm to explain his remarkable conduct today.

The Lord Privy Seal and Leader of the House of Commons (Mr. John Biffen): I join the right hon. and learned Member for Monklands, East (Mr. Smith) in wishing not to impair this important Second Reading debate. I shall certainly look at the point that he has raised. Perhaps we could consider it through the usual channels.

Mr. Chris Smith (Islington, South and Finsbury): The House has today been given the rare privilege at this stage in a Parliament of hearing a maiden speech. That maiden speech, by my hon. Friend the Member for Tyne Bridge (Mr. Clelland), was made with clarity and wisdom. Although I am sure all hon. Members regret the sad circumstances which gave rise to the by-election, they will, I am sure, feel that my hon. Friend will be an honourable and worthy successor to Harry Cowans.

My hon. Friend the Member for Tyne Bridge said that we should concentrate on the causes rather than on the effects of crime and violence in inner cities. He urged us to cure the disease, not simply to address ourselves to the symptoms. We should bear the wisdom of that remark in mind when considering the Bill. I fear that the Government have not borne it in mind when presenting the Bill in an attempt to deal with the major problems in our inner-city areas.

This morning, Islington borough council published a survey on the level of crime in the area that I represent. It is a remarkable survey, drawn from detailed interviews with 2,000 households in the borough. It provides us with one of the clearest indications yet of the level of crime and the fear of crime in an inner-city area.

One of the survey's startling findings is that more than half of Islington's households have experienced crime in the past 12 months, and that 46 per cent. have experienced crime more than once. It shows that more than half of the women in the borough always or often avoid going out after dark because of fear of sexual attack or street robbery, that one quarter of the population always avoid going out after dark. It shows that more than one quarter feel unsafe in their own home and worry about their house being burgled, that the burglary rate in the borough is five times the national average, that the danger of burglary is 60 per cent. greater for black people than for white people and that women are 40 per cent. more likely to be assaulted on the streets than are men.

[Mr. Chris Smith]

The survey reveals much more, but the interviewers also asked for interviewees' priorities for tackling crime. They were as follows, in order of importance: sexual attacks on women, burglary, robbery in the street, heroin, drunken driving and racist attacks. The overwhelming finding of the survey is that people are worried about burglary, robbery and assault, which people such as those whom I represent experience too often and with increasing frequency. The survey also shows that only 50 per cent. of crimes were reported to the police, and that only 3·8 per cent. of all crimes were solved by the police.

It is against that background that I shall consider the Bill. The survey reveals the problems facing my constituents and many thousands of people around the country. People are concerned about these issues. Crime and the fear of crime are going up. Confidence in the policing and detection of crime is going down. The Government ought to address such issues, but I do not believe that the Bill goes any way towards that.

The first and major charge that I make against the Government is that the Bill is, by and large—there are some minor points that I welcome—irrelevant to the issues and concerns that face many millions of people in inner-city areas.

Parts I and II are the specific provisions that concern me. They concentrate on the offences of riot and the control of demonstrations, meetings, assemblies and so on. Those parts of the Bill contain a number of new provisions for offences and powers for the police to deal with them. Many of the new offences and powers are unnecessary. The police already have at their command a wide range of powers that permit them to prevent a breach of the peace if they believe that is likely to occur or is occurring. There is little in the Bill that will improve the situation.

The Bill is an attempt by the Government to seem to be doing something about matters that worry many members of the public. In many respects the new powers suggested in the Bill, and in particular the new offence of disorderly conduct, are extremely worrying. My right hon. Friend the Member for Manchester, Gorton (Mr. Kaufman) and my hon. Friend the Member for Ipswich (Mr. Weetch), in his intervention on the subject of shopping centres in his constituency, both raised an extremely important point about which all hon. Members who represent inner-city areas are deeply conscious. Many tenants of council estates fear the congregating gangs of young people. The tenants are afraid to leave their homes and wander around their estates. That does not happen only on council estates, but that is where the problem tends to be most evident, in inner-city areas.

The Government have not got it right with their new offence of disorderly conduct. That offence will not tackle the problem on estates. That problem occurred on an estate in my constituency through three summers, causing considerable distress to many tenants. The problem has been solved under existing legislation. It was solved by close and concerted action and discussion between the tenants living on the estate, the local police and the local authority that owns the buildings. The problem has been solved by regular patrolling by the police on foot through the estate and along the walkways of the various blocks. Entry phones have been fitted in the problem blocks, and there are regular meetings between police officers and tenant representatives to discuss the priorities of policing the estate and how that should be carried out.

The measures that I have described solved the problem. A new offence, which will catch all sorts of other considerations, does not need to be brought in to solve such problems. The situation does not require a new law that gives extra powers to the police in handling and dealing with members of the public. The situation needs good, sensitive, detailed policing, in concert with local people. That policy has achieved success on the estates in my constituency and I believe that it can achieve success elsewhere.

I am also anxious about the provision in the Bill dealing with marches, demonstrations and picketing.

Mr. Hayes: The hon. Gentleman said how much he applauds contact with the police. Will he therefore take the opportunity to condemn those Labour-controlled authorities which are refusing to allow the police to enter schools?

Mr. Smith: I commend the work of my local authority, which has extremely good relations with the police who sit on the police consultation committee of which I am a member. That committee meets regularly and has extremely good relations with the police. I also commend the work which many police officers—not all—are doing in Islington in coming into contact with representatives of the local community. I believe that such contacts ought to be developed nationally.

The Bill's provisions about marches and demonstrations worry me with regard to civil liberties and the power that they give to the police. My right hon. Friend the Member for Gorton was correct to point to the fact that the conditions that can be imposed on marches and static demonstrations under the Bill are entirely at the discretion of the police. The Bill gives powers to an unelected authority to determine the way in which democratic process and democratic protest can take place. I hope that we will be able to discuss those provisions in great detail in Committee.

I should also like to make a point that has not already been made. In London the power to ban a demonstration, which throughout the rest of the country will ultimately be in the hands of the local authority, will rest with the Home Secretary. No reference need be made by any police officer or the Home Secretary to a London local authority. I shall raise this point in Committee.

Having heard the speech by the hon. Member for The Wrekin (Mr. Hawksley), I am worried that there have been proposals, particularly by the Country Landowners Association, and, as I see from some of the briefing material for the debate, supported by the Association of County Councils, to amend the law on trespass to prohibit public entrance on to private land and to make that an arrestable offence in some circumstances. The proposal from the Country Landowners Association would catch a family of four out for a stroll in the country. The Opposition will keep a careful watch on such amendments if they come forward.

There are some welcome provisions in the Bill, particularly in relation to incitement to racial hatred. However, those provisions do not go far enough and the disparity between the sentences available under part I and those proposed for the racial hatred offence make one pause for thought.

I wish that the Government would consider more seriously the proposals of my hon. Friend the Member for Leyton (Mr. Cohen) to try to deal with the major problem of racial harassment which many black and Asian families face in their homes, particularly in inner London. My hon. Friend's proposed Bill would go some of the way, and I wish that the Government would be less dismissive of his proposals than the Home Secretary was when my hon. Friend intervened during his speech.

My fear about the Bill, and particularly about the part that creates the new offence of disorderly conduct, is that it may worsen relations between the police and the community. The problem with creating new powers for the police lies in determining how they will be used. I fear that the drafting of clause 5 will ensure that police officers will be tempted to use their new powers in much the same way as they used the old sus law. The Government have denied that that is the intention, but I fear that it may happen. If it does, the Bill, far from creating order on our streets and preventing disorder, may do the precise opposite.

Order in society and the prevention of disorder rest on the acceptance by all parts of the community of the fairness of the laws and of the police officers who operate the laws. I fear that the Bill will destroy the balance. We have heard much in the debate about the necessary balance between protecting the public from disorder and ensuring fundamental freedoms and civil liberties. Of course that balance must be preserved, but I think that the Government have got it wrong.

8.12 pm

Mr. Kenneth Hind (Lancashire, West): It would have been wrong for the Government to refuse to act on the events of the past 12 months and not to produce a Bill to deal with public order. I emphasise the words "public order", because the Bill is not a palliative for crimes of dishonesty or for individual assaults; it is a Bill about public order.

No one who witnessed the riots at Tottenhan and Brixton, the events at the Orgreave coking plant or the activities of the pickets outside pits could say that a Bill of this nature is not necessary. Home Office Ministers have my full and unreserved support in bringing forward a Bill which is necessary to deal with the evils of our time.

I am not surprised that the Labour party, along with the Liberals and the SDP, has come out against the measure. The Labour party has for years failed to tackle the problems of public order. Labour Members constantly harp on the need to keep a balance between freedom of speech, freedom of action and civil liberties. I believe that in all the circumstances the Bill more than adequately preserves that balance.

Standing behind the statements of the right hon. Member for Manchester, Gorton (Mr. Kaufman), the Opposition spokesman, are the Bernie Grants of this world. Mr. Grant today said that the report of the Metropolitan police on the Tottenhan riots was a lot of lies. Such Labour politicians make it their business to criticise the police at every opportunity and to harass chief constables — the case of Mr. Anderton in Greater Manchester is a classic example and we see similar action by Lady Simey in Liverpool.

The Bill tackles the problems of today — the riots outside the pits, the riots in the streets and the riots at football matches. It is not before time that such legislation has been brought before the House. Five new offences are created by the Bill and the law is codified. The offence of riot recognises for the first time the need to include violence towards property. That is important, and I am sure that all the Asian traders who had their shops wrecked in the Handsworth riot will be extremely grateful for that proposal.

My only criticism relates to the sentences for the new offences. I believe that the offence of violent disorder should carry a maximum sentence of seven years' imprisonment rather than five years. The maximum sentence for affray should be five years and not three years, and I should also like to see the maximum sentence for disorderly behaviour increased.

The offences have been created to meet the problems of today: riot to deal with the problems faced at Tottenham, Handsworth and Brixton; violent disorder to meet the problems of disturbances at static demonstrations and outside industrial plants; and affray to deal with the problems that the police face every Saturday night in tackling fights outside public houses and general disruption by those who have consumed too much alcohol.

Despite the criticisms made about the new offence of disorderly behaviour, I welcome it. It deals with a problem with which the law has previously not been capable of dealing. Those of us who represent constituencies with large housing estates and shopping centres know the problems faced by some of our law-abiding constituents who are intimidated by gangs of youths who do not actually do anything, but who frighten people and disrupt their daily lives. The new offence is the tool which the police need to deal with that problem.

I speak from experience. I opened the newspaper one morning to find that a riot had allegedly taken place at Skelmersdale in my constituency. When I investigated the matter, I discovered that the report had no foundation. A couple of windows had been broken and a small fire had been started in a health centre, but it never amounted to anything. People who are frightened by gangs of youths on shopping parades and housing estates will welcome the new offences and realise that, far from changing the fabric of society or diminishing civil liberties, they will be a useful adjunct to the powers that the police need to keep public order.

As a lawyer, I welcome the sensible alternatives included in clause 7(3). A jury in the Crown court will be asked whether it is satisfied that the offence of riot has been proved. If it is not, it may reach an alternative verdict on the second offence in the tier, violent disorder. Where the charge is one of violent disorder, a jury can reach an alternative verdict on affray. That is a sensible, modern solution to a difficult problem.

I congratulate my hon. Friend the Minister on including in the Bill the summary offence of disorderly conduct. If a jury is satisfied that someone's behaviour has been in breach of the law, but does not meet the standards laid down for other offences, it can still find that person guilty of the summary offence—something that is usually not open to a jury. That is a means of dealing with the reprehensible behaviour that brought the person before the court. I am sure that that sensible move will be appreciated by lawyers and juries throughout the country.

With the repealing of the common law offences in clause 9, we see the end of an era. Part I brings public order offences into the 1980s. We should welcome that rather than vote against it. Conservative Members recognise that that deals with the problems of today.

[Mr. Kenneth Hind]

Yesterday's answers will not solve our problems. The public will realise that it provides a substantial answer to our difficulties.

The right hon. Member for Gorton levelled a great deal of criticism at the provisions in part II relating to processions and demonstrations. I believe that it is not unreasonable to ask the organiser of a well-prepared demonstration, whether static or otherwise, to notify, and make the necessary application to the police six days before the proposed date of a demonstration, especially as any demonstration is likely to disrupt the life of a community, particularly if it is to be held in London. Surely the public are entitled both to know and to have some say about the proposed route so that serious public order can be avoided, together with damage to property and disruption of life. Part II of the Bill is intended to deal with that.

Those who wish to organise a proper demonstration have nothing to fear from those provisions. If they have nothing to hide and do not wish to disrupt the life of a community or to incite violence, they surely cannot fear going through the proper procedures and applying to the police for permission to hold their demonstrations. Contrary to what has been said about the necessity for checks to be imposed upon the new police power, if an organiser is not satisfied with the restrictions imposed upon a demonstration, he can apply to the Queen's Bench division of the High Court for a judicial review. That will develop a body of authority and precedent to guide judges. The organiser can also call upon the existing body or authority that has guided chief constables exercising a similar power under the Public Order Act 1936.

My only criticism is that where a chief constable or local authority applies under clause 13 for a three-month order banning a certain sort of demonstration, the Bill should include the right to apply to a court for a review of the refusal. My hon. Friend the Minister can consider two or three alternatives — first, through the Crown court with circuit judges or magistrates; secondly, the High Court's judical review procedure; and, thirdly, the possibility of applying to the county court.

In view of the comments of Bernie Grant in Hackney, and my awareness, as a Member of Parliament representing an area on the edge of Liverpool, of the outpourings of Mr. Derek Hatton, who says the most peculiar things, we cannot rely on the judgment of some lunatics to decide whether demonstrations should be allowed. There must be a neutral procedure, with the law applied on a neutral basis, to cover refusals or conditions imposed on any demonstration.

I welcome the introduction of the provisions in part III to tighten the law to deal with the mean and despicable offence of racial hatred. I hope that my right hon. Friend will reconsider the sentences for that offence because I believe that they should be tougher.

Part IV deals with football hooliganism, and is probably the most important part of the Bill. It recognises that unless we do something as a community, our national game will be ruined. Incidents such as those last year at Millwall and Brussels must be tackled. Far from the provisions being a breach of civil liberty, they take the sensible course and will keep hooligans away from football matches so that they can no longer ruin the country's reputation and make the life of the communities around football grounds intolerable. The punishment must fit the crime, so it is sensible to exclude the hooligans from football matches. By driving them away from the game, we stop them from offending the public and from bringing the national game into disrepute.

Despite the criticism levelled against part IV, I believe that its provisions are the only way to deal with hooliganism at football matches. We want football once again to be a game of which we can be proud and which will bring credit to our country.

The Bill is a realistic way to bring public order law into the 1980s. I congratulate my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State and his Ministers on producing a Bill that is realistic and relevant to this period in our history. I am sure that the public will recognise that the Bill is needed and that they will support it when it becomes law.

Mr. D. E. Thomas (Meirionnydd Nant Conwy): I do not intend to respond to the rhetoric of the hon. Member for Lancashire, West (Mr. Hind), other than to speculate that some of his remarks may have brought him within the scope of clause 5 of the Bill.

This is not a public order Bill; it is about extending the control of the state over public disorder. Much of that disorder is created either directly or indirectly by the activities of the state. What must concern us in this Bill, or in any public order legislation, is the way in which both the central and local states define their responsibilities for maintaining order within society. That takes us to the central issue of the role of the state in civil society.

In their rhetoric, this Government more than any other have addressed themselves to the role of the state. Even before the Government were returned in 1979, we had long speeches about the dismantling of the strong state—the paternalistic state—and allowing people to be free from state control, state welfarism and state paternalism or maternalism. Since 1979 we have learnt that the withdrawal of the state from large areas of life and the pursuit of economic policies which mean that large sections of the population become marginalised result in disorder. The free economy advocated so strongly by the Government is followed by the creation of a strong state to maintain that free economy, as Stuart Hall has reminded us on several occasions. Therefore, we cannot separate order in civil society from social and economic disorder within the boundaries of the state or, indeed, from international disorder, which often leads to manifestations —I find the continental word better than "demonstrations"—by people against international disorder.

Therefore, we must ask whether we want to see the state assuming a more authoritarian, coercive role such as that set out by the hon. Member for Lancashire, West and other Conservative Members, or whether we believe it is possible to maintain order by the pursuit of a range of economic, social and legal policies that can result in the communities, classes and minorities within the state being able to relate to the state and not being coerced to do so. That is the central issue that most Conservative Members have been trying to avoid in the debate.

I go further than that and stress that often there is a tendency in such discussions for Conservative Members to view society in a very simplistic, indeed myopic, way. They tend to think of society as out there to be controlled by Government through their law and order policies. They do not recognise the essential interaction between the state and civil society at all levels of society and the operation of the state. Nor do they recognise that extra-parliamentary democracy or direct democracy is as much part of our lives as the politics of representational democracy that we see here in Parliament. Therefore, when we start the process of enacting legislation, as we are doing tonight, which affects the rights of individuals or groups to express their grievances, we must realise that that legislation has an important effect upon the whole of our democratic process. We must recognise that the form of legislation with which we are dealing arises directly out of the Government's failure in other areas of their policies.

It should not be seen as surprising that the groups that have been most directly affected by the economic crisis that the Government's policies have generated are those who behave in a deviant way. The Bill deals with such people — young people whose opportunities have decreased, black communities whose employment and housing prospects have declined and who find that conditions in the inner cities have deteriorated substantially, the long-term unemployed and the unemployed in general, and in particular those who live in regions that have been hard hit by the Government's policies. In 1979-80, in paragraph 28 of its report on employment opportunities, the Select Committee on Welsh Affairs stressed that there would be "serious social disorder if there were to be very high and chronic levels of unemployment, particularly amongst the young."

That form of disorder was exhibited during the dispute in the mining industry and in other areas. Industrial disputes are not created by pickets; they are created by the breakdown of industrial relations, and that breakdown is created by the pursuit of different objectives by the employees and employers. We must recognise that that is so in any serious consideration of social policy.

Therefore, the Bill must be seen as part of the political programme of the new Right, which, so far, is still in the ascendancy in the Government, although today's events may have an effect on that. It is part of the new Right's policy to roll back the state in every area of life except coercion and control. Members of the new Right believe in regulating the actions of those of us who go against the Government's line of policy, by increasing surveillance and control, and increasing the number of offences against public order.

One of the things that concerns me very much is the way in which, in such debates, all forms of dissent and deviant behaviour are lumped together. The Home Secretary did it again this afternoon when he seemed to link those who dissent from or demonstrate against Government policy with all other forms of criminal behaviour. Dissenters and demonstrators are lumped together as deviants and potential delinquents. There is a wrapping up of demonstrations and manifestations of public concern — which is what demonstrations are — with other forms of criminal activity. That has been done in the reports of chief police officers and many press statements by the so-called law and order lobby.

In the community where I come from, processions and assemblies are a regular part of our life. Under the Bill, a procession or assembly is potentially a serious disruption of the life of the community, but in the Wales and inner city areas that I know it would be strange if manifestations did not take place. Resistance is often part of the life of the community, because the community is often threatened by the policies of economic and social disorder. I appreciate that some Conservative Members cannot take that. They should understand that in representing that point of view I am speaking for the community that I come from.

Mr. Hind: Does the hon. Gentleman agree that under the Bill the processions to which he refers will have no problem, but the National Front march that is likely to disrupt a predominantly black community will be banned and dealt with suitably? Therefore, can he not see the purpose towards which that part of the Bill is directed?

Mr. Thomas: All of us who oppose the Bill have been arguing that powers already exist to control such potential disorder. We do not require this form of public order legislation to do so.

It concerns me that the definition and control of different forms of manifestations will be a matter for the police. I refer to clauses 11 and 14. For example, clause 14(2) says:

"The senior police officer may give directions imposing on the persons organising or taking part in the assembly any conditions which prescribe the place at which the assembly may be . . . held, its maximum duration, or the maximum number of persons who may constitute it".

When I asked the Home Secretary about that issue during his speech, he denied that it was a major qualitative change in the right of assembly. Surely, if the right of assembly is to be demarcated entirely by the police officers at the assembly, that is a major change. We know what is likely to happen with the Police and Criminal Evidence Act. We remember that the code of practice issued under the Employment Act 1980 referred to a recommended number of six people on a picket line, and it was for the police to decide, taking into account all the circumstances, whether the number of pickets at any particular place was likely to lead to a breach of the peace. The experience in the mining industry dispute in South Wales was that the police took that figure as the maximum and quoted the civil law as though it had criminal authority. The same will undoubtedly apply to the discretion on numbers, time, place and route. Those matters will be left exclusively in the hands of the police. If there is to be advance reporting of demonstrations, we need to look again at the possibility of it being on the basis of what happened in Scotland. It ought not to be on the basis that is provided for in the Bill. The police will become the arbiter of the right of people to manifest their views. This represents a serious change in liberty of assembly and police powers.

Other aspects of civil disorder are not covered by the Bill. It contains no provision to cover the kind of deplorable incident that took place this weekend in Carmarthen. On Sunday I visited Sue Pitman in hospital. She was injured by an employee of the private army, if I may so call it, or private security firm that is being used by Carmarthen district council to protect its public property against non-violent demonstrations — which may involve trespass—against the council's decision to implement the Home Office's policy on civil defence.

I am glad that the Minister of State, the hon. Member for Pudsey (Mr. Shaw), is on the Treasury Bench, as he is the Minister who is in charge of this policy. His colleague and friend, Mr. Eric Alley, has been visiting Welsh local authorities trying to get them into line with the Government's policy on civil defence. Carmarthen district council stands against the nuclear-free policy of Dyfed. The result is that there have been manifestations of feeling in the locality. On Saturday that manifestation resulted in serious injury to a non-violent person, Sue Pitman. I have known her for many years as a member of the peace movement. She would have shown no violence at all in her conduct at that demonstration. The police should have been there to maintain order and to protect the lives of people who were involved in a non-violent demonstration. If we are serious about public order, we need to be serious about the use of private security firms to protect property, as happened in Carmarthen.

The Bill does not represent a serious attempt to face up to the nature and causes of disorder in our society. It is part of the rhetorical flourish of this Government in defence of their economic and social policies. There is no need for the Opposition to predict what the result of that policy will be. It will create further disorder. The state will then seek further powers of repression. The spiral of repression will be increased. The victims will be those who are least able to bear the brunt of the Government's economic policies and the civil liberties which supposedly were part of the British liberal tradition when that tradition was still alive.

Mr. Robert Key (Salisbury): This Bill is essentially about the right to go about one's lawful business, and about the legal right of enjoyment. We have heard much about the desire for peaceful streets, which I completely endorse. It may be true that 80 per cent. of the population live in towns, but 80 per cent. of the land area of this country provides the working and living environment for the rest of us. Change must be steadily and carefully considered, as I believe that it has been in the preparation of the Bill. My right hon. Friend the Home Secretary said earlier this afternoon that there has been no shortage of legal powers but that there has been a shortage of enforcement powers. Therefore, the common law has been revised and codified.

Hon. Members have said that people are frightened to open their front doors. Reference has also been made to the problems caused by alarm, harassment and distress. One of the Bill's purposes is to prevent the disruption of the life of the community. The hon. Member for Meirionnydd Nant Conwy (Mr. Thomas) referred to the problems that he believes face the peace movement. As a direct result of the activities of the Campaign for Nuclear Disarmament and Cruise Watch in my constituency there has been a massive closure of traditional rights of way across Salisbury plain. Local inhabitants have thus been deprived of the age-old and traditional rights which they have enjoyed, despite the fact that Salisbury plain is an important military training area. Only the intervention of these outsiders has caused that deprivation.

The hon. Member for Caithness and Sutherland (Mr. Maclennan) believes that the Bill's proposals are unjustified. His constituency is almost as beautiful as mine, but that beauty and tranquillity is not so threatened as it is in my constituency.

There are a number of areas of threatening action. I regret very much that the first comes from animal liberation and animal rights groups. I welcome the establishment of police unit co-ordination to pool information on dangerous and misguided acts. That is of direct relevance to the Bill. Militant animal welfarists, and others, increasingly trespass en masse on to farms, intending to cause injury to the occupiers and damage to the property. No effective remedy is available to the farmer unless he can identify which person in the group caused the injury or the damage, despite the fact that all those present deliberately entered his land and property.

The difficulty under the present law lies in being able to identify the offenders. Often they come to farms under the cover of darkness or they threaten a farmer and his family. This happened recently in my constituency. It causes farmers to fear for their safety. Clause 4 will therefore replace section 5 of the Public Order Act 1936, as amended. It will make it an offence to use threatening, abusive, or insulting words or behaviour in a private as well as a public place. This will be only of limited help. Similarly the new controls that will be available to the police concerning the imposition of conditions relating to demonstrations will be of assistance only in those very rare cases where a warning is given beforehand of the intention to hold a demonstration, such as an animal rights demonstration.

The Bill will have an immediate impact upon mass poaching and illegal hare coursing in rural areas. I have received a large number of representations about this from farmers and their families and from members of the public. Recently I received a letter from a farmer who pointed out that in general he tries to encourage the public to walk the footpaths, both public and private, on his farm, in the hope that while they enjoy their walk they will discourage the small percentage of unwelcome visitors from visiting their property. However, the problem with the mass poachers and the illegal hare coursers is that they frighten innocent people away to such an extent that a kind of no-go area is being created in parts of southern rural England. This is serious because of its economic implications for farmers. Farmers complain to me about the number of ewes that are becoming barren because of persistent dog worrying. Furthermore, a great deal of damage has been done to beef cattle because they have been chased by dogs. One farmer wrote to me and suggested that many of these people have no respect for people, property or livestock. He pointed out that farmers have had to mount special patrols to keep an eye on their livestock.

Mr. Douglas Hogg: This is a most interesting point, but I am not at all clear what part of the Bill is likely to meet the problem that my hon. Friend is describing.

Mr. Key: If my hon. Friend will have the patience that we showed when we listened to his earlier interventions, he will find out.

The farmer was concerned because three types of sporting activity were involved: the desire to blood lurchers on hares ready for deer coursing, placing large bets on the ability of individual dogs to catch hares, and the blooding of dogs for the track. I have pursued, as far as I can, all of these cases. My inquiries led me to the National Greyhound Racing Club. Its response was that there was nothing in my complaints which gave rise to evidence that these people came from greyhound racing, but that they may be connected with the sport of coursing which uses greyhounds to chase live hares. On the advice of the National Greyhound Racing Club I took up the matter with the National Coursing Club on 6 December, but I regret to say that I have not heard from them.

The reason why this is all important and of relevance to the Bill is that the police are worried about their inability, because of the state of the present law, to cope with this problem. The chief constable of Wiltshire is reported in the Western Gazette on 10 January as saying that already there are reports of people being injured by trespassers. He suspects that it will not be long before somebody says that people have been killed by trespassers. I shall write to my hon. Friend about that and I hope that he will undertake to look into the problem of illegal coursing and mass poaching as a matter of urgency.

Another area of particular relevance to south Wiltshire is the Stonehenge festival. This is not a sudden matter. The Bill has been carefully prepared and is not a rushed or panic response. On 10 November 1983 I initiated an Adjournment debate on travelling people and the build up of the Stonehenge festival which has taken place over some 10 years. I am glad to say that that debate was replied to by my right hon. Friend the Home Secretary in his previous incarnation in the Home Office. I said:

"The law is a living thing and must surely change to meet the changing needs of society . . . Above all, the rule of law must be seen to apply to all the people all the time. If the Government fail to act now, we will see an unwelcome increase in the trail of disorder and unhappiness spreading across the country from Haverfordwest and Brecon through Glastonbury to Stonehenge, Greenham Common, Norwich and Leicester, to Cambridgeshire, Sussex and Kent." — [Official Report, 10 November 1983; Vol. 48, c. 514.]

The Bill is a response which has been developing over many years and I welcome it.

In the community which faces these problems in rural Wiltshire there is much debate. In a recent editorial in the Salisbury Journal under the heading "Muddle at the Stones" the editor wrote:

"the Stonehenge festival story will complete its transformation from a crowd of scruffy dope smokers making a nuisance of themselves in a Wiltshire field to a major civil rights issue."

He said that the way of avoiding that was to allow the National Trust and English Heritage to have a controlled festival on the old site and that that required the swallowing of pride and the recognition that thousands of young people want there to be a festival. He said:

"It does not mean that they would be caving in to anarchy but it would be a way of reducing the influence of the Convoy."

That is all very well, but it shows the crucial misunderstanding of the problem of public order—that we can live in a peaceful society only when there is consent to do so on all sides. Unfortunately, in the case of Stonehenge there has been a lack of good will on at least one of the sides for many years.

In a report in The Times on 4 January 1986 the environment correspondent said:

"one of the co-ordinators of the hippy convoy which annually visits Stonehenge for the summer solstice festival gave a warning of 'a month of aggravation in June'."

The convoy co-ordinator went on to say that

"the festival would definitely go ahead in June on a larger scale than last year. There would also be a similar, smaller festival at the summer and autumn equinoxes and at the winter solstice. 'They will have four headaches instead of one'."

I must make it clear that every effort has been made to find a solution to the problem which will not involve the use of police or indeed the use of the law. Consultations on management versus confrontation were at an advanced stage two years ago. I visited California to learn about the American techniques of policing pop festivals which involved management, not confrontation. But it comes back to the fact that there is no reason why a considerable group of people should meet outside the law. The rule of law in our democratic society must surely be paramount. Many attempts have been made over the years to establish an organised festival. Indeed, that has openly been said to be unworkable and unwelcome by the festival goers who are self-confessed anarchists and fellow travellers.

I am sorry that the hon. Member for Holborn and St. Pancras (Mr. Dobson), who I fought in the 1979 election, is not here. I had meant to tell him that I intended to mention that he told me that when he was leader of Camden council in the 1970s and dealing with the squatter problem in Camden it was with the same personnel who are now involved in this public disorder.

The problem of a controlled festival is that the peace convoy people have said clearly to me that even if there were a controlled and organised festival they would not attend it but still seek to have their own unlawful festival.

I know that the hon. Member for Hammersmith (Mr. Soley) has been deeply concerned in the issue, and last June we had several talks about it. Ever since we first served together in Committee we have enjoyed friendly relations, but we fell out over this issue because he did not perceive the problem at the time that people were not willing to co-operate.

Mr. Clive Soley (Hammersmith): The hon. Gentleman is giving a one-sided view. It was he who changed sides. Initially, he was prepared to say that there were many people on the other side, as he has now defined it, who were willing to co-operate and make arrangements. English Heritage under Lord Montagu are not exactly innocent in all this. In fact, there are many sides to the argument. If there were not so many sides God would not have invented lawyers.

Mr. Key: That precisely illustrates the problem. Up to last year English Heritage and the National Trust were prepared to see that festival happen. Therefore, it was the duty of all those who had any influence to try to make it happen with the minimum of disruption and law breaking. That was what we were trying to do. The only people who can do anything about lawlessness and trespassing are the landowners and the police. The Government do not have a direct role. It is the landowners who decide whether they wish to go to the High court and the police who have to enforce the injunctions. There was no question of my changing sides; it was a question of the ground shifting underneath us. That was the problem as I perceived it.

Mr. Soley: The hon. Gentleman must acknowledge that many members of the Conservative party in Salisbury wrote to me to complain about what was happening, the style of policing and what happened on that day. He knows that because he has seen the letters.

Mr. Key: No, I have not seen those letters. I would be grateful if the hon. Gentleman would show them to me. That is the first that I have heard of them.

The Bill will not deal with the problem of festivals. The offence of trespass is particularly difficult to cope with and the Bill tries to address some of the problems surrounding it.

I want to take to task the hon. Member for Islington, South and Finsbury (Mr. Smith) who said that the Country Landowners Association had produced unacceptable proposals. The CLA has made representations on the Bill to the Government and it has consulted widely with various organisations, including rambling, mountaineering and other similar bodies. Unfortunately, those bodies have been in opposition because they have mistakenly seen the proposals as an attempt to exclude members of the public from the lawful use and enjoyment of rural land. That is not the case. The CLA is not trying to prevent or discourage people from the lawful use of the land, and nor does its proposals relate to accidental trespass. In fact, the latest position is that the Association of County Councils, English Heritage and the CLA have produced a common position and they hope that they will be able to influence the Government to include a new clause so that an assembly, in the words of the agreed statement, of three or more persons, but, in the specific request of the CLA, six persons,

"on any land which is wholly or partly open to the air, (not being a public place) shall be deemed to be a public assembly for the purposes of this Part if the assembly of those persons is without the consent of the person entitled to occupation of that land".

I do not believe that, on either side of the House, Members are against pop festivals or agaist the use of rural land by the majority of people. After all, some 75 pop festivals were held in the countryside last year, and 39 in London. The vast majority of them caused little trouble. History teaches us the folly of forcing opposition underground. We alienate young people at our peril. They have so much to offer and they are the future. However, that does not absolve us from upholding our responsibilities to the rule of law, which has evolved over more than 1,000 years.

Until there is reciprocal goodwill on both sides—I hope that goodwill will prevail—English Heritage and the National Trust will be obliged to seek the protection of the law, and the police will be obliged to enforce it. Therefore, Parliament must ensure that the law-abiding are properly protected and that law, which is a living thing, is properly updated and continues to guarantee the rule of law under which the majority of our people will wish to live and which protects their rights. I support the Bill.

Mr. Alex Carlile (Montgomery): As we debate the Bill we see on the face of the nation two particular expressions of which we should take special note. The first is the expression of disorder, which we see demonstrated by the rising level of crime. The second is that of frustration which we see in the rising level of protest against Government and the authority. In those two expressions we see a challenge of which we should take note. It is a challenge to reconcile certain freedoms, which all hon. Members should regard as important.

First and foremost, the public would rightly say that we must ensure the freedom to be able to walk our streets in peace and enjoy our homes in quietness. Secondly, the public would agree, rather more readily than many Conservative Members sometimes think, that we must struggle to maintain the freedom of members of the public, individually and in groups, from arbitrariness and injustice, whether imposed by the Government, the police, local authorities or any other form of authority.

The public hold dear, as a matter of tradition and expectation, the freedom to make peaceful and orderly protest against Government and public authority. They rightly hold dear their freedom not to be intimidated and not to be disturbed gratuitously by those who step far over the mark of acceptable public order.

It is beyond any doubt that the old common law public order offences need to be revised, codified and put in order. However, there will need to be a great deal of improvement to this Bill before it can be said to achieve that end and before it can be said to achieve the balance between an acceptable level of authority and authoritarianism. Whereas the latter is never acceptable, I hope that all of us agree that an acceptable level of authority is necessary.

I turn now to what I regard as the most important part of the Bill, at least from the practical everyday point of view of the administration of justice. I refer to part I, which deals with such offences as that of riot. There is no doubt that the old common law offences were very much in need of rationalisation and reform. However, the Bill is a prolongation of the reliance of the police and the courts upon unspecified and, really, inchoate offences. Those of us who have practised in the criminal courts of England and Wales know full well that juries are often extremely reluctant to convict of such offences. They are particularly unprepared to convict of these offences where such specific charges as assault, wounding or criminal damage would have been available. They are also influenced by the penalties that they know are available—penalties are much better known to the general public than they used to be—if the defendant is found guilty.

It is counterproductive and much more than unhelpful to impose draconian maximum penalties which may well be out of proportion to the conduct complained of. One of my major misgivings about clause 1, which creates the offence of riot, is that there are forms of conduct which, if not trivial, might be regarded on a balanced view as relatively minor, and which nevertheless could attract in theory the maximum penalty of life imprisonment. No sensible judge will impose a life sentence for such conduct, but a jury does not know that when it is trying a case. For one reason or another the jury may think that because the judge's summing up is a little pro-prosecution, as it occasionally is, he will pass a tough sentence if the jury records a conviction. The approach shown in clause 1, particularly in the provision of a maximum life sentence, will create precisely that type of practical problem. Do we really want a maximum life sentence for an inchoate, unspecific offence?

There is a real danger that a person using minimal violence, for example a push or a nudge, will, under the terms of clause 1, be liable to a maximum sentence of life imprisonment. The definition of violence contained in clause 8 is circuitous, and of the sort that causes immense humour in the lecture room of first or second-year at law school, but does little to specify the type of violence that should be subject to criminal sanction and condign punishment.

Under clause 1, in certain circumstances a dozen lively students throwing tomatoes at an Education Minister visiting their student union just after a grant cut could be guilty of riot, and subject to a maximum of life imprisonment. A dozen mothers pushing or shoving at the chairman of an education committee outside a nursery school which is facing cuts could be liable to the maximum sentence of life imprisonment. Those would be ludicrous consequences.

The most effective demonstration that I ever saw consisted of a large number of mothers with their prams and pushchairs walking backwards and forwards across the A41 trunk road between Chester and Birkenhead because the previous day a child had had an accident there. They wanted a pedestrian crossing, and their demands had been ignored for years. If they were pushing their prams into a policeman of reasonable firmness who was afraid for his safety, they could be guilty of the offence of riot under clause 1.

The Government have the measure of the offence wrong. A life sentence should be available only for the most terrible crimes, but that is not what is provided for in the Bill. In a lesser way, violent disorder and affray, which are equally inchoate offences, give rise to the same problems, as each provides for a severe maximum sentence for the crime concerned.

Regarding the offence of disorderly conduct in clause 5, I do not propose to rehearse what my hon. Friend the Member for Caithness and Sutherland (Mr. Maclennan) read to the House from the White Paper. The Government have turned the White Paper's arguments on their head. I do not understand why, despite the careful efforts of the Home Secretary to explain. It is important for our busy and sometimes oppressed police force, and for the public, that we should keep out of the criminal calendar conduct which does not deserve a criminal sanction in a reasonable and reasonably robust society. I hope that we believe that we should be living in a reasonable and reasonably robust society. If so, we should recognise that clause 5 seeks to apply criminal sanctions to what should not be criminal offences.

I am concerned at the broad application of clause 5 to dwellings. It does not apply if both parties concerned are in a dwelling; but it applies, for example, to an argument over the garden fence between two neighbours who disagree about who should pick the apples from an encroaching apple tree. Surely that should not come within the scope of criminal law.

One of the key problems of public order is that the rights of peaceful protest and assembly, which, together with freedom of speech, form the basis of the right of political dissent, exist under current law only in the negative sense. There is, for example, no defined legal right to demonstrate or to attend a meeting, yet those freedoms are a crucial part of the relationship between the Government and the people. I believe that we shall never create a satisfactory law to deal with processions and assemblies until we state those rights in positive form in a Bill of Rights or something similar.

When faced with the one option offered to us — provisions of the present statutory type — we must ensure that the measure does not go further than is reasonable. Seven days' notice is too long. It is rightly said that spontaneity is sometimes the essence of a demonstration which is in the public interest. The right to apply for judicial review is an inadequate protection against an incorrect and unfair decision by the police because an application for judicial review under order 53 of the rules of the Supreme Court does not generally come before the court during the period in which one would want to have the meeting or procession. I join those hon. Members who have called for a right to apply to the county court judge in the local summary civil court for a review of the merits of the decision to prohibit a meeting or impose conditions. Certainly, a summary procedure is required to enable a review on the merits of a meeting to take place.

I shall make some final and brief points in an effort to let at least one Conservative hon. and learned Member participate. I welcome the provisions in part III, which deals with racial matters and harassment. Religious groups have not been included. Some of the worst oppression and harassment this century in Britain and the world has been against various religious groups. I ask the Home Secretary to consider whether, by a simple drafting amendment, religious groups can be included in part III.

I turn now to football exclusion orders. If it were possible to have a practicable system of membership cards, football ground exclusion orders would work well, but without them the system would be absolute nonsense. That type of law brings the law itself into disrepute because it is unenforceable. It may do a great deal for the false beard and moustache industry, but it will not do anything to protect us as it was intended to do. The sanction is imposed at the wrong time. Those who have been excluded but break the exclusion order and go to a football match will probably — this is human nature — behave well when they go to a match in breach of the exclusion order. Thus they may in fact be sentenced to imprisonment after going to a football ground and behaving well. The emphasis should be upon the court which deals with them for the original offence passing a sentence sufficiently severe to ensure that they do not do it again. I hope that when the Bill comes back to the House we shall see that this part has been radically altered if not removed from the Bill altogether.

Mr. Nicholas Lyell (Mid-Bedfordshire): I am pleased to have a brief opportunity to welcome a Bill to modernise the law on public order. When it has been through a constructive Standing Committee, it will be a worthy successor to six years of useful law reform under this Government.

I am confident that the Bill passes the test which requires a balanced legal framework in which the police have the powers necessary to prevent and deal with public order, while freedom of speech and the liberty to protest continue to be safeguarded.

I wish to make two brief points. The first relates to marches and demonstrations. It is 50 years since the Public Order Act 1936 was passed, and it is fair to say that London today has become the demonstration capital of the world. On average there has been a major demonstration — one involving more than 100 police in attendance — every week over the past several years. The great majority are peaceful, but not all. If such demonstrations are to go off peacefully, they require careful organisation, not just for the sake of the public, but for the marchers. The Bill's proposals are sensible, because they merely require organisers to do what most reasonable organisers are already doing.

The power to impose conditions on static demonstrations or assemblies is a logical and necessary development in view of the disorders, not just during the miners' strike, but of the past 10 years. One can remember Grunwick and Warrington as well as the miners' strike.

We hear much from the Left about the right to work, but it is wrong that under the cloak of freedom of assembly those who truly wish to go to work should be prevented by threats to life and limb from an organised mob, with the police able only to keep a way open by linking arms and struggling against it, while those who plan and organise it, or who continue to take part, contrary to police directions, should be untouchable.

[Mr. Nicholas Lyell]

Disorderly conduct has attracted a great deal of attention in the press and during the debate. I believe that a skilful formulation has been achieved. The wording that the offender

"has reasonable cause to believe that the use of the words or behaviour is likely to harass, alarm or distress another person" does not merely leave the matter to the police officer's subjective judgment, but causes the court to consider whether the offender knew that what he was doing was thoroughly unreasonable and unpleasant to other people.

It is right that we should seek to protect the elderly and the defenceless against cruel harassment such as occurs in too many flats and housing estates. It is not fair to expect such victims to go to court. Although there may be some risk that the offence could be used unreasonably by some police officers, the answer is not to deprive the community of the necessary protection or the police of the necessary powers. The answer lies, as is increasingly happening, in the good training of young police officers and the inculcation of and insistence upon high standards throughout the force.

I have been lucky enough—or unlucky enough—to be a member of the Standing Committee on almost every major law and order Bill during the past six years. I see the right hon. Member for Manchester, Gorton (Mr. Kaufman), which shows that it will be a pleasure once again if I am lucky enough to be selected for this Standing Committee. No such Bill arrives fully fledged on the statute book. All Home Office draftsmen will probably draft restrictively, on the basis that it is easier to give away than it is to recoup.

This is a well balanced Bill. It helps the maintenance of normal public order, while preserving the principle of peaceful protest. I believe that it will protect and enhance the liberty of our society as a whole. I wish it well and, after a constructive Committee stage, a safe path to the statute book.

Mr. Clive Soley (Hammersmith): It is a pleasure to begin by welcoming my hon. Friend the newly elected Member for Tyne Bridge (Mr. Clelland), who made a well-structured speech. I sat on the Committee that dealt with the abolition of the Greater London council and the metropolitan counties with his predecessor, Mr. Harry Cowans, whom we all greatly miss. Harry made a great contribution to that Bill and I am sure that my hon. Friend the Member for Tyne Bridge will be welcome in Committee, should the Bill receive a Second Reading, to follow through the arguments that he put so well tonight.

Following what my hon. Friend the Member for Tyne Bridge and other hon. Members have said, the Bill must be seen in the context of the disastrous failure of the Government's law and order policy. My right hon. Friend the Member for Manchester, Gorton (Mr. Kaufman) was absolutely right to link that failure to the crime rate. The Government were elected in 1979 and in 1983 on a get-tough policy to deal with crime. They got tough. Britain has more people in prison than any other country, except Turkey. However, the policy has been a disastrous, embarrassing and frightening failure for many people in Britain. The problem is not only one of rising crime. There have been riots of a number, nature and intensity that this country has not seen for more than 100 years—all that from the law and order Government. That is what makes people so angry about Bills such as this, which have nothing to do with the causes of those riots. If the Government were serious, they would do something about the causes.

Some factors would have caused problems for any Government. The first is the move from the inner cities to the country and, to some extent, to the suburban areas. That move reverses the trend of the previous 100 years. What the Government have done that has been so wicked and that has had such a devastating effect is to rip the sticking plaster off the inner-city areas by making devastating cuts in public expenditure.

The Government have created long-term youth unemployment, which, with the ripping apart of the fabric of the social structure of the inner cities, is a deadly combination. What occurs is a rise in what I prefer to call the alternative economy instead of the black economy. It is an alternative to the existing economic system, which has broken down. In that context, people work while drawing social security benefit, they steal and engage in drug dealing, but the crucial factor is the style of policing. The majority of police convictions are obtained through information from the public. As that information dries up, the police must resort to more desperate measures to get evidence to obtain convictions. They do so by stop-and-search techniques, which have been used before, or by breaking into houses and flats, which has happened recently.

The police are not the cause of the problems, but they are frequently the trigger. For that reason, my right hon. Friend the Member for Gorton was right to quote the Police Federation as saying that the police do not want to be seen as "Maggie Thatcher's boot boys". We must do something to take the police out of the front line, but the Bill puts them right back into it.

Under the previous Home Secretary, the Government's response was to make even tougher noises and to try to use the police as a private army. He recommended hanging to his party conference, but was happily got off that hook by his Back Benchers, who persuaded him to vote for hanging for terrorists only. That was the most stupid thing for which to vote.

The present Home Secretary has a more sophisticated approach. He knows what some of the problems are, and he is trying to do an about-turn. There was that bizarre conference at Downing street last week, which involved two or three hours' discussion, with 50 people speaking for three minutes each. That was all they got. Many of the things said there were already known. Indeed, most of them were packaged and were being carried out by Labour-controlled authorities before their finances were cut.

If the Home Secretary believes in what he said at Downing street last week, I challenge him to give a guarantee now that any local authority that funds a crime prevention policy or a victim support scheme will not be rate capped or cut when that is taken into account. Let him give another guarantee that all the crime prevention and victim support schemes that were paid for by the GLC and the metropolitan authorities will be restored in full to all those local authorities. If they are not, they will become meaningless.

The Secretary of State's handout talked about 1·3 million houses needing special measures to help to make them secure from burglars. The cost will be about £500 million. Where will the money come from? Will the local authorities have to pay it? But they will be rate capped, so that is not on. The Home Secretary is in the deadly position of trying to introduce a policy in which he believes, but which the Prime Minister will not allow him to carry out. Unless he takes action similar to that taken by the previous Secretary of State for Defence, I suspect that the Secretary of State will become a meaningless and sad figure trying to deliver a policy which he knows is right but for which money will not be made available.

The Government's law and order policy has failed because of their savage attack on our economic and social structure. More seriously, the Government are now engaged in an equally savage attack on the basic democratic rights of our people.

Mr. Lyell indicated dissent.

Mr. Soley: The hon. and learned Gentleman might shake his head, but he cannot have considered the detail of the Bill. He had better understand it, because ultimately it will affect his people just as much as it affects ours. The people will be angry about the Bill. The Bill says that the police will decide whether a demonstration or assembly should be allowed at certain places or along certain routes, and will determine the numbers, if they believe that disorder, damage, disruption or intimidation is likely. The use of the word "disruption" is most dangerous to democracy. We are talking about comparing the right to go shopping with the right to express one's feelings in a demonstration. We must consider that carefully.

One matter that troubled me greatly was paragraph 4.22 on page 27 of the White Paper, which said:

"The Committee therefore suggested an additional test which would enable the police to impose conditions on a procession in order to prevent serious disruption to the normal life of the community."

The normal life of a democratic community involves the right of assembly and the right to demonstrate. If we remove that, we remove one of the roots of democracy.

Evidence was given to that Select Committee by the Association of Chief Police Officers, which expressed similar views and went on to say that the disruption could be the dislocation of bus services. We do not need demonstrations to do that. The Secretary of State for Transport does it far better than any marcher or demonstrator could. That is usually perfectly lawful, although the Secretary of State for Transport has been before the courts once or twice. Perhaps I should offer my services, as a former probation officer. We can all make one mistake, but two or three in a row suggest a tendency towards recidivism.

The point is that Walter Bagehot is alive and well. The concept of the efficient and decorative parts of the constitution, about which Walter Bagehot warned the country so many years ago, still applies strongly. We can bring all of London to a halt for visiting dignitaries from overseas or for the lord mayor's show, but people dare not go out on the streets to demonstrate their feelings, anxieties or anger about a political, economic or social policy. That is the difference, and that is why I say to the hon. and learned Member for Mid-Bedfordshire (Mr. Lyell) that the Bill is dangerous.

At times, we believe that the only part of democracy that matters is the representative part, when we come here and speak on behalf of the people. That is a vital part, because it gives the medium and long-term expression of people's views, and sometimes the short-term, too, but when people are deeply angry about something they must be able to express their views, whether they relate to a school crossing, as the hon. and learned Member for Montgomery (Mr. Carlile) said, or to much more important affairs of state. The Government are closing a safety valve on democracy. If they go down that road they can make the police impose any conditions, and we might end up like the Poles or the South Africans. The people will reject that absolutely.

Government Members have ignored the fact that all the clauses make it clear that the most senior police officer present at a demonstration or assembly can decide the numbers and the route. That most senior police officer might be only a constable.

Clause 14 outlaws picketing, which can be regarded as a dangerous activity. A police constable, or the most senior police officer present, can limit numbers and move people away from an area. That means that the police can determine how people picket, how many are allowed to picket, and so on. The police should be determining whether an offence has been committed and by their presence deter an offence. That is what the police want to do.

It is interesting to see how the Government's policy has changed. My right hon. and learned Friend the Member for Aberavon (Mr. Morris) drew my attention to the Government's Green Paper on trade union immunities, which flies in the face of the Bill. On secondary picketing, it says:

"to stop everyone from entering a given area would mean creating areas where, if only temporarily, the right of passage along the highway and the right of free speech for the purpose of peacefully communicating and persuading no longer applied. Moreover, whatever the details of the proposal, it would again seem that the services of the police were being enlisted on behalf of the employer."

The Government accepted that. Why do they not accept it now? Why have they gone back on what they said in their Green Paper and their response to it?

The police are being put right in the front line. What will happen when a police officer says "I think there are too many people here and I want some of you to go away"? That is emotive. People feel strongly. Several thousand people might be present, or only several hundred, and a police officer will have to tell some of them to go away. The Home Secretary says that the police can do that already. Perhaps they can, but the Bill gives legal power, backed up by sanctions, which will make the problem worse. That is why the Labour party is making it clear that we expect people to have a special, defined right to demonstrate and assemble.

If we do not have that, we shall end up before the Strasbourg court again. What will happen when people who want to demonstrate are not allowed to do so and they go to Strasbourg? I am becoming fed up, because we have a marvellous reputation under previous Labour, Tory and Liberal Governments for human and democratic rights. Today, Britain is brought before that court more often than any other country in western Europe. What is happening to our reputation under this Government?

Even if one accepts that the conditions are necessary —I am not convinced that they are—the case for the conditions being decided by the police does not exist, not even in the interests of the police. The police should not be dragged into the political arena, and they do not want to be. They do not want to decide whether a demonstration should take place, which route it should take or how many people should be there. Such decisions should be made by an elected authority, if we decide to go along that road, so that those who are prevented from carrying out their democratic rights can complain to elected representatives. Such decisions should not be made by the police.

The hon. Member for Westminster, North (Mr. Wheeler) told us that it was important to put riot in its proper perspective. He told us also that riot was an extremely serious offence. The hon. and learned Member for Montgomery adduced some good arguments on that score. The hon. Member for Westminster, North seems to forget that under the Bill a riot can consist of 12 people threatening to fight one another at a private party. For that, the Government are proposing to introduce a maximum sentence of life imprisonment. The hon. and learned Member for Montgomery is probably right, inasmuch as the courts will not normally impose such a sentence. However, it will jack up — the hon. Member for Westminster, North, being an ex-prison governor, should know this better than anyone else — prison sentences, because for any serious offence of that nature a long sentence will be imposed.

I have a specific question for the Home Secretary to which I hope the Minister of State will respond. In answer to an intervention by the right hon. and learned Member for Warrington, South (Mr. Carlisle), the Home Secretary said that the courts would decide what were prescribed football matches. The Bill does not provide for that. We are told in clauses 29(4) and 31 that the Home Secretary will make the prescriptions. First, I should like to know whether my interpretation is correct. Secondly, will the Home Secretary be prescribing World Cup matches? Will they be included?

Like the 1936 Act, the Bill has been introduced theoretically to deal with racism. We welcome the provisions that deal with racism as far as they go, but they do not go anywhere near far enough. I am left wondering why the consent of the Attorney-General has to be given before a prosecution can be initiated. Racism is not an excuse for taking away the democratic rights of the people. There is a problem of racism in Britain—a desperately serious one—and it is one to which we must address ourselves. At times of economic distress there is a search for scapegoats, and scapegoats are often minority ethnic groups.

If we are to tackle that problem, the Government should initiate and support a campaign against racism. They should not produce a Bill whose overall effect is to undermine democratic rights while pretending that they are dealing with racism, when in fact they are not. My hon. Friend the Member for Leyton (Mr. Cohen) raised an important argument when he said that the Government should do far more to deal with racism.

The Government are attacking basic democratic rights, dragging the police into the political arena and ignoring the very problems that have been the focus for the Bill. Until there is some understanding of the Socialist principle of more equity between the distribution of wealth and power, the riots that have broken out on our streets will continue to distort the fabric of our society. As the social survey trends showed recently, as the rich become richer, the poor become poorer and unemployment increases, we can expect more disorder and more crime.

As long as the Government go down the dangerous road of trying to use the police to cope with the consequences of a disastrously failed social and economic policy, so the problems of the police on the street will become increasingly difficult. As a result, the people will become increasingly frightened about their welfare. The sad feature is that minority groups will be the first to be picked on; they are in the front line when it comes to racism.

This is a bad Bill and it represents a lost opportunity. So many things could have been done to codify properly common law offences. So much could have been done to improve the law in this area generally. The Government have chosen to ignore the problem and to carry out an attack on the democratic rights of the people of this nation in a way that will undermine their rights of assembly and demonstration in a manner that we have not seen this century, and I include in that my comments on the 1936 Act.

The Minister of State, Home Office (Mr. Giles Shaw): May I commence my response to this debate by referring to the elegant and eloquent maiden speech by the hon. Member for Tyne Bridge (Mr. Clelland). I wish to associate with the remarks made by those on this side of the House and say that we do indeed carry a warm respect for his predecessor the late Harry Cowans. Harry Cowans was a much beloved figure here—a man of great charm and character.

The hon. Member for Tyne Bridge spoke well and spoke with experience and as a dedicated representative of that grand part of the world. As leader of the council in Gateshead, his knowledge is that of somebody whose roots are in his constituency. We wish him well and we look forward to his further contributions in our debates in the future.

The hon. Member used the phrase "prevention is better than cure." I suspect that it is in the context of prevention that we seek to discuss the Public Order Bill. Before turning to the personal contributions made, I would like to say that we considered matters in this Bill carefully and over a considerable period, as my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State made clear this afternoon.

We recognise and expect—indeed hon. Members on all sides have stressed this—that these matters deserve the most thorough examination that Parliament can afford. I look forward to the detailed discussions in Committee. We are dealing here with issues which lie at the heart of a free society: with the rights of people to live their lives peacefully and free from violence and intimidation. We believe that we have got the balance right. But it would be wrong for me to pretend to the House that the Bill is perfect. Certainly our minds are not closed to improvements.

Widespread support has been expressed for the changes in the racial discrimination provisions and there has been considerable support for the exclusion orders. However, I notice that there are some problems. The rest of the Bill has received a less generous welcome from Opposition Members. In my view, most of their criticisms fail to address the basic purpose of the Bill, which is to prevent the traditional freedoms of assembly and protest from turning into weapons of intimidation and harassment.

This Government fully uphold the right of everyone to protest, to march, to assemble, to demonstrate and to picket — so long as these activities are carried out peacefully. But we do not believe that these rights are absolute or that they cannot be and have not been abused. Hon. Members must ask themselves whether the right to march is a right to be exercised whenever one chooses, regardless of the effect on the rest of the community; whether the right to picket is a right to intimidate and obstruct those who wish to go to work; whether the right to assemble is a right to prevent others from going about their lawful business. The truth is that none of those rights is unfettered: they are not licences for the activists and the militants to impose their views by force on other people.

There has been reference to the White Paper. It contained considered views and refers to the longstanding origination of this measure. There are certain matters in it which are not to be proceeded with, and I should explain to the House what they are.

First, there was the proposed power to ban a single march. The police felt that if they had power to apply for a ban on a single march—for example, by the Militant Tendency, or CND — it would lay them open to accusations of political bias in an area where they already have to tread very carefully. At present under the Public Order Act 1936 they can apply only for a ban on all marches in an area, or certain classes of march. This ensures an even-handed approach—which I trust will commend itself to the House.

The second matter that we have not pursued is the possibility of enabling a police authority to recover policing costs from demonstration organisers when police conditions are broken. This was a consultative proposal in the White Paper, and the response was overwhelmingly against the idea. It would be difficult to calculate the costs involved. I am sure that hon. Members on both sides of the House agree that it is right not to proceed with that.

The White Paper also considered the possibility of enabling magistrates to bring in alternative verdicts, not simply in regard to public order offences. The majority of those who responded to our invitation to comment on the idea favoured the introduction of alternative verdicts in magistrates' courts and thought that they would be a major innovation. We have concluded, however, that if such action is to be taken it should cover the full range of offences for which alternative verdicts might be available. We have therefore decided against making any such provision in the Bill, as alternative verdicts could have related only to public order offences.

There has been a full and frank exchange of views today. My right hon. and learned Friend the Member for Warrington, South (Mr. Carlisle) made a robust speech and I am grateful for his comments about notice of marches and assemblies. We shall have to bear his comments in mind.

The right hon. Member for Blaenau Gwent (Mr. Foot) mentioned picketing and people's rights. We fully support the right to picket and have no intention of interfering with the right of peaceful picketing. However, there is a difference between peaceful and lawful picketing and picketing which provokes violence and intimidation. Those who suggest that only mass picketing can be effective must be trying to legitimise intimidation and violence.

The right hon. Gentleman also said that there should be a statutory right to demonstrate. The Bill will not affect traditional rights to demonstrate peacefully and lawfully. It is a basic assumption in public order law, as with other law, that people are free to do something unless there is a rule to the contrary. If we provided a right to demonstrate or to march, the presumption that the law gives other rights would be undermined. The right of peaceful assembly is in any case guaranteed by the European Convention on Human Rights.

My hon. Friend the Member for Harlow (Mr. Hayes) mentioned judicial review, as did the hon. and learned Member for Montgomery (Mr. Carlile). I accept that it is not always the speediest form of redress but it has worked speedily. In 1984, there was a ban on a Sikh march in London due to be held on a Sunday. The organiser sought judicial review of the ban from a High Court judge the previous Saturday morning. I believe that there is a good prospect of judicial reviews continuing to provide speedy redress.

My hon. Friend the Member for Westminster, North (Mr. Wheeler) reminded the House of the Bill's long gestation. It goes back to the events of 1981 and the Law Commission. He is right to welcome the powers concerning static demonstrations, which will help to provide information to the police and allow them to impose conditions of duration, location and time. He will recall that that does not include the power to ban.

The hon. Member for Caithness and Sutherland (Mr. Maclennan) sought a new philosophy behind the Bill. The philosophy behind it is the desire to ensure that the rights of the minority to protest are preserved, but that the rights of the majority to live peacefully are also preserved. My hon. Friend the Member for The Wrekin (Mr. Hawksley) said that the public were greatly disquieted by television coverage of recent disorders.

The hon. Member for Islington, South and Finsbury (Mr. Smith) mentioned the problems of sensitive policing and the need to organise such policing in communities and estates. I see that he is nodding assent. If so, he must agree that it is important to establish consultative committees which represent communities fully, to which the police can give their full attention and with which the police can discuss various issues. I hope that such consultative committees will be established throughout London, especially in Labour-controlled boroughs.

My hon. Friend the Member for Lancashire, West (Mr. Hind) made a substantial contribution to our discussions once again. He asked about appeals to the High Court concerning applications for a ban that are refused by the local authority. That is certainly something for the Government to consider, but, at the moment, as the Bill makes clear, we do not intend to do that. That is one of the clauses that ought to be considered carefully in Committee.

My hon. Friend the Member for Salisbury (Mr. Key) raised the question of the protection of monuments in relation to the new offences contained in the Bill. I advise my hon. Friend that the powers to impose conditions on a static demonstration would apply to assemblies in public places in the open air. It would therefore seem that monuments open to the public would come within the ambit of the Bill. I hope that that will give my hon. Friend some encouragement.

The hon. and learned Member for Montgomery again referred to a Bill of Rights. That is not part and parcel of the measure. There are substantial arguments against proceeding along that line in a country that has not had the written constitution that he might prefer. I understand why he seeks to ensure that in the discussions on the Bill he will keep a close eye on the various aspects that affect the liberty of the individual.

The hon. Member for Hammersmith (Mr. Soley) asked me a direct question about exclusion orders. If my right hon. Friend the Home Secretary will allow me to say this, I would admit that a correction should be made to that. The courts will not have discretion to decide the scope of the exclusion order, only its length. Exclusion orders will, of course, ban offenders from all prescribed matches. The hon. Gentleman will recall that the Government's intention is to prescribe football league matches, international matches and other matches involving league clubs. There is no present intention to prescribe football matches abroad. That should correct the impression given by my right hon. Friend.

Last but by no means least, I turn to the contribution of the right hon. Member for Manchester, Gorton (Mr. Kaufman). The right hon. Gentleman was in one of his most expansive moods and he managed to cover a vast amount in the vast amount of time that he took up. It was not one of his more exciting performances and I think that the old Gortonian club will be pretty disappointed and that that ancient brigade, the old Ardwickhamists, will, I am sure, be a little upset at his remarks. His speech did, however, contain two or three nuggets of importance.

The right hon. Gentleman raised an issue in relation to compensation. I advise him that, to the best of my knowledge and belief, clause 10 of the Bill, which refers to that matter, makes only a marginal change to the eligibility for compensation by bringing the test into line with the new definition of riot. In future, claimants will have to show that damage was caused during rioting by a crowd of 12 persons or more, rather than by the present minimum of three. The Government have not studied details of previous claims, but I believe that the majority of claimants who were compensated after the 1981 riots would still be compensated under the provisions of the new Bill. Now no new prosecutions for riot will have to be brought and convictions obtained before compensation is claimed. That is the position.

Mr. Kaufman: That is clearly a very important matter. Is the Minister saying that clause 10 provides that the payment of compensation under the Riot (Damages) Act 1886 or the Merchant Shipping Act 1894 will be available only where people are charged with riot under clause 1?

Mr. Shaw: That would seem to be the case in relation to riot in the conditions outlined in subsection (1). No doubt charges will be made and compensation sought under other clauses, but riot damage compensation is confined to clause 1. If the right hon. Gentleman wishes to pursue the matter further, I shall be delighted to take it up.

The main part of the right hon. Gentleman's speech, and of the speeches of many other hon. Members, involved the new offence of disorderly conduct. The right hon. Gentleman devoted much of his speech to that offence. It appears to be common ground between us that we should seek to deal with anti-social behaviour. We know how much misery can be caused by gangs of youths to many people in our inner cities and elsewhere. There seems to be general agreement that we should look for an offence to cover such behaviour.

Many hon. Members have referred to the experience of their constituents and I take it that there is wide support for the new offence, although I noted that the right hon. Member for Gorton did not give a direct reply when his hon. Friend the Member for Ipswich (Mr. Weetch) asked whether he supported the offence of disorderly conduct. The right hon. Gentleman said that he supported the concept, but not the offence as defined in the Bill.

We ought to find out exactly where the right hon. Gentleman wishes to go. I invite him to table amendments in Committee so that we can see precisely where he stands. I believe that we are agreed on the concept, though we understand the importance of drafting. I am sure that the right hon. Gentleman will wish to make it clear to the House where he stands on disorderly conduct. We can certainly look at the drafting, but we must not resile from the need to describe in the Bill an offence that will bring substantial support and encouragement to many of our constituents.

The Bill has taken a great deal of time to prepare. It had its origins many years ago in the Law Commission report, in the events of 1981, in the discussions about what happened in Southall, in Lord Scarman's report and in the discussions that surrounded events at Grunwick, Warrington, Orgreave and Armthorpe. All Conservative Members, and I trust all Opposition Members, will agree that it was necessary to update public order law and to meet the immense public disquiet and the problems associated with public disorder.

It is clear that hon. Members are motivated by a need to bring more than a semblance of order and peacefulness to various activitities in our country. We are seeking to codify and update the common law offences, to bring them into a new form and to take forward many of the recommendations made, not least, by the Select Committee on Home Affairs. We have also tried to ensure the rights of the minority in relation to peaceful protest, the expression of views and marches and assemblies and to ensure that the rights of the majority are not overruled by a minority.

That is why we are so keen to see that there is a constructive exchange of views between the organisers of marches and the police. That is why we have inserted in the Bill provisions that do not allow the banning of assemblies, but provide for conditions to be applied on the duration, location and numbers involved in assemblies. We are not talking about the removal of statutory rights. We are trying to ensure peaceable arrangements between those who want to protest and those who live in communities. We have established for the first time the need to look at offences against property as well as against persons during riots. We are very clear about our duty — it is to all citizens, wherever they live; it is to everyone, not simply a single group. We must ensure that their environment is not unnecessarily disturbed.

The Public Order Bill is the most important piece of legislation to be brought before this House for decades. It provides the context in which our democracy can live and develop without threat, intimidation, disruption and violence.

Mr. Walter Harrison (Wakefield): I have sat in the Chamber for two hours listening to the debate. I have discovered that a week is a long time in politics, and so too is a minute a long time in politics. I know that the Government are pressing——

Mr. Carol Mather (Comptroller of Her Majesty's Household) rose in his place and claimed to move, That the Question be now put.

Question, That the Question be now put, put and agreed to.

Question put accordingly, That the amendment be made:—

10.27 pm

The Secretary of State for Trade and Industry and President of the Board of Trade (Mr. Leon Brittan): I am most grateful to you, Mr. Speaker, for allowing me to make this statement as I should like to clarify what I said earlier today, and to apologise to the House if what I said gave a misleading impression.

This afternoon in making my statement to the House I was asked whether the Government had received a letter from British Aerospace concerning the meeting which took place between Sir Raymond Lygo and myself on 8 January. I replied that I had not done so. In answer to further questions as to whether any member of the Government had received a letter from Sir Raymond Lygo, I replied that I was not aware of any letter from Sir Raymond Lygo to any one else either. There has since been an announcement by 10 Downing street that a letter was received there which the Prime Minister saw just before coming over to the House. It was not from Sir Raymond Lygo, but from Sir Austin Pearce, the chairman of British Aerospace, and was marked private and strictly confidential. Although I was made aware of the existence of the letter minutes before I left for the House I had not been informed of its contents, nor did I know whether Sir Austin Pearce was prepared for its existence to be made public. In view of the fact that the letter was marked "Private and strictly confidential," it was essential that I took great care in what I said to protect the strict confidentiality attached to it by Sir Austin Pearce, while answering questions accurately.

I understand that since I made my statement, Sir Austin has agreed with the Prime Minister's office that the existence of his letter can be disclosed, although not its contents. I had no intention of misleading the House in this matter, and therefore wished to come to explain this sequence of events immediately. If it is thought that I have in any way misled the House I apologise unreservedly.

Mr. John Smith (Monklands, East): If the Secretary of State had made an unreserved and unqualified apology, we would have been happy to accept it. I remind the right hon. and learned Gentleman of the sequence of events. The right hon. Member for Henley (Mr. Heseltine) asked about a letter. The Secretary of State replied: "I have not received any such letter." That is quite true. There were questions from other hon. Members. At one point, my hon. Friend the Member for Bolsover (Mr. Skinner) asked about a letter from the chairman of British Aerospace, who happens to be Sir Austin Pearce. My hon. Friend finished his question by saying that the Secretary of State "should come clean."

The verbatim reply by the right hon. and learned Gentleman was: "If it helps the hon. Gentleman, I am not aware of any letters from Sir Raymond Lygo to anyone else either."

In case the Secretary of State seeks to draw a distinction between a letter from Sir Raymond Lygo and a letter from Sir Austin Pearce, I remind him that, later in the exchange, my hon. Friend the Member for Newcastle upon Tyne, North (Mr. Brown) asked: "is the Secretary of State aware of any letter received by Her Majesty's Government from British Aerospace?" The matter could hardly be more clearly put. The Secretary of State replied: "As to the first part of the question by the hon. Gentleman, I have already answered that point in reply to the hon. Member for Bolsover."

Any reasonable person would have accepted from that sequence of replies that the Secretary of State did not know of any letter from British Aerospace. He has told us today that he did know that such a letter had been received by the Prime Minister. I think that the Secretary of State should now say—[HON. MEMBERS: "Resign."] Let us see how things develop. He should now say, "I am unreservedly sorry for having misled the House of Commons to the extent that I implied that a letter had not been received when it had been."

On the issue of confidentiality, I say to the Secretary of State that I appreciate that there might be a problem about a letter marked "Private and confidential". He should have said precisely that to the House—that a letter had been received which had been given on a confidential basis and that he could not take that matter further because of questions of commercial or other forms of confidentiality. That would have had the merit of being a truthful answer to the House of Commons.

Throughout the whole of that performance this afternoon, the Prime Minister sat in silence. She had more knowledge than any other hon. Member because she was the recipient of that letter and, no doubt, had read it before she came across to the House of Commons. In that circumstance, why did the Prime Minister not even lean across to the Secretary of State, who was within inches of her throughout the whole of the debate, and correct him if he was at some stage misleading the House? I ask the Prime Minister to apologise to the House tonight or tomorrow for what was said by the Secretary of State.

The House of Commons will not be satisfied that it knows the full truth about this rather confused matter until the terms of that letter are published so that they can be compared with the account of the meeting given by the Secretary of State this afternoon.

Mr. Brittan: At the outset and at the conclusion of what I had to say, I made it clear that if the opinion of the House was that my answers were misleading, I would apologise unreservedly. I should have thought that the right hon. and learned Member for Monklands, East (Mr. Smith) could at least give me credit for that. As it happens, I do not think that the answers that I gave bear the interpretation that he has put upon them. If he thinks that they gave that impression, I am content to apologise and withdraw. On any view, I have unequivocally set the record straight tonight at the earliest opportunity that I could. [Interruption] If the right hon. and learned Gentleman says that he asked me to do so, I can assure him that I had taken the decision to do so before he made that request.

As for saying that the letter was marked "Strictly private and confidential", the right hon. and learned Gentleman should be well aware that in matters of this kind it is the existence of the letter as much as its contents that is strictly private and confidential and that the confidentiality is one imparted by the author of the letter and no one else.

Mr. A. J. Beith (Berwick-upon-Tweed): How can the Secretary of State claim that it was not his intention to mislead the House when he now explains that he gave his answers, as he did, because he did not wish to acknowledge at that stage the existence of a letter whose contents were marked "Strictly private and confidential"? Was it not clearly his intention to conceal from the House the existence of that letter? In pursuance of that letter was he given guidance by the Prime Minister before those exchanges, as he did not appear to be given any during them?

Mr. Brittan: The hon. Gentleman is not on a correct point. I had to tread the narrow path of not breaking the confidentiality of the chairman of British Aerospace and answering the questions accurately. I readily concede that in doing so I answered the questions strictly, but I answered them to the best of my ability. If I failed to answer them in a way that the House considers to be completely satisfactory I have indicated my readiness to apologise. I know that the hon. Gentleman will accept that.

Mr. Peter Viggers (Gosport): May I put it to my right hon. and learned Friend that if the writer of a letter, for his own reasons and in his own interests, chooses to mark that letter "In confidence" it would be a breach of confidence for the letter's existence to be disclosed.

Mr. Brittan: That is the view that I took.

Mr. John Morris (Aberavon): The House of Commons is always generous to anyone who makes a fulsome apology. Does the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry not realise, however, that the way he has apologised tonight shows that he does not know the difference between evasion after evasion, after question after question was put to him; when he told the House that he was speaking only for himself and for no one else; when he said that there was no letter from Sir Raymond Lygo; and when he replied to my hon. Friend the Member for Newcastle upon Tyne, North (Mr. Brown)? In those circumstances, whatever the nature of the original letter, there was an hour of questioning available when his right hon. Friend the Prime Minister could have told him what the position was, and for him to have told the House when he should.

Mr. Brittan: I do not accept the right hon. and learned Gentleman's strictures. I should have thought that what I said to the House is a completely clear account of what occurred, and expresses a readiness to apologise to the House for any misleading impression given. I should have thought that any attempt to extract more than that was motivated more by a concern to extract the maximum from this matter than a concern for the truth.

Sir John Page (Harrow, West): Is my right hon. and learned Friend rather surprised that a private and confidentially marked letter should have had such a wide circulation to my right hon. Friend the Member for Henley (Mr. Heseltine) and apparently a large number of Opposition Members?

Mr. Brittan: I think that I had better not comment on that.

Mr. Roy Jenkins (Glasgow, Hillhead): Is it not the case that, although the behaviour of the Secretary of State has been pathetic, the behaviour of the Prime Minister has been much the more extraordinary? It was clear from halfway through the exchanges this afternoon that the crux of the exchanges was the question of whether there was a letter from British Aerospace. For the Prime Minister to sit there for half an hour and allow the Secretary of State to mislead the House was a most extraordinary procedure. Although what the Secretary of State said may just be within the formal bounds of the truth, the margin is so narrow that we shall count our spoons quickly whenever they are together again.

Mr. Brittan: The right hon. Gentleman was not in the House—[HON. MEMBERS: "Yes, he was."] I did not spot him. If he was there, he was there—[HON. MEMBERS: "Apologise."] I certainly apologise. I did not see him. If the right hon. Gentleman is unable to appreciate any of the consequences of receiving a letter that is marked "Strictly private and confidential", whether that is a matter for me or for my right hon. Friend the Prime Minister, he is quite unaware of the normal obligations that exist in society.

Mr. John Wilkinson (Ruislip-Northwood): Does my right hon. and learned Friend believe that the highly personalised politicking that has been going on will in any way help the workers of Westland, the board of Westland, and those who depend on the future of this industry? Since the Opposition already have a full Supply day on Wednesday to debate this subject, and since my right hon. Friend the Prime Minister is to speak on that occasion, would it not have been more appropriate had the Opposition waited until Wednesday, when my right hon. Friend would have communicated the contents of the letter, had they been material to the shareholders' meeting, which has now been postponed until Friday?

Mr. Brittan: I agree with my hon. Friend that we have moved a long way from Westland.

Mr. Robert C. Brown (Newcastle upon Tyne, North): Is the Secretary of State aware that, as my right hon. and learned Friend the Member for Aberavon (Mr. Morris) so rightly said, an unqualified apology is received very sympathetically by the House. He has exposed himself by making this statement at least as a stranger to the truth. If I can remain in order by describing the conduct of the Secretary of State tonight, he has disgraced himself, but the Prime Minister has disgraced the House of Commons and the country by her silence this afternoon.

Mr. Brittan: I do not think that that commentary calls for any counter-commentary.

Mr. Patrick Cormack (Staffordshire, South): Does my right hon. and learned Friend the Secretary of State accept that this is not a time for semantics or qualification? Does he not feel that his inglorious part in this long and unhappy chapter should come to an end?

Mr. Brittan: I accept neither the description nor the conclusion.

Mr. Dennis Skinner (Bolsover): Does the Secretary of State recall that when I asked the question, I referred to any letters from the chairman of British Aerospace. In his answer, as was recounted by my right hon. and learned Friend the Member for Monklands, East (Mr. Smith), he said that no letter had been received from Sir Raymond Lygo. That was not the question that I asked him. The House will always accept an apology from someone who unwittingly misleads the House, but when a Minister, under close examination, knowing of such a letter, misleads the House, not unwittingly but deliberately in cahoots with the Prime Minister, he has no alternative but to go—and to take the lady with him.

Mr. Brittan: The hon. Gentleman is not correct in his description of what I did because he fails to give any weight whatsoever to the fact that a letter was received marked "Strictly private and confidential", the existence of which I was not at liberty to disclose.

Mr. Cranley Onslow (Woking): Does my right hon. and learned Friend accept that anyone who has listened to what he has said and has heard what has been said against him would accept that—with the exception of those right hon. and hon. Members who want to make mischief—he has given the House a reasonable explanation and an adequate apology?

Mr. Brittan: I am grateful to my hon. Friend.

Mr. Tam Dalyell (Linlithgow): This afternoon I asked whether it would not be more accurate—[Interruption.] to say that if the Secretary of State did not read the letter, the Prime Minister did. Was that not an opportunity for one colleague at least to say to another on the Government Front Bench what the truth was? Why did the Prime Minister not take that opportunity to save a lot of time and trouble for the House and to say quietly and gently what the truth was?

Mr. Brittan: The confidentiality attached to that letter was not something which the Prime Minister had any more right to waive than I. It was a confidentiality imparted by Sir Austin Pearce and it was for him to decide how he wished that letter to be treated.

Several Hon. Members rose——

Mr. Speaker: Order. These matters will be discussed when the issue is debated on Wednesday. Mr. Nicholas Ridley.

Mr. Dave Nellist (Coventry South-East): On a point of order, Mr. Speaker. I accept your ruling about the termination of questions, but is it not in order to point out that a large number of hon. Members who were present this afternoon for the statement asked questions based upon the answers then given by the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry? A few of us would like to find out whether his selective amnesia is permanent or only temporary.

Mr. Speaker: It would be impossible to have a complete re-run of what happened this afternoon—[Interruption.] Order. This is a very narrow statement and we have a full day's debate on the matter on Wednesday.

Several Hon. Members rose——

Mr. Speaker: No.

Seat Belts

10.49 pm

The Parliamentary Under-Secretary of State for Transport (Mr. David Mitchell): I beg to move,

That the continuance in force of the Motor Vehicles (Wearing of Seat Belts) Regulations 1982 (S.I., 1982, No. 1203) be approved.

The purpose of this evening's debate is to enable the House to consider whether it wishes to continue the decision taken by Parliament in 1981 that drivers and front seat passengers in cars and light vans should be required by law to wear their seat belts.

The House will recall that the decision to make belt wearing compulsory was taken only after years of argument——

Dame Jill Knight (Birmingham, Edgbaston): On a point of order, Mr. Speaker. I cannot hear a word that my hon. Friend is saying.

Mr. Speaker: Nor can I. I ask hon. Members to leave the Chamber quietly.

Mr. Mitchell: The purpose of this evening's debate is to enable the House to consider whether it wishes to continue the decision taken by Parliament in 1981 that drivers and front seat passengers in cars and light vans should be required by law to wear their seat belts.

The background, as the House will recall, is that the decision to make belt wearing compulsory was taken only after years of argument, both inside and outside Parliament, over the case for such a measure. As the controversy had raged so fiercely and had continued for so long, Parliament took the view that there should be one further opportunity to consider the entire issue again after an initial period and decide in the light of experience whether compulsory seat belt wearing should continue indefinitely. Hence the provision in the Transport Act 1981 that the regulations, under which compulsion took effect, would lapse automatically after three years unless this House and another place resolve that they remain in force. The three years expire at the end of this month and the time has therefore now come to take a decision. Just in case there is any misunderstanding, let me make it quite clear that the issue is simply whether to make the regulations permanent or allow them to lapse; there is no provision for modifying the regulations or renewing them only for a further limited period. I remind the House also that the law on the restraining of children in cars is not subject to the review procedure. It is not covered by tonight's debate and will continue in any event.

Although we are returning to an issue which has been discussed many times before in this House, there is, of course, one important difference between tonight's proceedings and all the earlier debates. On those occasions we could look at the issue only in terms of what people thought would or would not happen in the event of seat belt wearing becoming law. Tonight we can consider what actually has happened. Instead of merely speculating, we have moved into the business of observing and recording. Rather than relying on endless hypotheses, we have real facts to work on.

To ensure that all the relevant information is available to Parliament, the Government have conducted, as we promised, a comprehensive monitoring programme, designed to study the practical effects of the belt legislation from every possible angle. The results are set out in our report published last October, which I trust all hon. Members will have studied. The report provides a full statistical analysis — carried out by departmental statisticians and the Transport and Road Research Laboratory—of seat belt wearing rates and the effect of seat belt wearing on casualty trends. It also includes detailed studies by hospitals and universities on the consequences of seat belt wearing in terms of the nature and severity of road accident injuries.

As seat belt compulsion continues to arouse strong feelings in many quarters, with particular attention focusing on the interpretation of all the statistical evidence, the Government thought it right that, in addition to our own monitoring exercise, there should be an entirely independent analysis of all the statistics carried out by expert assessors from outside the Government. We are most grateful to Professors Durbin and Harvey of the London School of Economics for undertaking this task. Their report was published as a clearly separated annex to the Department's own report.

What does the evidence tell us? First, it tells us that there has been instant and wholehearted acceptance of the seat belt law on the part of motorists. Up to the end of 1982 the proportion of drivers and front-seat passengers wearing belts never exceeded 40 per cent. Immediately the law came in, the wearing rate rose to around 95 per cent. and has remained consistently at that level, with no sign whatever of any fall off. This is a remarkable achievement, especially when we consider that in no other country with a seat belt law has the overall wearing rate even begun to approach the sort of level that we have here. Our own observations have been confirmed by the police, who report that the law has been almost entirely self-enforcing.

Why should the public adapt so readily to the seat belt law, when their previous attitude was no more than halfhearted? The most likely answer must surely be that the seat belt law came just at the right time to catch the tide of public opinion. The majority of people had, I believe, all but decided for themselves that wearing a seat belt was a sensible thing to do to reduce the risk of death or injury in the event of an accident. All the legislation did was clinch that decision for them. The law was accepted because it equated with what people judged to be in their own interests.

The next question must be whether people's faith in seat belt wearing has been justified in the light of experience. I will say straight out that in our view, the answer has to be an unequivocal yes. This is the opinion, not just of the Department of Transport, but of all those who have been directly involved in research on seat belt wearing. It is a view shared by virtually the entire medical profession, the police and all those working in road safety.

The evidence to support this conclusion is set out for all to see in the Department's report, backed up by the independent assessment of Professors Durbin and Harvey. The most striking facts are surely these: since the seat belt law took effect, there has been a substantial net reduction in road casualties—at the very minimum, an annual saving of 200 deaths and a further saving of 7,000 serious injuries. On a large sample of some 14 hospitals which are generally recognised as representative by the medical profession, there has been a reduction of no less than 25 per cent. in the admission of car accident victims to wards, with a comparable fall in bed occupancy.

The 200 deaths and 7,000 serious injuries prevented are net figures which take account of changes in the number of rear seat passengers and pedestrians involved in accidents. No one making a proper study of the evidence could seriously argue that trends as clear as these are merely a coincidence. They can only be a direct result of the massive increase in the use of seat belts.

Some people, I know, are worried that there is a debit as well as a credit to seat belt wearing. The notion that seat belts encourage drivers to take risks they would not otherwise take has had a lot of attention from the media and from groups concerned with the safety of vulnerable road users, but, despite exhaustive analysis inside and outside the Government, there is no material evidence to support this allegation. The theory has been studied in this country—it has been studied throughout the world—but nowhere has it been in any way substantiated by the facts.

In any case, let me make it quite clear that the annual saving of 200 deaths and 7,000 injuries to which I referred earlier are net figures, arrived at after allowing for every possible relevant factor, including increases in casualties among certain road users. Seat belt wearing has to be seen as an outstanding success in terms of reducing casualties. Experience since the law took effect has confirmed the results of the earlier research conducted here and abroad. Wearing a seat belt substantially reduces the chances of death or serious injury in the event of an accident.

Mr. Gerald Bermingham (St. Helens, South): Will the Minister give way?

Mr. Mitchell: I was hoping to speak briefly, as I know that many hon. Members wish to speak. If there are questions to which I must reply, I shall ask leave of the House to do so.

With the case for seat belt wearing demonstrated so emphatically, the Government's view is that the right course must be to establish the law permanently. Given the evidence that we have, to abandon compulsion at this stage would make no sense from any angle.

There is still, of course, the argument that, however strong the case for wearing a seat belt may be, the decision should remain a matter of individual choice, rather than be enforced by law. I do not lightly dismiss that point of view. This Government are, after all, fully committed to minimising the regulation of people's lives, but I hope that even those for whom this argument had force earlier will be ready to reconsider their view in the light of experience over the past three years. I originally had considerable doubts about the principle of compulsion, but, in the light of the evidence that I have studied, I am persuaded that the law should be allowed to stand.

The House needs no reminder from me of the possible consequences of road accidents for the victim, his family, his friends and colleagues and the community at large. Experience over the past three years has shown that one way of minimising the risk is by the simple act of putting on a seat belt. Ninety five per cent. of drivers and front seat passengers are taking advantage of that facility. I hope that their decision to do so will be endorsed by the House on our first sitting day in European Road Safety Year.

Mr. Stephen Ross (Isle of Wight): I congratulate the hon. Member for Wallasey (Mrs. Chalker) on her new appointment. We shall miss her and we wish her well and thank her for all that she has done for road safety during a long and successful stay at the Department of Transport.

I have supported the compulsory wearing of seat belts on every occasion that the issue has been debated since I was elected in 1974 and nothing that has happened since the Act was introduced three years ago makes me want to change my mind. Indeed, I should welcome an extension of the provision to cover coach drivers and those occupying the front seats of coaches and many commercial vehicles. One of the last acts of the hon. Member for Wallasey at the Department of Transport was to make compulsory the fitting of rear seat belts to new cars, though the compulsory wearing of them is not to be introduced at this stage.

I am worried about some of the statistics provided by cyclists' and pedestrians' associations and by the Friends of the Earth. They show an increase in the number of casualties, though, as the Under-Secretary said, the overall figure is still highly satisfactory.

I an not convinced that the increased number of injuries to cyclists has anything to do with the wearing of seat belts. It is suggested that people are driving with less care and that cyclists and pedestrians are at greater risk. I suspect that the fact that more people are riding bikes means that cyclists are at greater risk anong our increasing traffic problems. We should make better provision for cyclists, rather than change the seat belt law. The increased number of accidents involving pedestrians is worrying and needs to be investigated.

As we said in a recent debate on road safety, too many drivers are going too fast, not only on motorways but on A roads, and often in appalling weather. I do not know why that should be so, but it is a fact and the only way to deal with it is to provide greater police surveillance to catch those who break the law on too many occasions.

Medical opinion, the Royal Society for the Prevention of Accidents, the AA and the RAC urge us to make the seat belt law permanent. I am certain that they are right and I shall vote accordingly, as will most of my colleagues.

11.4 pm

Mr. Ivan Lawrence (Burton): I join the congratulations to my hon. Friend the Member for Wallasey (Mrs. Chalker)—I hope that she will shortly be my right hon. Friend—on her preferment.

It is a great pity that the question whether we should continue to be forced to wear seat belts or become criminals, which is an issue affecting more than 20 million people in Britain—and on which many hon. Members were persuaded to vote originally on the basis that it would be only an experiment and that ample opportunity would be given to us to discuss the issues—should be dealt with in a derisory one and a half hour debate at the end of a busy day.

Furthermore, there was no point in assuring us that we would be given an opportunity to express our view to the Government when no opportunity to amend the motion has been given to us. The motion was tabled so late that we had no opportunity even to table a token amendment. One is always particularly angry when one's own side does not quite play the game.

When listening to my hon. Friend the Minister, one would have thought that the matter was beyond argument. It would have been reassuring if the three-year experiment in seat belt compulsion had proved to have saved lives and serious injuries overall, but, alas, it has done no such thing. Even those of us most concerned about the loss of personal freedom involved in the nanny state forcing us to belt up might be obliged to concede that a saving of 200 or more lives and 7,000 serious injuries per year would be a reasonable enough return for the irritation, incovenience, and even the 7,000 prosecutions a year that the experimental law has produced.

Unfortunately, the claim being made by the Department of Transport has not been proved by the evidence. Yes, of course drivers and front seat passengers no longer go through windscreens with the same frequency—18 per cent. fewer of the former and 25 per cent. fewer of the latter have died from such injuries. Of course, injuries to neck, chest and legs may well be less serious. However, there has been an alarming increase in back seat passenger deaths of 27 per cent., of pedestrian deaths of at least 14 per cent. and of cyclists' deaths of more than 40 per cent. It would be naive to think that there was no connection between that and compulsory seat belts.

If there has been no increase in the number of car crashes since compulsion, how is it that so many more poeple are dying in the back seats of cars? The Department cannot explain that. If there is 3 per cent. less cycling traffic yet an increase of 13 per cent. in fatalities among cyclists over 19 years of age and of 55 per cent. among those over 69 years, it can hardly be BMX bikes causing all the trouble, as some embarrassed defenders of compulsion have claimed. The Department's experts explain those figures as a mystery or a coincidence.

Even if the 200-plus deaths and 7,000 serious injury figures were beyond doubt, if all that has happened is that instead of drivers and front seat passengers being killed, more back seat passengers, pedestrians and cyclists are being killed, the case for seat belt compulsion begins to look less than convincing.

Mr. Greville Janner (Leicester, West) rose——

Mr. Lawrence: This is a short debate, and I have already complained about the shortness of time. Therefore, I cannot give way.

The evidence is that the BMA, ROSPA and other reputable bodies, in their quite understandable desire to find a simple solution to the carnage on our streets, may be overreaching themselves in their enthusiasm to place reliance upon those figures.

To begin with, the contradiction between the total fatality statistics and the serious injury statistics has led the Government-appointed, totally independent analysts, Professors Durbin and Harvey, to say:

"we are unable to provide a completely satisfactory explanation of the differences between the figures for KSI"— that is killed and seriously injured—

"and killed for rear seat passengers, pedestrians and cyclists."

They have chosen to depend rather more for their conclusions on the serious injury figures. Yet the BMA's own evidence to the Select Committee on Transport was that the definition of serious injury extended from a broken finger to total paralysis resulting in death after 30 days, that 70 per cent. of injuries to cyclists were not reported, that only one in four casualties classified as seriously injured are in fact seriously injured and that, therefore:

"the existing definitions upon which records are based are misleading."

Bearing in mind that we were originally promised a saving of 1,000 lives a year, can that be a sound basis for relying on the statistics to prove conclusively that compulsion saves lives and serious injuries?

As The Lancet said on 11 January,

"There will be regret that the evidence on deaths is not more one-sides and disappointment that the measure has fallen short of its promise."

There is also the evidence from other countries. If seat belt compulsion had been saving lives, it would have shown up in the statistics of other countries that turned to compulsion years before we did in the United Kingdom. But just the opposite has been revealed. A study of 18 countries has shown that the reduction in deaths and serious injuries in countries without compulsion was greater than in countries where seat belt wearing had been made obligatory and where the law was enforced. The Department of Transport commissioned an internal report to test the validity of that study. That report has never been published. The Department's yellow book, which has been provided in the Vote Office as a document for use in the debate, makes—rather strangely—no reference to the experience of other countries. All of us in the House know that, whenever Governments can rely on the experience of other countries, they do so. Why was there no such reference? The answer may have been discovered by the New Scientist columnist, Mick Hamer, on 7 February last year. I shall read some extracts from his article:

"Evidence that the compulsory wearing of seat belts may not have saved lives has been hushed up by Britain's Department of Transport . . . An internal DoT report, which is still confidential, says that the introduction of a law making the wearing of seat belts compulsory in other European countries 'has not led to a detectable change in road-death rates'. Indeed, the report says that legislation might actually increase injuries."

Mr. Barry Sheerman (Huddersfield): What report?

Mr. Lawrence: The article goes on to say:

"Using a simple statistical model, the DoT estimates that the introduction of a seat-belt law 'was followed by an increase in injury rates'. The report says that 'in practical terms this probably means that the law will have no effect'. However, the report says bluntly that 'the results are not compatible with the department's "1,000 plus 10,000" estimates for front-seat vehicle occupants'."

Mr. Sheerman: What report?

Mr. Lawrence: This is a report that the Department has, which has not been released, and which fell into the hands, by routes that the hon. Gentleman will know only too well, of the New Scientist columnist. As the hon. Gentleman has not read the report, perhaps he will care to listen to more extracts from the article:

"The confidential report estimates that there will be an increase of 2·3 per cent. in deaths among car users, although this is not statistically significant. It also estimates that the number of deaths among other road users could climb by 150 a year. The report, however, questions whether this result is statistically reliable . . . Again, the DoT found that making drivers belt up had no significant effect on injuries among car users. However, it did find a significant increase in injuries among other road users: 'The predominance of positive effects (increased numbers of injuries) is alarming.'

The report estimates that the number of injuries to pedestrians will rise by 11 per cent., and the number of injuries to other road users will also rise, by around 12 per cent. to 13 per cent. . . .

Eight European countries introduced laws making drivers belt up, from Finland in 1973, to Denmark and West Germany in 1976. The DoT estimates that the effect of introducing the law was to increase road accidents in every country."

[Mr. Lawrence]

Where is that report? If the New Scientist has seen a copy of it, can we not also see it? If compulsion has failed to reduce casualties anywhere else in the world, can the figures relied on for Britain be all that reliable?

Perhaps the most obviously unacceptable feature of the Department of Transport's claim is that the reduction in overall fatalities of at least 200 and of 7,000 serious injuries per year since 1983 following seat belt compulsion is due entirely to seat belt compulsion. What an extraordinary claim. Has no life been saved as a result of all the new safety devices in new cars, and has the number of injuries not been reduced? For all the road improvements, has there been no benefit in a reduction in the number of deaths or injuries? For the increase in police control cars, and the improvement in motor cycle testing regulations, has there been no benefit? Most surprising of all, despite the almost simultaneous campaign in 1983 against drunk driving, reinforced by the new evidential breath test machine, which has resulted in 38,000 more breath tests, 23,000 more prosecutions, not one saving of life or of serious injury has been claimed—nothing, nil, zero, nix, zilch. That is despite the fact that elsewhere the Department has claimed a 23 per cent. reduction in deaths during the drink-driving hours of 10 pm to 4 am against a reduction of only 3 per cent. in driver deaths outside those hours.

If the claims for the success of the anti-drink-driving regulations have been understated, or not stated at all, it follows that the success of the compulsory seat belt law has been overstated, and we are entitled to ask by how much it has been overstated. Is it utterly impossible that all of the 200 lives may have been saved by the drink-driving regulations alone?

Those hon. Members, whether for libertarian reasons or because we are suspicious about swallowing without challenge every unsubstantiated claim that is made by our masters in Whitehall and are not inclined to accept the exaggerated claims made for seat belt compulsion, owe a huge debt of gratitude to one man, Dr. John Adams of University College, London. He has patiently and relentlessly researched the subject and has done the work upon which I have been able to base this speech. In answer to the question: why do seat belts not save lives and injuries? he would, I think, reply that just as wearing a safety harness makes the rock climber more adventurous, so the safety of a seat belt may well make the driver marginally more reckless. It is accepted that improved car brakes do not necessarily achieve more than to make the driver brake later and at a faster speed. If that consumption of performance benefit applies psychologically to braking, why should it not also apply to seat belts?

Dr. Adams concludes a recent article that he wrote with these words:

"If one trusts the accurate numbers (fatalities) rather than the large numbers (injuries), if one allows the reduction in drunken driving a reasonable share of the credit for the decrease in fatalities in 1983, and if one considers the evidence relating to other countries, the balance of the Department of Transport's own evidence tilts strongly in favour of the conclusion that there has been no net life-saving benefit attributable to the seat belt law, only a shift in the burden of risk from the best protected to the most vulnerable road users."

Those are the real facts and those are the real conclusions.

It may be that enough has been done to show that the three year experiment, having failed to produce any more convincing evidence than the foreign experience has produced for the saving of life and serious injuries, means that we should be allowed to return to the voluntary wearing of seat belts, subject to the constraints to wear them that were imposed upon us by the insurance companies and the courts. However, such a reversion may be unrealistic in the present climate of opinion, and I do not ask for that. But are we not entitled to ask the Government to extend the experiment for a further period of time so that they may have the opportunity to produce more convincing statistics than have so far been produced?

I ask my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State for Transport to withdraw the motion and to submit another in due course to extend the experiment for a further three-year period. That would not involve the dropping of compulsory seat belt wearing for the time being. An amendment that I would have tabled, had the Government allowed me an appropriate opportunity to do so, would have asked just that.

Mr. George Robertson (Hamilton): At a social occasion last summer in my constituency a young man came up to me and said that he had started to wear a seat belt because the law said that he had to do so, but that he had resisted it until then because he believed many of the arguments advanced by some hon. Members. A notable example of those arguments has been reiterated by the hon. and learned Member for Burton (Mr. Lawrence). However, this young man said, "Last week I was in a road accident and there is no doubt in my mind that as a consequence of that road accident, had I not been wearing a seat belt, I should be dead or so severely injured that I would not be out and about tonight. So I suppose I have to thank you, and the likes of you, by persuading me, through the law, to wear a seat belt, for the very fact that I am here and able to speak to you this evening." That spoke more eloquently to me than anything else that I have heard, certainly this evening, about what the general public believe has been the advantage of the law that Parliament passed three years ago.

Reference has already been made to the hon. Member for Wallasey (Mrs. Chalker) and I, too would congratulate her this evening on her apparent elevation to the Foreign Office, even if the consequence of that will be that she will suffer the attacks, not of my hon. Friend the Member for Wigan (Mr. Stott), but of myself in another incarnation. We believe that it is being seen as promotion, and we wish her well because she has supervised this issue with great assiduousness.

I have a slight interest to declare in this debate. As chairman of the seat belt survivors club, I have been in contact with a large number of people who have had their lives saved and who have been saved from serious injury because over the years they have worn a seat belt in accidents that would otherwise have rendered them dead or infirm.

I admit that over the years I have become a zealot on this issue. I wore my seat belt for many years because I thought that it made common sense. Nine years ago this Sunday I was involved in a head-on collision with a Land Rover, and only as a consequence of wearing a seat belt was I saved from almost certain death. That certainly concentrated the mind and gave me an enthusiasm for the issue.

I have always believed, and I know that hon. Members on both sides of the House who have supported the measure have believed, that this was a matter of common sense. We are reassured by the fact that over the three years since the law came in, what was a matter of great controversy, of almost endless debate in the House and repeated votes, with large majorities in favour, is now a matter of no controversy at all. The vast majority of motorists put on their seat belts now with no more thought than they give to making sure that the doors of the car are firmly closed behind them.

Ninety four per cent. of motorists are now using seat belts. The statistics that the Minister gave are eloquent testimony to the success of the measure. The Minister is a brave man this evening to come to the Dispatch Box and admit that he was one who was not convinced but has now had conviction forced upon him. He is not alone in that. One of the most vivid speeches in all the debates on the subject that I can remember was that by the hon. Member for Bury St. Edmunds (Sir E. Griffiths), who gave his personal testimony to his scepticism on the issue and the conviction that was imposed upon him by his experience as a Minister at the Department of Transport and the vivid recollections that he had of the casualty wards in hospitals and the sight of the road accident victims within them.

This is without doubt the single most successful road safety measure that Britain has ever seen. It costs nothing in civil liberty and financial terms, and it has saved so much. It has saved the suffering and the pain that goes with the road casualty figures every day of this life. It has saved our nation at least £130 million. More than that, it has saved countless numbers of maimings, blindings and cripplings, which are the real human manifestation of the road accident statistics that are represented in the savings that have been put forward over the past three years.

The hon. and learned Member for Burton made virtually the same speech tonight as we heard three years ago and in practically every other debate beforehand. [Interruption.] My hon. Friend the Member for Huddersfield (Mr. Sheerman) says that the hon. and learned Member did not vote.

Some have chosen to support Dr. John Adams's theory of risk compensation, and this is an attractive and eloquent theory, put forward by somebody whose mastery of the statistics gives him a bogus authority. Is his theory worth anything? If it works in this case, why does it not work in every other case where preventative measures have been taken in road safety? Are we to abandon all sfety measures for people on the roads and in their cars simply because a questionable, flimsy, tendentious theory suggests that those who are belted have more confidence and start knocking down pedestrians, cyclists and motor cyclists? I am sure that the vast majority of the population would reject that theory, and they have shown that they have done so by the act that they continue to wear their seat belts.

Some have said that the numbers saved from death and serious injury are smaller than was suggested by the proponents of the measure when this issue was last debated in Parliament. That is so, but the estimates were never likely to be precise, any more than the statistics used this evening are precise. We know that if the usage rate were to go from 94 to 100 per cent., the chances are that the targets established on the guesses and best estimates would be met.

At least 200 more people a year are alive who would otherwise be dead, and at least 7,000 who would otherwise be seriously injured are able to get around. We are told that there has been a 25 per cent. reduction in admissions to hospitals of front seat road accident victims, and a 30 per cent. reduction in hospital inpatients from road accidents. There has been a 40 per cent. reduction in major and minor brain injuries among those injured in car accidents. Are these not testimony enough to the valuable and life-preserving measure?

Three years ago, thanks to the skill and opportunity of Lord Nugent, a former Conservative Transport Minister, in the other place, this House had a chance to embrace this life-saving legislation. As it always has done, the House gave the measure its support. The evidence has been clear. People have been saved, and we must therefore consolidate that success.

Mr. Gary Waller (Keighley): Some believe that there is no philosophical issue involved in this matter — in other words, if any measure such as this saves lives, it is justified. There are others for whom the matter is equally simple. They argue that it is entirely a matter of individual freedom, and that expediency cannot override principle. Finally there are those—among whom I count myself—who are perhaps the majority in the country, who accept that some element of freedom is compromised, but on the whole, are prepared to put up with such an impairment of their freedom if there is a clear safety benefit.

It goes without saying that if one is involved in an accident when wearing a seat belt, one stands a better chance of avoiding death or serious injury than if one is unbelted. The statistics show clearly that following the introduction of compulsory front seat belt wearing, more drivers and front seat passengers are surviving than before. Those who are blind to argument would say, "End of story", but those who are anxious to get at the truth will look at the position of other road users, because of the possibility that drivers will act differently if they feel more secure.

Those who want to pour scorn on such a hypothesis may do so by appealing to subjective observation. At first sight, that seems reasonable. Most people say that they do not feel that they are taking a greater risk because they are wearing a belt, and nobody has been able to detect whether drivers wearing a seat belt drive faster or more dangerously than they would if they did not. To suggest that such a difference would or could be detected is to distort the theory that driving behaviour is altered by perception of risk.

Unfortunately, fatal accidents happen every day, but every day many millions of miles are covered by motorists, and a fatality occurs once in every 1,000 million miles driven. The difference in behaviour only needs to be infinitesimal and, certainly, immeasurable to have an effect on the casualty rates.

More people may see the point of the argument, if we reverse the process. Take away a seat belt from a rally driver, and who would deny that he would drive more cautiously? If he crashes the result may be more calamitous, but is it not more likely that he will take great care to ensure that he does not crash, and will he not take a fraction of a second more when he encounters a bend, and brake a fraction of a second early to increase his chances of reaching his destination? Enough of theory. Let us see what has happened in practice.

[Mr. Gary Waller]

Professors Durbin and Harvey, who were commissioned by the Department of Transport to carry out an analysis of the statistics, rely mainly on the figures for those killed and seriously injured, rather than on fatalities alone. Where the change in fatalities appears to support the risk-compensation hypothesis they fall back on the number of those killed and seriously injured. However, those figures are open to misunderstanding and misreporting.

A serious injury may require the casualty to remain in hospital for only one night. The Transport and Road Research Laboratory says that 59 per cent. of serious injuries to cyclists are never reported to the police, and the British Medical Association claims that the figure is even higher. Therefore, the figures of those seriously injured are open to extreme doubt.

What do Durbin and Harvey say when they find fatalities that are inconsistent with the view that seat belts bring about a safer environment? On page 51 of the Department's report, they state

"The fact remains that we find the large proportionate increase in rear seat passengers killed hard to understand . . . We are reluctant to accept changes in driving behaviour as an explanation since these would be expected to lead to a corresponding increase in numbers seriously injured and there is no evidence of such an increase. We must therefore leave the sharp rise in the number of rear seat passengers killed as an unexplained mystery, at least until more evidence is available."

Had the House had an opportunity to extend the experimental period, as my hon. and learned Friend the Member for Burton (Mr. Lawrence) suggested, more such evidence could have become available. Regrettably, the House has not been granted that option.

In the two years following the introduction of compulsion, the increase in deaths among rear seat passengers was 18 per cent. Durbin and Harvey were also at a loss to explain increases in casualties among cyclists and pedestrians. When we examine the figures more carefully, we find that the increases did not occur for cyclists and pedestrians killed because they came into contact with heavy goods vehicles, but, because they were hit by cars and light vans, most of whose drivers were wearing seat belts. On page 31 of their report, Durbin and Harvey accepted that the evidence was unmistakable. They said

"There remains strong evidence of a substantial increase in numbers of cyclists killed in accidents with cars."

As they pointed to an increase of about 40 per cent., that conclusion was unavoidable.

Even for those who accept all the arguments favouring compulsion, the fatality statistics for motorists must be a serious disappointment. In 1977 the then Labour Minister, Mr. William Rodgers, forecast that 1,000 lives a year would be saved. By 1982 the Department of Transport suggested a figure of 700 or fewer, and on this morning's radio a spokesman for the BMA was talking about 200. The Lancet admitted

"There will be regret that the evidence on deaths is not more one-sided and disappointment that the measure has fallen short of its promise."

The fact that the Department's chosen statisticians, Durbin and Harvey, neglected to take into account was the concerted effort against drink-driving which also began in the first part of the same year, 1983, with the introduction of the evidential breath testing machine and the jump in prosecutions. There was a significant drop in the number of drivers killed who were found to be over the limit and 160—curiously close to 200—fewer drunken drivers died in 1983 than in 1982. Most significant of all, the number killed between 10 pm and 4 am, often described as the drink-drive hours, fell by 23 per cent. compared with a drop of only 3 per cent. at all other times of day. The Department's statisticians attributed all the savings to seat belts but the evidence points in a very different direction.

The Lancet said, referring to Dr. Adams, that it was

"unhelpful of the Department of Transport to have suppressed an evaluation supporting his doubts."

More charitably, I would say that the 1981 evaluation of the experience of compulsion in other countries was not intended for publication. Nevertheless, it accepted Adam's finding of an increase in pedestrian injuries in every one of the eight countries which had introduced compulsion and described the statistical odds against achieving eight such positive results as one in 256. It also warned that the predominance of increased casualty rates for pedestrians was "alarming" and noted that

"since pedestrians account for 20 per cent. of casualties in Britain and the law effect seems positive for them"— in other words, casualties increased—

"closer scrutiny is called for."

That seems to be a serious understatement.

Given that the evidence points to a seriously increased risk for non-motorists, it is not surprising that alarm has been expressed by representatives of pedestrians, cyclists and motorcyclists. Motorcycle organisations noted that despite new safety legislation passed by the House and despite a proven reduction in drinking and riding, casualties among motorcyclists did not fall. The representative of the Pedestrians' Association on the Parliamentary Advisory Council for Transport Safety drew attention to the fact that the organisation had ignored some of Durbin and Harvey's findings and the representatives of the Cyclists Touring Club and Friends of the Earth, who had originally favoured compulsion, also changed their minds when they saw the effects.

Mr. Sheerman: Does the hon. Gentleman admit that those three organisations did not change their stance to one of anti-compulsion but merely said that they would be neutral and that they are only three out of 48 members of PACTS?

Mr. Waller: The three representatives to whom I have referred are now decidely against compulsion, having previously supported it.

One major motoring organisation quotes as fact figures for casualty savings which the most ardent pro-compulsion lobbyists would not dare to claim as proven. Another claims that at least the net effect is probably positive. In effect, an increase in casualties among pedestrians and two-wheelers is regarded as acceptable if there is a sufficient reduction in driver and passenger casualties. I hope that Ministers disagree with that attitude, but if some of the evidence produced by the Department itself is to be accepted the conclusion that in endorsing the regulations we accept a transfer of the burden of risk from the best protected to the most vulnerable is inescapable. If one examines the department's own evidence fairly it points, regrettably, in that direction.

My hon. Friend the Minister of State, Foreign and Commonwealth Office, whom I, too, congratulate on her new appointment, said in defence of compulsion—and the hon. Member for Hamilton (Mr. Robertson) made the same point—that she had received a number of letters of thanks from motorists saved by seat belts. The graves of those who died because some drivers took greater risks bear no distinguishing signs and my hon Friend the Minister will not be receiving any letters from them. Nevertheless, if one takes the fatality statistics as the only ones with which one cannot argue, if one considers the effects of drink-drive legislation which were ignored by the statisticians, and if one considers the international evidence, and if one asks why more pedestrians, cyclists and motorcyclists have died than one would have expected, only one conclusion is possible — that we should not approve the regulations today.

Mr. Roger Stott (Wigan): It would be impertinent if the Front-Bench speakers took more than the minimum time in this debate, because this is a House of Commons matter. Each hon. Member must make up his or her mind whether to agree with the proposition. I do not intend to spend a great deal of time advocating my support for the points made by the Under-Secretary of State. That is not to say that I do not believe implicitly or fervently in what he said, but I believe that I should give other hon Members time to deploy their arguments.

I do not know what motivates hon. Members to walk down a particular Damascus road, but I note that the Under-Secretary of State and the Secretary of State for Transport have decided that the evidence compiled by their Department has convinced them that the way in which they voted the last time this matter was discussed was wrong. I presume that they will reverse that decision and vote in favour of the continuation of the compulsory wearing of seat belts. I do not say that in a malevolent sense; I say it in a spirit of good will to them, because I believe that they have now had an opportunity to look objectively at the overwhelming evidence that has come forward since the experiment.

I appreciate the efforts, work and commitment of the hon. Member for Wallasey (Mrs. Chalker) in all the road safety matters that we have discussed since she has been a member of the Government, especially since she has been concerned with transport. There are not many measures during the six years of the Conservative party's term in office with which I am proud to be associated. There is little legislation that I would commend to anyone. I am, however, proud to be associated with the 1981 transport legislation. The hon. Member for Wallasey deserves credit for ensuring that it reached the statute book. She is right in claiming credit for the lives that have been saved and the accidents and fatal injuries that have been prevented as a result of the wearing of seat belts.

It would be academic of me if I were to rebut the views of the hon. Member for Keighley (Mr. Waller) with a typewritten script from the Parliamentary Advisory Council for Transport Safety on the virtues of compulsory seat belt wearing. I doubt that I would convince him of its arguments. Many important people concerned with road safety support the council's claims, including the Association of Chief Police Officers, the Automobile Association, the British Medical Association, the Casualty Surgeons Association, the Child Accident Prevention Trust, the County Road Safety Officers Association, the County Surveyors Society, the Institute of Road Safety Officers, the Medical Commission on Accident Prevention, the Motor Conference, the Royal Society for the Prevention of Accidents and the Society of Motor Manufacturers and Traders. I concede that the Cyclists Association and Friends of the Earth might take a different view and might disagree with the overwhelming evidence on the compulsory wearing of seat belts which the House has received during the past three years. I accept that in a democracy they have an absolute right to do that, in the same way as I accept that Dr. Adams has a right to proffer his analysis. Unfortunately, my record shows that the hon. Member for Keighley did not vote in the last Division on this issue. I refer him to Hansard of 28 July 1981 where I took Dr. Adams to task for his assertions that the compulsory wearing of seat belts would not be beneficial. Dr. Adams tilts at conventional windmills. I do not disregard that. Long may he continue to do so, but I believe that on this occasion, as on the last, his evidence is seriously flawed. He has not satisfied me——

Mr. Lawrence: The hon. Gentleman is an ordinary Member of the House.

Mr. Stott: He must satisfy me as an hon. Member. The fact that I am propped up against the Dispatch Box gives me no more rights than the hon. and learned Member for Burton (Mr. Lawrence). Dr. Adams has failed to convince me that what he is saying is correct. I do not believe that it is.

There is abundant evidence to support our case. The compulsory wearing of seat belts has saved lives and has prevented injuries to and the disfigurement of many car drivers. If the House of Commons is about doing anything it is about doing that. I rest on what I said a little earlier: this is one piece of legislation with which I have been proud to be associated during the past six years. I shall vote for its renewal this evening.

Mr. Roger Moate (Faversham): Like the hon. Member for Wigan (Mr. Stott) I feel a sense of pride at having taken some small part in the legislation which we enacted some years ago. It was not achieved without a great deal of battling over many years. That is why many of us feel a great deal of pleasure at, in the words of my hon. Friend the Under-Secretary when he introduced the measure, the public's wholehearted and instant acceptance of the measure. In that we do not include my hon. and learned Friend the Member for Burton (Mr. Lawrence), but that would have been rather too much to hope for.

One of the most striking things has been, despite all the prognostications of the opponents, that the public have accepted the measure as a commonsense one that contributes greatly to road safety. That is in stark contrast to their forecasts at the time.

It has been suggested that my hon. and learned Friend made the same speech that he made several years ago. That was not a fair accusation because he has completely shifted the grounds of his argument. It is significant to recall the forecasts made by the opponents of the measure. First, they forecast that it would be unenforceable by the police. That was a common cry. In fact there have been a dramatic increase to about 95 per cent. in the public wearing of seat belts. I am sure that my hon. and learned Friend is big enough to admit that there have been no problems over enforceability. We were told that there would be massive resentment by the public against this measure which would cause animosity towards the police. That, again, has not happened.

[Mr. Roger Moate]

My hon. and learned Friend significantly admitted that fewer people might be hurled through windscreens and that there would be fewer front seat deaths. The measures opponents were denying that some years ago. That was the point of their argument. They said that that would not happen. I am sure we can at least agree that there has been a significant reduction in front-seat passenger deaths. That is important proof of the sense of the legislation.

I find extraordinary the ground onto which the opponents have moved. In effect they are saying that this safety device is so effective that it makes people complacent and that therefore other deaths result. That is a strange argument and I hope that we do not try to apply it too often in the sphere of safety. If one carried the argument to absurd lengths, one might do away with brakes, because brakes make drivers more careless. If they had no brakes they would drive so much more carefully and fewer injuries would be inflicted on pedestrians and cyclists. We might do away with fire extinguishers because they make people careless about fires. My hon. and learned Friend is admitting that this safety device works so well and drivers are so confident of it that it increases their carelessness.

My hon. and learned Friend and my hon. Friend the Member for Keighley (Mr. Waller) started by admitting that there had been an inexplicable increase in rear-seat accidents, and deaths of and injuries to pedestrians, cyclists and motor cyclists, and cited that as evidence that the wearing of seat belts causes injury to others. That is absolute nonsense. The facts remain as shown by a range of inquiries, including an independent assessment that at least 200 lives a year have been saved. My hon. Friend and others say, "We heard a figure of 1,000 a year". That is true, but my hon. and learned Friend will remember that, in those debates, many of us said that even if only 100 lives a year were saved, it must be worth doing.

My hon. and learned Friend's arguments about civil liberties, which sound strange when applied to the rules of the road and are quite inapplicable in that area, subside into nothing when compared with a saving of life on the scale about which we are talking.

Mr. Lawrence: What assessment does my hon. Friend give to the success or otherwise of the drink-driving regulations?

Mr. Moate: My hon. and learned Friend must remember that we are talking about net figures, and about increases in some other figures that could equally be attributable in that way. The figures have been carefully analysed by independent assessors. My hon. and learned Friend will not accept them in a month of Sundays, but other independent assessors and a mass of evidence say that we have at least achieved that worthwhile and significant reduction in casualties on the road. After all these years, I should have thought that my hon. and learned Friend would start to see the sense of the argument. Even if he remains an almost lone and obstinate voice on this issue — [HON. MEMBERS: "He is not alone."] I said "almost".

The point is that the majority of the British public accepts this as common sense. If my hon. and learned Friend fears that the legislation causes more injuries to rear-seat passengers, I hope that he will follow the logic of his argument and accept compulsory restraints on rear-seat passengers to help to reduce casualties on the road. But even then, I fear that his phoney arguments about civil liberties in this instance will always be more important to him than reducing the carnage on our roads.

Mr. Barry Sheerman (Huddersfield): One could be forgiven for having a feeling of déjà vu this evening. Three and a half years ago, we spent a long time in the same company listening to similar speeches, and some of us spent many hours arguing the matter in the Committee that considered the Transport Bill. But, while listening to the speeches of the few remaining opponents to the measure, I was wondering why they feel so strongly after all the evidence that has been presented to us. This is not only the most effective road safety legislation in the history of this place, it is the most closely monitored. No legislation has been under such a microscope. It has been monitored by an independent medical committee, it has been sent by the Department of Transport to two independent statistical assessors at London university, and it has been assessed by every professional organisation involved in road safety.

When I intervened in the speech of the hon. Member for Keighley (Mr. Waller), I was pointing out that the Parliamentary Advisory Council for Transport Safety—which I have the honour to co-chair—has 48 members, 45 of whom support the continuation and the making permanent of this legislation. Of course, there will always be some disagreement in any argument. I applaud the fact that Dr. Adams, as he did three and a half years ago, sticks to his argument that the risk compensation theory is correct. After three-and-a-half years the evidence is against him. Every other authority, including Dr. Murray MacKay, London university, the British Medical Association, the Royal College of Surgeons, and everyone who has monitored the situation agree.

Listening to some of the arguments one would think that statisticians were opposed to the measures, not politicians. We must judge on the best technical and scientific advice available. My hon. Friend the Member for Wigan (Mr. Stott) mentioned the Automobile Association and the Royal Automobile Association which has changed its mind. The evidence is in.

Why do some people still oppose the measure? There is an element of guilt they cannot shove off. I do not wish to be unpleasant, but perhaps those who stopped the legislation from becoming reality for over 10 years have some responsibility for 2,000 people being unnecessarily killed and for 70,000 people being unnecessarily injured. That is a very heavy responsibility and I am not surprised at the guilt felt by the opponents of this measure.

I intervened in the speech of the hon. Member for Keighley. I have the evidence. The Friends of the Earth are not against the measure but are neutral, as are the pedestrians' organisations. He said that I was misleading the House. I was telling the plain, unvarnished truth.

Several other hon. Members want to speak and I want them to have that opportunity. One of the nice things about the legislation was that it came from the Back Benches. It was not ministerial; it certainly was not Governmental, and it was not initiated by the Labour Front Bench. We stand firm, remembering that day three and a half years ago when a combination of the two leaders of our great parties and their Chief Whips not only put every obstacle possible in our way, but decided that the vote should be on the night before the royal wedding on a one-line Whip after Ten o'clock.

In the last three and a half years we have seen one of the nicest things with which most of us have been associated. So many speeches in the House result in nothing. So many speeches result in legislation which damages our country rather than improving it.

Mr. Walter Harrison (Wakefield): I hope that my hon. Friend will identify which way the then deputy Chief Whip voted.

Mr. Sheerman: There was some enlightenment behind the Chief Whips.

This legislation has delivered life. It has delivered freedom from serious injury for so many people that it would be a disaster if we voted to reverse that process. We can go on to apply science to the problem of road accidents. This is what the measure represents. It represents people looking with intelligence at measures. We are not seeking apple pie solutions, but scientific solutions to a problem. There are many other ways to cut serious injuries and deaths on our roads. Let us build on this success and go forward. This is not the end of the road but the beginning of saving lives and preventing serious injury.

12 midnight

Mr. Peter Griffiths (Portsmouth, North): I have in front of me briefs from the British Cycling Federation and the Cyclists Touring Club, both of which state unequivocally that they trust that we shall vote no at the end of the debate. I do not know how that can be held to be a neutral position. The words used are "Vote No", and such wording has never been neutral in my vocabulary.

A motor vehicle can be dangerous, and for that reason we license people to drive on the public highway. If they transgress seriously, we remove their right to drive. Otherwise, we assume that they are responsible citizens carrying out a legal activity for which they pay extremely heavily. It is no part of the duty of the House, or of any Government, to legislate to force people to do that which the House or the Government believe will be good for them and them alone.

The only person who can be helped, assisted or saved by a seat belt is the person who wears it. If we were debating measures controlling the design of motor cars and providing for safety for those with whom the motor car comes in contact—[Interruption.] I wish that the hon. Member for Wigan (Mr. Stott) would listen instead of making remarks from a sedentary position. I did not interrupt his speech.

If we were producing legislation to provide measures to make the motor car more safe, when driven carefully, for other road users, it would have my fullest support. However, we are being asked permanently to infringe the right of choice of individuals who are responsible. If they are not responsible, they should not be allowed to drive upon the public highway.

It is an essential freedom that we should be allowed to choose to what extent we shall be mollycoddled. The seat belt has many disavantages and it is uncomfortable for many people. Even if belts are well designed, they restrict one's ability to turn round to see what is coming from behind. It is not a universally helpful piece of apparatus. Unless it is clear that it helps others, there is no reason to impose it upon the long-suffering motorist.

Mr. Norman Miscampbell (Blackpool, North): Is it not abundantly clear that most accidents are not head-on collisions? The majority involve glancing blows. The person who is retained in the driving position has far more chance of controlling the car and helping the third parties to whom he might run into than has the driver who is not so retained. It is not a matter of helping the driver alone, who is able to control the vehicle because he is in the driving position and has not been projected through the windscreen.

Mr. Griffiths: It is not part of my argument to suggest other than that the driver and front-seat passenger benefit from wearing a seat belt if they are in an accident. The motorist has the element of safety that is provided by being inside a steel cage and he may benefit from wearing a belt, but there is some evidence, the statistical reliability of which it is difficult to assess—I speak as someone who taught statistics in the classroom — that there is a likelihood that there are more vulnerable road users who will be disadvantaged if a driver takes greater risks than previously. These road users are pedestrians and cyclists.

If the evidence suggested that other road users benefited from motorists using seat belts the case would be open and shut, but the evidence leaves a great deal of doubt. As there is a division in the House—my hon. and learned Friend the Member for Burton (Mr. Lawrence) feels strongly on the issue and there are others who feel just as strongly—and an element of doubt, I can think of no reason why we should have to make a permanent decision this evening.

Why can we not have an extension of the trial period, during which we would attempt to keep the other variables as constant as possible? Over the past three years we have had rapidly changing variables, which have been referred to by others, and I shall not rehearse them. Would it not be reasonable to mention, for example, the increase in the use of laminated glass for windscreens as having some effect on the number of drivers and front-seat passengers who are less seriously injured in head-on collisions? Why should we assume that that has had no effect? Better designed steering wheels and cockpits, improvements in brakes, tyre performance and in roads and the building of more motorways are all factors that could be taken into account and could account for some of the reduction in death and injury.

If it is so obvious that seat belt wearing is desirable, why is compulsion necessary? Is it suggested that drivers are so foolish that they will not do what is obviously sensible? Is it not rather the case that about half the motorists thought that seat belts increased their safety and the safety of others, and that about half did not? The half who did not now accept the law because we are basically a law abiding nation and because it is obvious to traffic policemen whether a motorist is wearing a seat belt.

I have no doubt that we could increase safety by insisting that every driver wears a full safety harness. Where do we draw the line? I suggest that we draw the line at letting sensible people who have been given a licence to drive on a public highway decide, so that we retain personal freedom and concentrate the Department's efforts, and perhaps ours, on finding means of avoiding injury to people other than drivers and front seat passengers.

12.7 am

Mr. Austin Mitchell (Great Grimsby): I shall not follow the hon. Member for Portsmouth, North (Mr. Griffiths) down all of the devious routes of illogicality through which he has just meandered except to say that seat belt wearing has to be compulsory because compulsion made seat belt wearing increase from about 30 per cent. to 94 or 95 per cent. The argument that there should be a test period, during which, presumably, all advances in safety are to be held back while we establish the effectiveness of seat belt wearing, is utterly illogical.

It is interesting that the only arguments that have been advanced against the proposal have been made by the provisional wing of the lunatic fringe of the libertarian lobby. All seek, by querulous, quivering, specious argument to deny the paramount fact that, thanks to the three-year trial period, 1,000 people who would be dead if we had not made seat belt wearing compulsory are alive today. What is more, some 18,000 serious injuries have been avoided during the same period. That is the supreme fact that they are quibbling against. No wonder their argument becomes so specious and illogical.

Like my hon. Friend the Member for Hamilton (Mr. Robertson), I have been a committed supporter of the compulsory wearing of seat belts ever since I was involved in a serious accident in which my life was undoubtedly saved because I was wearing a seat belt. I was a new Member of Parliament and had not realised that I had been elected to the driving seat of a car rather than a seat in the House of Commons. I spent most of my time going up and down the A1. After a few months, I was involved in an accident, but my life was saved because I was wearing a seat belt.

One of the few achievements open to Back Benchers, especially under this Government, is that, with the benign superintendance of the hon. Member for Wallasey (Mrs. Chalker), who has now transmuted to other things, on which we congratulate her once again—it is a chorus tonight—we have eventually succeeded in getting seat belt wearing made compulsory. It was later than it should have been and much later than in other countries, but we did it. It was a major social advance, thanks to which we have a 30 per cent. saving in deaths and injuries to front seat passengers, a 20 per cent. saving in slight injuries to front seat passengers, a 25 per cent. reduction in the number of hospital admissions, a 39 per cent. reduction in brain injuries, a 53 per cent. reduction in facial wounds and a 40 per cent. reduction in lung injuries sustained by front seat occupants. Those are the achievements of the trial period.

Mr. Bermingham: Does my hon. Friend agree that, if the motion is passed, we should seek an assurance from the Minister that he will continue to monitor the statistics so that we may see the outcome of the measure? Secondly, perhaps the Minister will look again at the construction of the seat belts used in our motor vehicles.

Mr. Mitchell: I welcome my hon. Friend's suggestions. There is much to be done in those areas and we should encourage that work to be done.

We cannot gainsay the huge statistical improvements that have been made, at minimal cost, because, for practical purposes, the legislation has been self-enforcing. To go back on making seat belts permanently compulsory would be to throw several tons of baby out with a small drop of bath water.

Tory Members cannot now revive all the libertarian arguments that a basic element in British freedom was the freedom to go head first through a windscreen and that that was the touchstone of British liberty. Therefore, they are driven on to the arguments of Dr. John Adams, of the department of geography at University college, London.

The logical conclusion of Dr. Adams's argument is that if being safe encourages people to take more risks—and that has not been proved; there is no evidence that people drive faster when wearing seat belts—drivers should be made unsafe, more exposed and less comfortable. They should not have brakes, and all the improvements in interior comforts and safety should be abandoned. The logical conclusion of Dr. Adams's work is that all car drivers should be riding bicycles, so that they are exposed to the environment around them and the safety factor will be strengthened.

The Parliamentary Advisory Council for Transport Safety has put those arguments in their true light. It is claimed that, internationally, there has been no improvement, but that claim is based on a starting year of 1973 and several countries introduced compulsory seat belt wearing in that year and some did so before that. The true starting year is 1970. Road accidents date for 21 developed countries over a 10-year period show that countries without seat belt laws suffered an average 6·6 per cent. growth in road accident deaths, while countries with a seat belt law enjoyed an average 17·8 per cent. reduction in fatalities. That is the statistical change resulting from a true measure as opposed to that taken by Dr. Adams in a manipulation of the figures.

The Parliamentary Advisory Council for Transport Safety goes through Dr. Adams's other arguments to show how illogical they are. For instance, there is no statistically significant rise in the number of pedestrians, pedal cyclists and rear seat passengers who are seriously injured. There has been an increase in the number of fatally injured pedestrians and pedal cyclists, but the numbers are too small to be statistically significant.

We are driven to the conclusion that Dr. Adams's arguments are specious and would not justify the gain that has been made in the saving of lives and the avoidance of injury to drivers and front seat passengers.

It is disgraceful that the Friends of the Earth are sitting on the fence and that organisations such as the Cyclists Touring Club, the British Cycling Federation and others should oppose the extension of the legislation. This is not an argument between cyclists and drivers. It is an argument about how we save lives, and the legislation has demonstrably done that.

I welcome the proposal to make seat belt wearing permanently compulsory. I hope that within not too long a time we move from there to make compulsory the wearing of seat belts in rear seats.

12.14 am

Mr. David Mitchell: Many hon. Members have paid tribute to the work of my hon. Friend the former Minister of State in this area, and wished her well in her new responsibilities. I join with them in that.

The hon. Member for Isle of Wight (Mr. Ross) supported the measure, but called for more investigation into the increase in the number of accidents involving cyclists. I agree with him, and will see what we can do to further the discovery of the causes of such accidents.

My hon. and learned Friend the Member for Burton (Mr. Lawrence) admitted that there had been an improvement in the figures for injuries to those sitting in front seats—a point mentioned by my hon. Friend the Member for Faversham (Mr. Moate), but he and my hon. Friend the Member for Keighley (Mr. Waller) thought that more back-seat passengers had been injured, and more pedestrians and cyclists killed and injured. They suggested that the reason for that might lie in the campaign against drinking and driving.

We do not know for certain the reason for the increase in injuries to back-seat passengers, but the most likely reason is that more people have been using back seats because they have not wanted to sit in the front and wear seat belts. There may have been a rise in the number of pedestrians and cyclists killed, but the figures of 200 lives saved is a minimum net figure. It is based on the most pessimistic assumption and allows for the possibility that the increase in the number of injuries to rear-seat passengers, cyclists and pedestrians has been due to the compulsory wearing of seat belts. Without allowing for that possibility, the annual saving of lives would be between 450 and 500. The net figure is a substantial 200 lives saved.

On the campaign against drinking and driving, the reduction in the number of deaths began in February 1983 when the seat belt law was introduced, not in May 1983 when evidential breath testing machines were introduced. Therefore, there is not the correlation that my hon. and learned Friend suggested.

Hon. Members have suggested that I have changed my view. Quite frankly, that is true. In the light of the evidence, I am wiser now than when I took another view. I would have preferred not to have found it necessary to apply compulsion, but I am persuaded by the evidence that it is a major advantage.

It being one and a half hours after the commencement of proceedings on the motion, MR. DEPUTY SPEAKER put the Question, pursuant to Standing Order No. 3 (Exempted Business).

That the continuance in force of the Motor Vehicles (Wearing of Seat Belts) Regulations 1982 (S.I., 1982, No. 1203) be approved.

Oldchurch Hospital, Romford

Motion made, and Question proposed, That this House do now adjourn.—[Mr. Peter Lloyd.]

12.30 am

Mr. Robin Squire (Hornchurch): I begin in this inevitably short debate by welcoming my hon. Friend the Member for Romford (Mr. Neubert), within whose constituency lies the hospital of which I am speaking tonight and who, as hon. Members will be aware, is unable, due to his rank on the Treasury Bench, to contribute to our proceedings. I know from conversations with him that he echoes everything that I shall say tonight in defence of a proven and well-loved hospital and local unit.

Perhaps there is an additional reason for welcoming my hon. Friend, because back in April 1980 he initiated an identical Adjournment debate which reads as well now as I am sure it sounded on the occasion. Sadly, this is the second time in six years that hon. Members in the relevant health district have had to come to the defence of the radiotherapy unit at Oldchurch. I am pleased to say that my hon. Friend was successful in 1980, and I hope that I and other hon. Members pressing this evening for its retention will be similarly successful this year.

At the end of September last year the North-East Thames regional health authority published a report prepared by Coopers and Lybrand Associates, management consultants, which was issued, I stress, with the aim of improving the resources devoted to the treatment of cancer within the region. It is also important to stress that to date the report has neither been discussed nor approved by the regional authority. None the less, the central recommendation of that report is that the existing nine radiotherapy units within the region be reduced to five, four of these being in inner London and one at Broomfield, north of Chelmsford. Thus, the Oldchurch radiotherapy unit would be closed and we are led to believe by the regional officers that 90 per cent. of Barking, Havering and Brentwood patients would be expected to use Broomfield hospital.

The proposal to close that unit is simply unacceptable. It is unacceptable to the community health council and to the district health council, from whose reports I am tonight drawing considerable information. It is unacceptable to Barking and Havering local medical committee and to Havering borough council. Perhaps most important of all, it is unacceptable to the people of Barking and Havering who may have occasion to use the hospital and the unit and who, even more than in 1980, have demonstrated their support by signing petitions against its possible closure.

My hon. Friend the Member for Romford will remember that in 1980 we received some 60,000 signatures to retain the unit. Over the past few months 130,000 people have signed the petition in support of retaining the unit. One might therefore say that if my hon. Friend's persuasiveness, backed by those signatures several years ago, was sufficient, perhaps I should not say any more tonight, because the argument is overwhelming.

I emphasise tonight why opinion against this proposal is so united. It flies in the face of logic. Half of the regional population now lives in the region of Essex, and the regional strategy since 1978 has reflected the decline of the population in central London and the growth of the population in outer London and Essex. Despite this, the report proposes that four of the five centres should be in inner London, with only one centre for the whole of Essex. I can think of no better recipe for ensuring that a large number of people have to travel excessively long distances, and unnecessarily so.

Secondly, the original report was littered with errors —I have counted more than a dozen. The authority should be ashamed of that report, on reflection. It was wrongly claimed, for instance, that at Oldchurch hospital there was no planning computer or simulator. This is important, because the report referred to just such equipment to demonstrate the inadequacy of the treatment at Oldchurch hospital. However, both these pieces of equipment have been in use in the hospital for some time.

The estimates of the incidence of cancer in the North-East Thames area do not tally with those of the Office of Population Centres and Surveys, and, perhaps most important, the report's estimates of the times taken for journeys to the new centre are at best hopelessly inadequate, and in some cases simply untrue. This is, for many people, arguably the centre of the opposition of the report.

I have already said that it is expected that 90 per cent. of the people in the Havering and Barking district will be expected to travel to Broomfield. What will they face if they travel that way? The district health report says that if patients go by car from Barking to Broomfield they will take approximately 70 minutes in the most favourable traffic conditions. In the morning, late afternoon and early evening, travelling times can be very much longer.

By bus, people may go from Barking to Romford, taking 40 minutes, and then from Romford to Chelmsford —an hourly service—which will take approximately 55 minutes, forgetting the time that it takes to wait for the bus. The journey to Broomfield from Chelmsford is another 15 to 20 minutes, followed by a quarter of a mile to the hospital. The cost for that is £3·25 return. If they go by rail, simply from Romford to Chelmsford takes a half to three quarters of an hour, and then they have to get to Broomfield. If they come from Barking or Dagenham, they have to get to Romford first. The cost merely of going from Romford to Chelmsford is £3·80.

Hon. Members may wonder why I am quoting the cost, but pensioner constituents from Havering or Barking travelling outside London find that their concessionary fares do not operate, and they now incur an expense where one was not incurred before. I hope that hon. Members will recognise that that is a not unimportant factor for cancer patients, many of whom are elderly. The report specifically mentions, no doubt to recognise the excessive weight of travel, the provision of some 100 hostel beds at the Broomfield hospital. The implication of hostel beds that was made in the 1980 report has now been made a reality.

Hostel beds are no substitute for service at a local hospital near where one lives. I quote the Barking and Havering local medical committee, which says:

> "Cancer sufferers particularly require the support of their families as a very important adjunct to the high technology therapy provided by the Cancer Treatment Centres and this can best be provided if the patient, while undergoing active treatment, and after treatment, can live at home with family and friends around. This support cannot be maintained in a hostel setting several miles from home with difficult access by public transport."

It is not even equality of patient care.

Let us look, as I hope my hon. Friend will do, at the actual cost. I quote again from the community health council submission:

> "The actual cost of providing a six week course of treatment at Oldchurch is approximately £100 per week—a far more economic way than by means of hostel treatment plus the necessary treatment at a centre elsewhere."

All this is for patients who, by the very nature of their illness, are facing treatment that is debilitating and tiring and which, perhaps more than the treatment for many other illnesses, requires them to be treated close to where they live, rather than engage in unnecessary and lengthy transport. In the words of the report, Oldchurch hospital is the only centrally located regional cancer unit within the North-East Thames region. It is exceedingly well served by road and public transport, whether bus or rail, from virtually anywhere within Barking and Havering.

The hospital has a department which works closely with the neurosurgical, gynaecological and ENT departments, all of which are at present on the Oldchurch site, and none of which as yet exist on the Broomfield site. Hon. Members who were present at a lobby here a few months ago will remember how consultants stressed the importance of the link between such departments and the treatment of cancer service, not least because often patients who attend one department are found to have potential cancer needs, and vice versa. It is important that we take advantage of the existence of those departments on the present site.

The report states that attention should be given to the need to specialise for certain rarer types of cancer treatment. Hon. Members recognise that need, but let it not be at the price of requiring the large majority of patients who are suffering from the more common forms of illness to travel long distances. It does not have to lead to that. To suggest that specialisation requires the closure of local hospitals is a false and misleading theory.

Oldchurch is a much loved and supported hospital. The voluntary support which sustains it is considerable. Last Thursday the radiotherapy unit took delivery of a new £1,500 computer which was bought entirely from voluntary funds. That is a tiny fraction of the £45,000 collected by a prominent local personality, Mrs. Nellie Sims, from outside her local florist shop, all of which has gone to provide equipment or furniture for the unit. Those figures give an indication of the popularity of the hospital and the way in which the community supports the existence of the present unit.

Since May an appeal has been launched for £1 million to buy a body scanner for the hospital. The appeal is headed by Steve Davis — a well-known international snooker player. In seven months the appeal has raised £250,000, and by Easter those concerned expect to order the scanner. Those are tremendous sums and are a great tribute to the community. That would not happen if the hospital were not regarded as an integral part of the community.

Time will not permit me to go into all the alternatives. The district authority has submitted plans for an enlargement of the Oldchurch site, which should be considered closely as a more credible and reasonable alternative. I welcome steps to increase the funding for radiotherapy in the North-East Thames region in general, but not at the price of closing Oldchurch hospital.

I have two personal reasons for feeling strongly about the matter. My father-in-law has just finished a course of treatment at the radiotherapy unit and, like all other patients at the unit, is full of praise for the care and attention which he received. I would hate to see him at 77 having to spend such a large amount of time each and every day for five or six weeks travelling backwards and forwards on long journeys unnecessarily. Similarly, I would object on behalf of all my constituents who faced a similar journey.

Secondly, my hon. Friend the Member for Romford and I remember standing out in the cold on Budget day 1980 to receive the petition organised by, among others, a lovely and vivacious lady called Brenda King, herself a cancer sufferer. We undertook to do what we could to save the radiotherapy unit at that time and we succeeded. A year or two later, Brenda King died. She is commemorated by a stone at the hospital, but the best commemoration for her would be not just for us to see off the threat to our local unit once again, but for my hon. Friend the Minister and the regional health authority to find a way to remove the periodic threat faced by a local service which, as I hope that I have shown in this short debate, is needed, is well supported and must continue.

The Parliamentary Under-Secretary of State for Health and Social Security (Mr. Ray Whitney): I congratulate my hon. Friend the Member for Hornchurch (Mr. Squire) on taking the opportunity of the first Adjournment debate of 1986, on a day which has been of considerable interest in the House, to raise a subject of crucial importance and concern not only to my hon. Friend and his constituents but to a number of other Members present today and their constituents. Following the exchange in the House on 10 December, when I answered a question from the hon. Member for Tottenham (Mr. Atkinson), I am aware that the subject has caused a great deal of controversy not only in Essex but in north-east London. I also look forward to the Adjournment debate on Wednesday when my hon. Friend the Member for Rochford (Dr. Clark) will be discussing the future of the radiotherapy unit at Southend. If, in the time available to me today I am unable to cover all the points raised by my hon. Friend the Member for Hornchurch, I hope to do so in writing after the debate.

It is important to place the issue in perspective and I am grateful for this opportunity to do so as we must all take careful account of the concern caused by the North-East Thames regional health authority's review of cancer services. Some of the reactions in the region generally, and perhaps in my hon. Friend's constituency, have involved a certain amount of misconception about what is at stake. It is right that the issues at stake should be debated fully, but we must set the terms of that debate on a fair, clear and sound basis, as my hon. Friend the Member for Hornchurch sought to do in his contribution today.

Mr. Frank Dobson (Holborn and St. Pancras): Not on the Coopers report.

Mr. Whitney: The hon. Gentleman may have his own views about that report, but I am responding to the contribution of my hon. Friend the Member for Hornnchurch to today's debate.

First, we must consider the motives that led the regional health authority to decide upon a reveiw of its cancer services. I am sure that my hon. Friend recognises that it was not a matter of looking for savings as a result of some financial straitjacket. My hon. Friend will appreciate the considerable expansion that has taken place nationally with the devotion of an increase of some 20 per cent. in real resources to the Health Service generally, supplemented in the coming financial year by an increase significantly higher than the projected rate of inflation. That is a reflection of the concern manifested by the Government and by the Department in providing adequate health services.

Cost-cutting was not the purpose of this project. The aim was to consider the way in which services, including radiotherapy, were provided for people suffering from cancer and to ascertain the methods available to the region to improve their quality. That was the mainspring of the exercise.

It is not for me to judge whether the report got the project right. I hope that hon. Members agree that setting such a review in motion was a justifiable venture by the regional health authority. The need was clearly set out in the regional strategic plan, which was published in July 1984. I hope that hon. Members agree that it must be right for regional health authorities constantly to take hard looks at the services they provide, or services will stagnate and we shall not improve patient care.

The proposals involved in these reviews are often unsettling and difficult to accept. We should as a principle recognise at the start that it must be right for the Health Service and the health authorities to debate these issues. There cannot be a sensible and constructive debate if we instinctively attribute reasons for a proposed change to a desire to save money. I hope that my hon. Friend the Member for Hornchurch recognises that.

Mr. Dobson: Will the hon. Gentleman give way?

Mr. Whitney: I recognise that the hon. Gentleman will always achieve that particular misattribution. I hope that he will be brief.

Mr. Dobson: I think that I speak for hon. Members on both sides of the House. I have heard no one suggest that this exercise is intended to save funds. I think that the concern in north-east London and in Essex is that the exercise is based on an extremely shoddy, second-rate and inaccurate estimate of people's needs. No one is accusing the health authority of trying to save funds.

Mr. Whitney: If we have achieved acceptance by the hon. Member for Holborn and St. Pancras (Mr. Dobson) that in this instance it is not a matter of saving funds, we have already made progress in the debate.

The report argues the medical case for concentrating specialised cancer services, including radiotherapy, in specialised centres. It believes that that would improve the quality of care and service provided to patients. Is the report right in proposing that the north-east Thames region needs five such specialised centres, compared with the present nine radiotherapy units? More controversially, if there is agreement on five of these specialised centres, where should they be located? I note the point made by my hon. Friend the Member for Hornchurch about the concentration in London, leaving just one centre in Essex. The report maintains that its proposals would improve services to patients in the whole region.

These are intrinsically difficult issues. They are not made more difficult or controversial by the report.

One of the points that always arises is that of accessibility. Many of the services required by cancer patients can and should be provided in every district, as my hon. Friend said. As I understand it, the report is clear on that point. More specialised services cannot be provided, not because there are insufficient resources but because it does not make medical sense to provide them.

Services such as radiotherapy must be established to serve a relatively large population so as to attract sufficient patients to enable clinicians to sustain and develop their expertise. If there is too wide a dispersal of facilities and staff such expertise is not developed, and that is detrimental to good patient care.

The issue in the case of North-East Thames is not just the number of centres but their location. In an ideal world, everyone would have immediate access to all the services that they need. For the reasons that I have given, that would not be medically feasible, even if we had unlimited financial resources.

With specialist care we must draw the balance between poorer access to a more distant but potentially better service. Those are the issues raised in the report. It is not for me to judge the arguments for or against those or any other points. The position is clear. As my hon. Friend said, the report was put out to public consultation in September 1985 and the comments ended on 31 December 1985.

The health authority's working party has now been charged with reviewing the report, and its findings will be considered in the spring by the authority. I have no doubt that the points made so effectively by my hon. Friend will be taken fully into account when the authority comes to consider the report and the working party's findings.

Should the region agree to changes in the way that cancer services are provided—either those recommended in the report or those arising after full consultation and debate—there will then be, as my hon. Friend is aware, full local consultation in the usual way. If the proposals for changes or closures are opposed by the relevant community health councils the matter will be referred for a decision via the region to my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State.

The views of the Barking, Havering and Brentwood DHA to any proposal to change the nature, size or location of the specialised care currently given at Oldchurch hospital will plainly be important. The RHA will no doubt pay close attention to them. The location of regional specialty services has however to be discussed on a wider basis to see what is finally in the best interests of all the region's patients. The effect on the hospital as a whole of any proposed closure of the Oldchurch hospital unit will need to be assessed. It would not be appropriate for me to prejudge the issue except to say that there are innumerable district general hospitals which do not have this service.

I am sure that the regional health authority will take full account of the worries that have been expressed, but I hope that my hon. Friends will convey to their constituents, who are anxious—I recognise the depth of their anxiety—that as I understand it this proposal was designed for and committed to the improvement of those vital services and to the development of specialised cancer treatment services within the region and the area. I hope that the debate will be carried forward on a firm understanding of the principles and without——

Oral Answers to Questions

DEFENCE

Nuclear Tests (Compensation)

1. Mr. Ron Davies asked the Secretary of State for Defence if he has any plans to review the provisions under which former service personnel could pursue a claim following injury in United Kingdom nuclear tests.

9. Mr. Terry Lewis asked the Secretary of State for Defence whether he has plans to seek to compensate ex-service men and women for ill-health arising from nuclear tests.

The Minister of State for Defence Procurement (Mr. Norman Lamont): Section 10 of the Crown Proceedings Act 1947, which bars such claims, is currently under review. However, it is open to former service personnel who believe that they have suffered injury which is attributable to service to apply to the Department of Health and Social Security for a war disablement pension. Nevertheless, it remains the Government's view that no one was harmed as a result of exposure to ionising radiation from the United Kingdom test programme. The matter will be reviewed when the results of the National Radiological Protection Board survey are available later this year.

Mr. Davies: Is it not clear, particularly as a result of the findings and recommendations of the Australian Royal Commission, that significant numbers of British ex-service men who served in the Pacific were unnecessarily exposed to nuclear radiation? Is there not a clear moral responsibility on the Government to waive the provisions of section 10 to allow compensation to be paid to those people whose health is suffering?

Mr. Lamont: There were 202 different conclusions in the report, and they require careful study. We have had some meetings at official level with the Australian Government. Later this month the Foreign Secretary and I will meet Senator Evans, the Australian Minister of Energy and Natural Resources, and we shall discuss the findings of the commission.

Mr. Lewis: Is the Secretary of State aware that there is a stong feeling among ex-service men that the NRPB submission is just another delaying tactic? If the Government are serious about the matter, as they should be, they should initiate their own commission of inquiry, as the Australians have done.

Mr. Lamont: The Government are serious about the matter. I hope that the NRPB survey findings will be available in the autumn. I take the matters that have been raised extremely seriously, but in order to assess the possibility of illness and death resulting from the tests we must have a proper survey of those who were involved in them.

Mr. Holt: My hon. Friend may take note of whether our ex-service men have nuclear disease, but is he aware that the council in Middlesbrough will not employ people who were long-serving personnel in our armed forces?

Mr. Lamont: I have listened to what my hon. Friend has said, and that seems most extraordinary.

Mr. Alton: In view of what the Minister has said about a proper survey, why does he not extend the NRPB survey to examine the genetic effects on the children of service men who were involved in the tests?

Mr. Lamont: The NRPB survey could be extended in many ways, but, as it is presently defined, it will enable us to establish whether people were adversely affected by the tests. We can then decide on the appropriate action.

Mr. Harrison: Will the survey, when sending a questionnaire to the families of the 20,000 personnel, both military and civilian, take into account the fact that many of them are dead? I have been looking into the matter, and I am not satisfied. Is the Minister satisfied with the survey as it has been carried out?

Mr. Lamont: A questionnaire is not being sent to the 20,000 people. Obviously information is available about the health records of those people, and that is what the survey will be based on. The right hon. Gentleman has tabled questions about that before, and I have taken them seriously. I am satisfied that the survey will give us the information that is necessary to reach a proper and considered conclusion. We do care about the matter.

Strategic Defence Initiative

2. Mr. D. E. Thomas asked the Secretary of State for Defence what military spin-off he expects from the strategic defence initiative research; and if he will make a statement.

The Secretary of State for Defence (Mr. George Younger): I have nothing to add to the statement that my predecessor made to the House on 9 December.

Mr. Thomas: Does the new Secretary of State for Defence, whom I am sure we all welcome to the Dispatch Box, agree with the view of the United States Secretary of Defence that deterrence is a mutual suicide pact? Does he agree with him also that the world needs to be released from the shadow of nuclear destruction? If so, does he believe that the pursuit of research into verifiable measures of nuclear disarmament is preferable, cheaper, and likely to be more effective than the pursuit of the technological fixed dream of SDI?

Mr. Younger: I am grateful to the hon. Gentleman for his good wishes. The point is that the research will continue in any case, and the fact that we in Britain have an opportunity to take part in it can only be to our advantage. It remains the main part of our policy to pursue the reduction of armaments in every way we can.

Sir Antony Buck: I congratulate my right hon. Friend on his first appearance at the Dispatch Box as Secretary of State for Defence and wish him a long and happy tenure of office in that job. Does he agree that the spin-offs from projects such as this are incalculable, and that the spin-offs are always much more considerable than the accepted wisdom?

Mr. Younger: I am grateful to my hon. and learned Friend for his welcome, which I greatly appreciate. It is important for us all to realise that the spin-off effects are not merely in the area to which they are addressed—that is to say, research into systems in space—but that they have important connotations for conventional defence and civilian use.

Mr. James Lamond: When the research eventually comes to an end, will we be given the complete results? Will we be treated by President Reagan with the same generosity as he has promised to treat the Soviet Union?

Mr. Younger: It will be a long time before the reasearch upon which we are embarking in conjunction with the United States comes to any sort of an end. At that time, it will be for all the Governments concerned to consider what should be published.

Mr. Dickens: Is there any chance, however remote, that SDI research will lead to helicopters being obsolescent?

Mr. Younger: I do not think that the research is addressing itself to that question.

Mr. Denzil Davies: I welcome the right hon. Gentleman to his office of Secretary of State for Defence. He will know, as the House knows, that he is the fourth incumbent of that office in a period of about five and a half years, and, with such an attrition rate, I hope that he has cleared all his answers with the Cabinet Office.

Dare I ask him whether the view that he is expressing on SDI is a collective view, or an ad hoc view, by the Government? Does he agree with what President Reagan said in his famous star wars speech, that nuclear weapons were immoral, or do the Government agree with the critics, including the Foreign Secretary, who see star wars as an escalation of the arms race, destabilising, and having turned NATO's nuclear strategy completely upside down?

Mr. Younger: I am grateful to the right hon. Gentleman for his kind words, which I greatly appreciate. He said that I am the fourth incumbent of this office, but in my last office I was the only incumbent for six and a half years, so perhaps there is a balance there.

All the answers that I give will be Government policy generally. I agree with what President Reagan has always made clear, that this is a matter of pursuing research that will be pursued anyway, and it is most important that we should have a part in it.

3. Mr. Meadowcroft asked the Secretary of State for Defence what evaluation his Department has made of the feasibility of the strategic defence initiative as a defence system.

11. Mr. Beith asked the Secretary of State for Defence what assessment Her Majesty's Government make of the attainability of the objectives originally set by President Reagan for the strategic defence initiative.

Mr. Younger: The United States SDI is a long-term research programme intended to investigate the technical feasibility of defences against ballistic missiles. It would be premature at this stage to form judgments about the outcome of the research.

Mr. Meadowcroft: I associate the Liberal Bench with the welcome to the Secretary of State and express the wish that he is as helpful inside the Cabinet as his predecessor now is outside the Cabinet. Given that the bedrock of the deterrence theory, according to its adherents, is the ability of both sides to inflict devastating damage, and that the aim of SDI is to make one side invulnerable to that devastating damage, does not SDI undermine the theory of deterrence?

Mr. Younger: I am grateful to the hon. Gentleman and his colleagues for their good wishes, which I greatly appreciate.

As for his other point, as my right hon. Friend has made very clear on numerous occasions, one of the principal objectives of the SDI research programme is to enhance, not to reduce, deterrence. I hope very much that it will do that.

Mr. Beith: Did not the President of the United States make it quite clear that his basis for accepting SDI was that it could render nuclear weapons obsolete by creating an impenetrable shield against all offensive weapons? If that cannot be attained—and nobody in the United States now seems to believe that it can—does not SDI become an expensive, unnecessary and provocative addition to our deterrent?

Mr. Younger: That is the whole purpose of embarking upon research in the first place. Until that research has been brought to fruition, which will take a long time, we shall not know whether it is capable of achieving its main objective, which is to devise a system that will make nuclear weapons obsolescent. I should have thought that all of us would approve of that objective.

Mr. Wilkinson: I, too, congratulate my right hon. Friend upon his appointment. Does he agree that the more awesome the weapons of mass destruction that are ranged against us by the Soviet Union, the more important it is for scientists on this side of the Atlantic, as in the United States, to carry out research into potential defences against them?

Mr. Younger: I strongly agree with my hon. Friend that it is important from those points of view. When one adds to that the fact that this research will take place somewhere anyway, surely all of us who have any interest in this country's high technology industry should be glad that we are to have some part in it.

Mr. Maclean: Is it not a fact that for many years the Soviet Union has had a massive SDI programme of its own, killer satellites being merely one example? Is it not misleading for Opposition politicians and others to give the impression that the West and NATO are breaking new ground by taking the SDI initiative? Surely we should be doing this in order to keep up with what the Soviet Union has been doing for years.

Mr. Younger: I agree with my hon. Friend. The Soviet Union has indeed been carrying out investigations in this area for a very long time. I am quite baffled by the theory that seems to be put forward by the Opposition that, despite that, we ought to have nothing to do with it. That seems to me to be a suicidal course.

Mr. Tony Lloyd: Is the Secretary of State aware of United States studies which suggest that laser technology, which can be used as an anti-ballistic missile system, can also be used as an offensive system to create fires within Soviet cities? Does the Secretary of State accept that if that is the case, those weapons, far from enhancing deep deterrence, are very dangerous, because they will escalate the production of offensive armaments?

Mr. Younger: I have seen newspaper reports to that effect, but at this stage there is no hard evidence that research has established any such fact. If it did, it would be a new matter that would have to be considered afresh.

Mr. Chris Smith: Has the new Secretary of State for Defence yet had a chance to read the letter—not marked confidential—that was sent to the Prime Minister in October 1985 by 60 leading advanced information technology scientists at Imperial college, saying that any conceivable star wars technology was not feasible? If the Secretary of State has read that letter, what is his response to it?

Mr. Younger: I have heard about that letter, but I have not yet had a chance to read it. I shall certainly study it with care.

European Fighter Aircraft

4. Mr. Robert Atkins asked the Secretary of State for Defence if he will make a statement on the current position on the European fighter programme.

Mr. Norman Lamont: As I explained to my hon. Friend on 22 October last, excellent progress has been made since agreement was reached in the summer between the United Kingdom, Germany, Italy and Spain to proceed with the further definition and refinement of the European fighter aircraft programme. Work on the project definition phase is now well under way and a report is expected from industry next summer.

Mr. Atkins: I thank my hon. Friend for his reply. In the interests of my constituents and many others who are working on this programme, will my hon. Friend take this opportunity to confirm that other events in the aerospace industry will not make any impact upon this programme, which is so important to jobs and to European co-operation in industry and defence?

Mr. Lamont: I can confirm that. The Government remain firmly committed to carrying on with the EFA project definition. We believe that collaboration in this area is extremely important.

Dr. Hampson: Does not this programme offer the greatest across-the-board possibilities and opportunities for British industry that we have seen for generations? Does not the logic of a hands-off approach to our defence contractors mean that British Aerospace should support an American licence to build an American fighter?

Mr. Lamont: The Government do not adopt a hands-off approach to defence procurement. The Government wish to be assured that their requirements can be met from the private sector. As my hon. Friend knows, the Government were closely involved in this matter.

As my hon. Friend said, the project offers tremendous opportunities for British industry, particularly in subsystems and components.

Mr. McNamara: With regard to the other European venture that has collapsed, or appears to be collapsing, with the help of the Government, is it not in the subsectors —avionics and other matters—that British industry will be hurt? Is not one of the consequences of the Government's present attitude that British firms working on those systems will be badly bitten, as Sikorsky supplies them? Why should the European national armaments directors believe the Government any more? After all, we have only a memorandum of understanding; we do not even have a firm contract.

Mr. Lamont: I am strongly tempted to answer the hon. Gentleman, but that matter does not arise out of the question on the Order Paper.

Lord James Douglas-Hamilton: At what stage does my hon. Friend expect that contracts for work on the European fighter will be awarded to suppliers in different countries?

Mr. Lamont: The evaluation of the project definition phase will not be available until next summer. Contracts will follow thereafter. Of course, some work is being done at the moment.

Strategic Defence Initiative

5. Mr. Dalyell asked the Secretary of State for Defence if he will make a statement on his Department's discussions with members of the department of artificial intelligence and other scientists at the University of Edinburgh on research under the strategic defence initiative.

Mr. Younger: Ministry of Defence officials met Dr. Thompson from the department of artificial intelligence, Edinburgh university, on 20 December to discuss various aspects of the strategic defence initiative.

Mr. Dalyell: The Secretary of State will know from his previous incarnation that the department of artificial intelligence in Edinburgh is one of the most distinguished in the world. How, then, does he answer the point put by Dr. Henry Thompson and his colleagues who say, as do scientists at Imperial college, that the scheme can never come to fruition? In the absence of a spare planet, which the Ministry of Defence presumably does not have, how is the testing to be done? Unless there is a spare planet, there is no way that the scheme can be tested.

Mr. Younger: The discussions with Dr. Thompson have been fulfilled, as my predecessor undertook that they would be. Dr. Thompson and his colleagues are entitled to their view, but that does not alter the fact that the research will go on in any case, and if this country is involved there will be considerable spin-off effects, both civilian and military. We should be foolish to turn our backs on it.

Mr. Ashdown: Is the right hon. Gentleman aware that I gather that the same scientists have suggested that the computer system to run the SDI would have to be hundreds of times more powerful than the current NORAD early warning system? Is he aware that that system crashes every 30 seconds on average and has never worked for longer than half an hour? Why is the Secretary of State diverting a precious part of our human resources in computer research to this ridiculous red herring?

Mr. Younger: The point of the research is to find out whether the scheme is feasible and, if so, how. We should bear in mind that views are strongly held by individuals all over the place and they do not necessarily affect the views of a university or a department as a whole.

Submarines (Orders)

6. Mr. Douglas asked the Secretary of State for Defence if he will make a statement on the placing of orders for conventional and nuclear submarines in British shipyards.

The Parliamentary Under-Secretary of State for Defence Procurement (Mr. John Lee): Orders were placed on 3 January 1986 for three Upholder class submarines and one Trafalgar class SSN. A tender has been received for the first of the Trident boats and is being evaluated. The precise order date has yet to be determined.

Mr. Douglas: I am disappointed that the Secretary of State is not answering this question. When he was Secretary of State for Scotland he gave a clear indication during Scottish Question Time, just before the recess, that a Scottish yard would receive a submarine order. We in Scotland are extremely disappointed that the Ministry has left itself open to a monopolistic supplier, which is conducive to the privatisation of that yard. Will the Minister give us an undertaking about what value we can put on the Trafalgar House bid for some of the Trident steel work?

Mr. Lee: The hon. Gentleman is very wrong in his first suggestion, and totally wrong in his second suggestion. The placing of the order had nothing to do with the privatisation programme.

The competition was a great success. There was a saving of about £20 million — about half because of batch ordering and about half because of the competition. We hope and believe that at least one other yard will be able to compete for future SSK orders.

Mrs. McCurley: I acknowledge that the acceptance of the lowest tender for any contract is a good principle, but, in the case of Cammell Laird, will my hon. Friend carefully scrutinise the rather over-optimistic prices that have been offered for the award of the submarine contract? Will he carefully study that contract over the next few years?

Mr. Lee: I understand my hon. Friend's deep anxiety over the Scott Lithgow yard, but all tenders are and will be carefully scrutinised. Cammell Laird won the competition on a true and open basis.

Dr. Godman: Is the Minister aware that on 26 November 1985 his hon. Friend the Minister of State for Defence Procurement told the House that it was the Government's intention that there should be a number of submarine yards and that Vickers had a monopoly not of conventional but of nuclear submarines? Does he agree, in the light of the placing of the order with Vickers, and hence the conferment of monopoly powers on that company, that that decision sharply contradicts what the Minister of State said on 26 November?

Mr. Lee: With respect, while I understand the hon. Gentleman's anxiety, that does not contradict what my hon. Friend the Minister of State said. I repeat that; there has been competition for the SSK orders. We believe that there will also be satisfactory competition in the future, so there is no question of a monopoly.

Mr. Forth: Will my hon. Friend assure the House that in the placing of such orders, and, indeed, orders for all military equipment, overriding importance will be attached to quality and price and that there will be no artificial constraints placed on orders, geographically or in any other way?

Mr. Lee: I can assure my hon. Friend that competition is very much the order of the day. Nevertheless, there are times when we have to take into account wider and relevant factors.

Mr. O'Neill: The Minister must appreciate the widespread disappointment felt in Scotland, which the Secretary of State echoed, when the announcement was made. Deepening suspicion and cynicism are felt because everyone knows that this is merely a matter of fattening up Vickers before privatisation. There is the added cynicism that the price that the people at Cammell Laird were able to quote was possible because they were able to obtain information from Vickers at Barrow about the target figure that they would have to meet. There is little chance of competitive tendering if there is only one supplier, because the other one will be on its last legs if orders are not provided.

Mr. Lee: Most of the hon. Gentleman's suggestions are, with the greatest respect, unworthy of him. There is no question of placing the orders with Cammell Laird and Vickers because of the privatisation programme.

Mr. Wilson: In view of the insignificant share of defence orders that Scotland received in the last announcement, has the Minister's right hon. Friend issued instructions that steps should be taken within the Ministry of Defence to find more work for Scotland because of our substantial unemployment problem?

Mr. Lee: My right hon. Friend plainly understands the needs of Scotland, because of his former position, but he will be completely open and fair-minded in the placing of future orders.

Nimrod Programmes

7. Mr. Soames asked the Secretary of State for Defence when the Nimrod programmes will be completed.

Mr. Norman Lamont: The Nimrod maritime reconnaissance mark 2 programme will be completed this year. The completion date for the Nimrod airborne early warning mark 3 programme will depend on the outcome of the current negotiations with GEC Avionics Ltd. and on consequent decisions as to the best way to take the project forward.

Mr. Soames: In view of its disgraceful history and the length of time that this programme has taken to complete, what sanctions does my hon. Friend have in mind if the contractors fail to meet the due date this time?

Mr. Lamont: It would not be right for me to disclose what we might do, because we are negotiating with GEC on this matter. We wish to obtain a fixed price contract for the completion of the project to an acceptable operating standard and also within a short time.

We entirely agree with my hon. Friend that the progress of this project has been profoundly unsatisfactory.

Mr. Robert C. Brown: Does the Minister honestly believe in his original answer that the programme will be finished this year?

Mr. Lamont: I think that the hon. Gentleman misheard my answer.

Mr. Beaumont-Dark: Does my hon. Friend agree that instead of concentrating on spoiling some other project at Westlands, GEC would be better advised to concentrate on giving the shareholders and the country better value for the hundreds of millions of pounds that the Nimrod contract has so far cost, without the aeroplane flying successfully? Has not the time come for the company to concentrate on giving taxpayers value for what they have paid for?

Mr. Lamont: As is well known, this project is nearly five years late. The original cost at 1986 prices was some £856 million. Already, £874 million has been spent on this project and it does not work to a satisfactory standard. We take this matter seriously, but it is one that we shall have to sort out in negotiation with the company. It is in no doubt about the seriousness with which the Secretary of State and myself regard this project.

Helensburgh (Incident)

Mr. Janner asked the Secretary of State for Defence in what circumstances a Ministry of Defence decontamination squad attended the scene of the accident involving a military convoy at Helensburgh on 20 June.

Mr. Stanley: In relation to the circumstances of the accident to which the hon. and learned Gentleman refers, I cannot add to the reply that I gave to the hon. Member for Edinburgh, East (Mr. Strang) on 15 July last year.

Mr. Janner: Accepting, as presumably the Minister does, that this transport was carrying nuclear weapons, that there was an accident and that the decontamination squad was available, what reassurance, if any, is the Minister prepared to give to the public that if there is an accident involving nuclear weapons en route, satisfactory provision will be made to deal with a potentially dangerous situation?

Mr. Stanley: As the hon. and learned Member and the House know, it is the policy of this Government, like that of all our predecessors, neither to confirm nor to deny the presence of nuclear weapons. On the generality, I can assure the hon. and learned Gentleman that under successive Governments there have been detailed arrangements on a contingency basis for responding to any nuclear accident that might occur.

Type 23 Vessels

10. Mr. Merchant asked the Secretary of State for Defence if he will make a statement on future orders for type 23 ships.

Mr. Lee: Tenders have been received for the next three type 23 frigates and these are being evaluated, but the precise size and timing of any orders have yet to be determined.

Mr. Merchant: In view of the excellent record of the defence industries on the Tyne, will my hon. Friend give urgent attention to providing orders for Swan Hunter and other yards on the Tyne? Will he also take the opportunity to look closely at the Vickers Valkyr APC, which is manufactured by Vickers on the Tyne, and which could provide excellent service for the Army?

Mr. Lee: I shall certainly look into the latter point. On my hon. Friend's first point, I have to say that the Ministry of Defence is not in the business of providing orders for any particular yard. I emphasise that these days we place orders on the basis of competition, and in our warship yards, fortunately, we have substantial competition.

Mr. Campbell-Savours: Are any aspects of the original decision to reject the S90 short, fat ship in favour of the type 23 officially secret—apart from the weapons system and information on the weapons system?

Mr. Lee: The hon. Member asks about the S90. All the options were exhaustively examined in 1983, and I have nothing to add to the statement that I made to the House on 1 November 1983. The way for the Ministry of Defence to make sure that it gets value for money is to proceed with the design that it has, and we shall accordingly be starting to order follow-on type 23 ships this year. I cannot comment on Admiral Hill-Norton's report until it is received and I have had an opportunity to study it. My Department has offered assistance to the committee.

Mr. Colvin: Will my hon. Friend confirm that, following receipt of the Hill-Norton report and his study of it, he will carry out a review of the procedures under which decisions on ship design are made?

Mr. Lee: I take my hon. Friend's request.

Mr. O'Neill: Will the Minister confirm that the Government are still committed to a 50-warship navy? The present rate of ordering means that we will be far short of that number by the end of the decade unless something happens quickly.

Mr. Lee: I can assure the hon. Gentleman and the House that there has been no change in the Government's intention to maintain a force of about 50 escort vessels.

Mr. Wallace: Does not the apparent delay in placing the orders for type 23 frigates and the delays in buying essential new equipment for other services, which is leading to a drop in morale in the services, indicate that there is a need for an overall defence review? Will his right hon. Friend, who is a new broom in the Ministry of Defence, set about instituting such a review?

Mr. Lee: With great respect, I do not know how the hon. Gentleman can say that. Ten days or a fortnight ago we placed about £1 billion worth of naval orders.

Mr. McQuarrie: Although I accept what my hon. Friend has said about competition for the type 23, may I ask whether he agrees that the efficient and skilled work force at Scott Lithgow in Gourock on the lower Clyde must be considered in the context of maintaining it if we are to develop Ministry of Defence requirements in the years to come?

Mr. Lee: I understand that, but we have substantial existing capacity in our warship yards. That is the reality under consideration.

Nuclear Weapons (Policy)

12. Mrs. Clwyd asked the Secretary of State for Defence whether Her Majesty's Government's policy on the deployment of nuclear weapons is still based on the concept of mutually assured destruction.

Mr. Stanley: Her Majesty's Government's policy on the deployment of nuclear weapons is based on the strategy of deterrence, which has preserved peace with freedom in western Europe for more than 40 years.

Mrs. Clwyd: Is the Minister aware that as recently as October Mr. Caspar Weinberger stated that mutually assured destruction had not kept the peace for 40 years and would not do so in the future? If the United States no longer believes in that policy, is it not surprising that this Government do?

Mr. Stanley: I assure the hon. Lady that the United States believes as firmly in the policy of deterrence as do this Government. I have some difficulty in noting that the hon. Lady cannot accept the policy of deterrence, given the fact that Labour Governments engaged in an expensive secret programme to enhance the United Kingdom's use of the nuclear deterrent.

Mr. Stokes: Will my right hon. Friend totally ignore the views of the hon. Member for Cynon Valley (Mrs. Clwyd), which are utterly rejected by the vast majority of the British people and will ensure the defeat of the Labour party in the next election?

Mr. Stanley: I assure my hon. Friend that I regard his comments as much more representative of the views of the British people than the comments of the hon. Member for Cynon Valley (Mrs. Clwyd).

Mr. Strang: Does the right hon. Gentleman accept that the deployment of highly accurate counter-force weapons, such as Trident, is destabilising because it creates the fear on the other side that such weapons might be used in a first strike and thus increases the chance of nuclear weapons being used sooner rather than later in a crisis?

Mr. Stanley: I see nothing destabilising in preserving the credibility of the deterrent. That policy was accepted by the Labour Government as well.

Experimental Fighter Aircraft Programme

14. Mr. Stern asked the Secretary of State for Defence whether he is satisfied with the progress of the experimental fighter aircraft programme; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Norman Lamont: The experimental aircraft programme is a technology demonstrator programme which will give us practical experience in the integration of the wide range of new technologies required for new, sophisticated combat aircraft.

Mr. Stern: In view of my hon. Friend's welcome reply earlier to the effect that contracts for part of this programme are likely to come up next summer, will he confirm that all the resources of his Department will be made available where necessary to those British companies which have already been involved in the groundwork, to ensure that they are not negotiated out of a substantial programme?

Mr. Lamont: I can certainly give my hon. Friend that assurance. We have meetings constantly with British industry and invite industry to tell us how we can help further in this programme.

Mr. McNamara: May I refer to the question that I put before? How can our European partners who will be engaged with us in developing the European fighter, which is based on our experience in EAP, depend upon the Government, following their shameful treatment on the helicopter issue?

Mr. Lamont: Our partners can depend absolutely upon the Government. I have already given the commitment that we are thoroughly in favour of continuing with EFA.

Regular Army Reserve

15. Mr. Marlow asked the Secretary of State for Defence what training he intends for the Regular Army Reserve in 1986.

Mr. Stanley: We are planning for up to 500 Regular Reservists to participate in the major BAOR field training exercise later this year. In addition, the new scheme whereby Regular Reservists in their third year of liability are invited to participate in one week refresher training courses at various locations throughout the United Kindgom will be continued during 1986. We shall continue to examine ways of providing further cost-effective training opportunities for those with a Regular Reserve commitment.

Mr. Marlow: What deductions has my right hon. Friend made from the experiences of using the Regular Army Reserve on exercises Lionheart and Brave Defender in the past couple of years? Does he agree that this is an under-utilised resource that is highly cost-effective? Will he look to expand its use?

Mr. Stanley: I can assure my hon. Friend that we have concluded very favourably from the training opportunities that we have provided for the Regular Reservists. We are very glad that my hon. Friend participated in both exercises, Lionheart and Brave Defender. We shall continue to try to find ways to produce cost-effective opportunities for Regular Reservists to engage in more training.

Mr. Conway: Since the Regular Reservists report to Territorial Army sponsoring battalions, is my right hon. Friend happy that the expansion programme for the Territorial Army is on target and is ready to receive those Reservists?

Mr. Stanley: I am glad to be able to tell my hon. Friend that the expansion of the Territorial Army to our target of 86,000 by 1990 is at the moment well on track and that the Territorial Army's strength currently stands at 74,000, compared with only 59,000 when we came to office.

Land Disposal

16. Mr. Andrew MacKay asked the Secretary of State for Defence if he will make a further statement on disposal of Ministry of Defence land.

Mr. Lee: It is the policy of the Ministry of Defence to dispose of land and buildings which are no longer required for defence purposes. Since 1979 the estate has been reduced by almost 28,000 acres.

Mr. MacKay: While I congratulate my hon. Friend on that reply, may I ask whether he is aware that many of us who represent constituencies in the south-east of England will welcome a further disposal of surplus defence land, which will reduce the pressure for housing development land in open countryside in our areas?

Mr. Lee: While I understand my hon. Friend's point, the fact is that, because of our expansion of the Territorial Army and of the cadet forces, together with the development of longer-range weaponry, we are looking to add to the training land for the Army. Obviously, however, when suitable opportunities arise — [Interruption.]—we shall continue to dispose of land.

Mr. Speaker: Order. These are important questions.

RAF Brampton (Fire)

17. Mr. Hanley asked the Secretary of State for Defence what were the costs, probable causes and consequences of the fire at Royal Air Force Brampton on Wednesday 23 October.

Mr. Lee: The fire at Royal Air Force Brampton destroyed the main part of the headquarters building of Royal Air Force support command. This will be replaced at an estimated cost of £1·2 million for temporary accommodation, followed by approximately £4 million more for permanent accommodation. The inquiry into the cause of the fire is not yet complete, but there is no evidence that it was other than accidental. Operational capabilities are unaffected, although some minor administrative difficulties may be experienced until the headquarters organisation can be fully reconstituted in the new accommodation.

Mr. Hanley: Would my hon. Friend not agree that, after two serious fires in the past three years, costing millions of pounds, the security system ought to be more appropriate to the modern age?

Mr. Lee: We are always endeavouring to improve our security.

School Visits

18. Mr. Greenway asked the Secretary of State for Defence how many service personnel are currently involved in information visits to schools; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Lee: Some 155 service personnel are employed either in presentation teams, which can be made available to visit educational establishments, or as school or college liaison officers. In addition, members of the careers information field force staff of all three services make visits to schools from time to time as part of their more general responsibilities.

Mr. Greenway: Bearing in mind the fact that there are 30,000 schools in this country, not to mention a large number of colleges and universities, does my hon. Friend not think that that is an inadequate number to go round schools and other institutions to inform pupils what careers are available to them in the services and the role that our service personnel can play in the defence of our country?

Mr. Lee: Our service personnel do an excellent job. While one would like to have more people allocated to the task, there are manpower pressures.

Mr. Skinner: In view of the fact that the Secretary of State for Defence and his colleagues are up to their necks in business of one kind or another, if the Government find that they cannot allocate sufficient people to carry out a tour of all these areas, may I ask whether the Minister has approached the ex-Secretary of State for Defence, who, seemingly, will have more time on his hands in future, to do the job for them?

Mr. Lee: We are always grateful for contributions from the hon. Gentleman.

Military Schools of Music

19. Mr. Jessel asked the Secretary of State for Defence if, pending the report of the Public Accounts Committee, he will make a statement on the new figures for the costing of military schools of music given in his evidence to the Committee on 4 December by the permanent secretary, Sir Clive Whitmore.

Mr. Lee: The group set up to implement the decision to establish the defence school of music at Deal reported in March 1985 that the estimated construction cost had risen from £5·8 million to £10·6 million. We are now examining the requirement for instruction and buildings in order to bring the cost down to the earlier estimate.

Mr. Jessel: As there is not now much difference between the cost of continuing with the present system and that of setting up a joint services' music school on the coast, will the Government examine carefully the report of the Public Accounts Committee when it is published, and reconsider the view of the previous Secretary of State for Defence, as the high standards of British Army bands, which are the envy of the world—[HON. MEMBERS: "Hear, hear."]—are linked inextricably with the first-class training they receive at Kneller hall, Twickenham?

Mr. Lee: My hon. Friend has obviously struck a welcome note. He has waged a tireless campaign for Kneller hall, and all credit to him. However, there is no change in our fundamental decision to go on a tri-service basis to Deal.

PRIME MINISTER

Engagements

Q1. Mr. Pike asked the Prime Minister if she will list her official engagements for Tuesday 14 January.

The Prime Minister (Mrs. Margaret Thatcher): This morning I had meetings with ministerial colleagues and others. In addition to my duties in this House I shall be having further meetings later today.

Mr. Pike: Will the Prime Minister say why she remained silent about the letter from British Aerospace while the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry misled the House yesterday afternoon?

The Prime Minister: I do not accept that my right hon. and learned Friend misled the House. Indeed, he gave a clear explanation. As the hon. Gentleman is aware from answers that have been given many times by me, it is my practice not to publish exchanges with third parties, nor to reveal them, if they are marked "Private and strictly confidential." I hope that if anyone writes a letter to right hon. and hon. Gentlemen which is marked "Private and strictly confidential", it will not be our practice to flaunt either its existence or contents on the Floor of the House.

Q2. Mr. Squire asked the Prime Minister if she will list her official engagements for Tuesday 14 January.

The Prime Minister: I refer my hon. Friend to the reply that I gave some moments ago.

Mr. Squire: I thank my right hon. Friend for the support that the Government gave to me in reducing secrecy in local government. Will she now review the Official Secrets Act 1911 at national level, especially section 2, in the 75th year of its existence with a view to replacing it with a freedom of information Act?

The Prime Minister: I congratulate my hon. Friend on the passage of his Bill, which is due to come into effect shortly. As he knows, we had one attempt in 1979 at changing the Official Secrets Act because many people found it not to their liking, but that change did not obtain the consent of the House.

Mr. Kinnock: Will the Prime Minister now publish the Westland documents of 4 and 18 October? Since Sir Austin Pearce has now given his permission, will she also publish the letter that she received from British Aerospace yesterday?

The Prime Minister: My Office has been in touch with Sir Austin Pearce. It is my intention to consult him later today. I recognise the importance that the letter has assumed, and I shall consult him about publication.

Q3. Mr. Forth asked the Prime Minister if she will list her official engagements for Tuesday 14 January.

The Prime Minister: I refer my hon. Friend to the reply that I gave some moments ago.

Mr. Forth: Bearing in mind the Government's responsibility for police planning in operational matters, has my right hon. Friend in her quieter moments had time to study the Metropolitan police report on the Tottenham riots? Is she as horrified as I am by the facts in it, and even more horrified at the reaction of mad Bernie Grant and the Haringey council, who accused the police of lying? Will she give the House an assurance that she and her Government will continue to support the police in their work throughout the country in protecting the innocent against the wicked?

The Prime Minister: Yes. I gladly give that assurance. The overwhelming majority of our citizens suppport the police in their difficult task and the very difficult judgments that they have sometimes to make.

Mr. Steel: May I revert to the question asked by the hon. Member for Hornchurch (Mr. Squire)? Does the Prime Minister remember several highly publicised prosecutions in the past few years of public servants for alleged breaches of section 2 of the Official Secrets Act 1911? As, in the past few days, there have been massive breaches of section 2 by members of the Government, will they be prosecuted, or will she declare the section dead?

The Prime Minister: The right hon. Gentleman is aware that prosecutions are not for me. He is also aware that we tried to amend the Official Secrets Act during 1979-80. It went through considerable debate. Many people wanted change, but we have not yet got agreement on what the changes should be.

Q5. Mr. Dover asked the Prime Minister if she will list her official engagements for Tuesday 14 January.

The Prime Minister: I refer my hon. Friend to the reply that I gave some moments ago.

Mr. Dover: On the question of the Channel link, will my right hon. Friend assure the House that the Government will make a decision for one of the schemes as put forward, without changing it or the composition of any promoting group?

The Prime Minister: Negotiations about the Channel fixed link are continuing. I can only tell my hon. Friend that it is likely that we shall have to consider how far it would benefit users and be able to attract the finance necessary for the link.

Q6. Mr. Allen McKay asked the Prime Minister if she will list her official engagements for Tuesday 14 January.

The Prime Minister: I refer my hon. Friend to the reply that I gave some moments ago.

Mr. McKay: In reply to my right hon. Friend the Leader of the Opposition, the Prime Minister said that she would make public the letter to which he referred. Will she also give an assurance that she will make available to us the letters of 4 and 18 October?

The Prime Minister: I cannot necessarily agree to the latter part of what the hon. Gentleman said. I made it clear that my Office is in touch with Sir Austin Pearce. I intend to consult him later today about the possibility of the publication of those letters, because I recognise that they have become a major issue and that the House is likely to wish to see their publication in time for the debate tomorrow.

Mr. Moynihan: Is my right hon. Friend aware of NALGO's blacking of my constituency correspondence with Lewisham council's housing department whereby an unrepresentative minority trade union clique is abusing its extraordinary power over Lewisham council, completely without regard for the damage to the interests of my constituents? Does my right hon. Friend agree that what is at stake here is a matter of principle, which should be of the utmost concern to hon. Members on both sides of the House?

The Prime Minister: I fully agree with my hon. Friend and understand that genuine concern has been expressed in all parts of the House when the matter has been raised before. It is quite wrong for correspondence to be hindered in this way, and fundamentally against democracy. We all wish my hon. Friend well in ending this offence.

Q7. Mr. Flannery asked the Prime Minister if she will list her official engagements for Tuesday 14 January.

The Prime Minister: I refer the hon. Gentleman to the reply that I gave some moments ago.

Mr. Flannery: If the Prime Minister has now been given permission to publish the contents of the letter from Sir Austin Pearce and British Aerospace, why does she need to have any further conversations with him? Is she worrying about something? Is there something that she has to hide? Why does she not publish the letter, having been given permission? There is no need for further discussion when the whole House—even those crowing behind her—want to know what is in the letter.

The Prime Minister: With respect, I think that I have probably answered this question several times, but let me repeat the reply. The letter was marked "Private and strictly confidential". It is my invariable practice not to reveal publicly such correspondence without the permission of its author. It will continue to be my practice, because I think that that is the right procedure. I hope that it will be the practice of other right hon. and hon. Members. I therefore indicated—I have not yet replied to the letter, my Office has been in touch with Sir Austin—that it is my intention to consult Sir Austin later today about the possibility of publication. I know that the House will wish to have it published by tomorrow. It is my intention to be in touch about that.

Mr. Whitfield: Does my right hon. Friend agree that perhaps the most encouraging aspect in the otherwise sorry state of the Westland helicopter company is the fact that she and her right hon. and learned Friend the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry regard letters that are marked as private and confidential as being private and confidential? Will she also agree with me that, if the right hon. prima donna Member for Henley (Mr. Heseltine) —[Interruption.]—had understood the meaning of the words private and confidential, his political career would not be in the ruins which it is today?

The Prime Minister: With regard to what my hon. Friend said about the letter, I have made clear my past practice, and I have made clear what I consider will be my future practice, because it is, I believe, the correct one.

Mr. D. E. Thomas: Will the Prime Minister take this opportunity unreservedly to condemn the excessive use of force by a member of a private security firm apparently to be funded by the Home Office, against the non-violent person, Sue Pitman, at Carmarthen last Saturday?

The Prime Minister: In general, of course, one always will condemn the use of unwarranted force. The only exception is self-defence. I do not know about the particular case and I am not able therefore to comment in detail on it. Perhaps the hon. Member will be in touch.

Q8. Mr. George Robertson asked the Prime Minister if she will list her official engagements for Tuesday 14 January.

The Prime Minister: I refer the hon. Gentleman to the reply that I gave some moments ago.

Mr. Robertson: Is the Prime Minister aware that nine men have spent the last 10 days marching from Gartcosh steel mill in Scotland? Why will the Prime Minister not have the decency to meet them now that they are in London?

The Prime Minister: As the hon. Gentleman is aware, I met the representatives of the Scottish TUC when I was in Glasgow last autumn, and also the hon. Member for Monklands, West (Mr. Clarke). In addition, both the Secretary of State for Scotland and the Minister for Trade have offered to meet the people from Gartcosh. I do not see any further purpose in meeting them again.

Sir Kenneth Lewis: Will my right hon. Friend be replying to the letter that she has received from British Aerospace, and can she promise that, short of a simple acknowledgement, she will reply in public and not have it marked private and confidential?

The Prime Minister: That is one of the reasons why I am consulting before the reply goes.

Q10. Mr. Wareing asked the Prime Minister if she will list her official engagements for Tuesday 14 January.

The Prime Minister: I refer the hon. Gentleman to the reply that I gave some moments ago.

Mr. Wareing: In view of the fact that the letter from Sir Austin Pearce was marked "Private and confidential", will the Prime Minister tell the House why she made the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry aware of the letter before he arrived at the House? Will she say at what time yesterday she received the letter and at what time the Secretary of State was made aware of its contents?

The Prime Minister: I saw the letter shortly before I came to the House——

Mr. Skinner: Time.

The Prime Minister: Well, shortly before. I had been presiding over an official lunch, of which the hon. Gentleman may well know, and it was not until that had finished and I had said farewell to the guests that I was made aware of the letter and so came to the House very quickly.

Q11. Mr. Amess asked the Prime Minister if she will list her official engagements for Tuesday 14 January.

The Prime Minister: I refer my hon. Friend to the reply that I gave some moments ago.

Mr. Amess: Is the Prime Minister aware that out of the 12 local authorities whose rates have been capped, five have not appealed against that decision? Does she agree that by not appealing against its rates being capped Basildon district council is admitting that it is extravagant in its expenditure?

The Prime Minister: I believe that is so. I also believe that many ratepayers will be very grateful for the rate-capping legislation that has passed through this House, which has curbed the level of rates that ratepayers would otherwise have had to pay.

Q14. Mr. Neil Thorne asked the Prime Minister if she will list her official engagements for Tuesday 14 January.

The Prime Minister: I refer my hon. Friend to the reply that I gave some moments ago.

Mr. Thorne: Will my right hon. Friend take the opportunity to consider the possibility of making an official visit to the Kingdom of Nepal within the next 12 months?

The Prime Minister: I should very much like to do so.

Lesotho (Supply Routes)

3.31 pm

Mr. A. J. Beith (Berwick-upon-Tweed) (by private notice) asked the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs what response he has given to the urgent appeal made to Her Majesty's Government by the Government of the Kingdom of Lesotho asking for help in dealing with the obstruction of supply routes by the South African Government.

The Minister of State, Foreign and Commonwealth Office (Mrs. Lynda Chalker): We view this matter very seriously indeed. We do not believe that the problems between South Africa and Lesotho can be resolved by coercion. We are making known to the South African Government our concern that the restrictions on border traffic should be lifted and that both sides should embark on a dialogue to resolve their differences without delay.

Mr. Beith: I welcome the Minister of State on her promotion to her present office and hope that she will exercise a good influence on Government policy. Does she recognise that as Lesotho—our Commonwealth partner —is entirely surrounded by South Africa and has to import virtually all its food, fuel and essential goods from South Africa, it cannot survive an economic blockade? Does she also realise that the delaying tactics being used by the South African Government are preventing virtually all the supplies from getting through? What pressure is she prepared to use to follow up the protest that has been made, in order to secure an end to the blockade? If pressure does not work, are the Government prepared to give practical help to ensure that in an extreme situation —the situation is becoming more extreme all the time— emergency supplies can be got into Lesotho? Does she agree that it is essential that this blockade should not be allowed to take away the independence of Lesotho?

Mrs. Chalker: I thank the hon. Gentleman for his initial remarks. We are very well aware of how dependent Lesotho is upon South Africa. We are also aware that blockading that country will have to cease. We shall look at ways of assisting them, and we shall shortly be replying to the letter that the Prime Minister of Lesotho, Chief Jonathan, addressed to the Prime Minister yesterday. We shall continue to urge the South African Government to respect fully the independence and territorial integrity of its neighbours, and we shall continue to urge on all countries in the region the need for dialogue and the suspension of violence, as called for in the Commonwealth accord.

Sir John Biggs-Davison (Epping Forest): I welcome my hon. Friend to her new responsibilities. May I ask her what justification is offered by South Africa for the blockade? Since Lesotho is a partner in the Commonwealth, what contact have Her Majesty's Government in the United Kingdom had with other Commonwealth Governments about a resolution of the matter?

Mrs. Chalker: I thank my hon. Friend for his kind remarks. We know of no justification for the action. Of course, we have been in contact with our Commonwealth neighbours. The Commonwealth accord was agreed and we have kept in touch with those countries since. We shall continue with our partners in the Commonwealth to urge the South African Government to seek a solution through dialogue with neighbouring countries.

Mr. Tom Clarke (Monklands, West): Is the Minister aware that the hon. Members who visited Botswana after the infamous raid on Gaborone regard the intimidation by the South African Government against neighbouring Commonwealth countries as entirely repugnant? Can we give an assurance to those Commonwealth countries that we find South Africa's invasion and intimidation unacceptable? Even if we cannot bring ourselves to impose sanctions, will we assure world opinion about our firm opinion?

Mrs. Chalker: Indeed. The hon. Member knows that we find the action repugnant. We deeply regret the land mine incidents and accompanying loss of life. We shall continue to condemn all acts of violence from whatever quarter they may come. We shall do all we can to ensure that the unacceptable position is brought to a swift and lasting conclusion.

Mr. Anderson (Swansea, East): The Opposition warmly welcome the hon. Lady to her new post. A friendly, landlocked Commonwealth country has been blockaded since 1 January by a bullying neighbour. Have the Government been in close touch with the United States, since the appeal from the Prime Minister of Lesotho about the possible provision of commodities was also addressed to President Reagan? Is it the reading of the Government that this is part of a wider attempt to destabilise Lesotho politically and to force it to agree to a security pact? Are the Government aware that other front-line states adjoining South Africa are anxious about possible military intervention either by the South African defence forces or by agents of South Africa, as happened when nine opponents of apartheid were killed in Lesotho just before Christmas? What representations have been made by our ambassador in Pretoria to South Africa urging restraint in any further military adventures over its borders?

Mrs. Chalker: I thank the hon. Gentleman for what he said. We are in close touch with the Government of the United States. Tomorrow I shall be seeing Dr. Crocker on his return from South Africa and I shall raise the matter with him. The action is seen as an attempt to destabilise Lesotho. We understand the anxiety of other front-line states at what may be anticipated from the purveyors of violence, wherever they may come from. Representations will be made by Her Majesty's ambassador. I have no doubt that we shall be speaking about that shortly.

Roskill Report

3.38 pm

The Secretary of State for the Home Department (Mr. Douglas Hurd): With permission, Mr. Speaker, I would like to make a statement about the report of the Fraud Trials Committee under the chairmanship of Lord Roskill which was published on 10 January. The House will recall that the committee was set up in 1983, well in advance of recent events, to consider ways of improving the conduct of criminal proceedings arising from fraud.

The Government are most grateful to Lord Roskill and his colleagues for producing with such speed a readable, thorough and radical report. It deals with a serious and urgent problem. We fully share the committee's concern that the perpetrators of serious fraud should be brought effectively to book. The report shows that the legal and administrative machinery for this purpose has been creaking badly. We are determined to bring about the changes in law, practice and attitudes which are necessary.

There are two reasons for this. First, the reputation of our financial institutions, and of the City of London in particular, needs the support of effective action against fraud. Secondly, there must be no escape for offenders simply because their offences are highly complicated or because they can employ large resources to cover them up —the enforcement of the law must be even-handed. Accordingly, the Government welcome the report as providing a basis for early legislation to achieve substantial reforms of the law in this field, and also for new administrative measures in areas where legislation is not required.

Responsibility for the investigation and prosecution of fraud is now shared by the police, the Director of Public Prosecutions, the Department of Trade and Industry and other agencies. Co-operation has been greatly improved in recent years, and permanent fraud investigation group arrangements have been in place since last January. The Roskill committee recommended an urgent examination of the need for a new, unified organisation. We accept the recommendation for such an examination, and it will be immediately put in hand by my right hon. Friend the Chief Secretary.

The committee has called for resources devoted to the pursuit of fraud to be expanded as a matter of priority. The Government are already taking steps to that end through the strengthening of the Department of Trade and Industry by nearly 200 new staff over the next few years, and the addition to the Director of Public Prosecution's Department of nine extra lawyers with support staff. We shall seek to draw in more people with the necessary skill and experience from the private sector on short-service appointments. In addition, the agency and the self-regulatory organisations to be set up under the Financial Services Bill will have their own resources for the investigation of fraud.

As regards the substantive law, my noble Friend the Lord Chancellor and I will be in touch with the Law Commission about its work on conspiracy to defraud. I shall seek the advice of the Criminal Law Revision Committee on early legislation to deal with the urgent problem of the limitations on the use of a charge of conspiracy to defraud to which the Roskill committee drew attention.

The committee made a number of recommendations on juries, including provision for certain complex fraud cases to be tried by a tribunal comprising a judge and two lay members, and for the abolition of peremptory challenges. We shall be consulting urgently about these important matters, and we shall listen with interest to the views which will be expressed in the House and the other place and in general public comment.

The committee's general approach on preparations for trial, the law of evidence and other matters would lead to significant improvements in the trial of fraud cases. The feasibility of certain aspects of these proposals will require further study and we shall need to give more thought to the details. Some of the recommendations may well be applicable in other sectors of the criminal law besides fraud.

To sum up, we have in this report an excellent basis for substantial and worthwhile legislation and administrative action. The report will be immensely helpful in shaping the Government's continuing fight against the insidious menace of fraud. For this, we are most grateful to Lord Roskill and his colleagues. It is now for us and for Parliament as a whole to do our part in carrying forward the work they have begun. I hope that my right hon. Friend the Leader of the House will be able to arrange for an early debate on the report.

Mr. Gerald Kaufman (Manchester, Gorton): The Home Secretary does not take this matter very far, but no doubt there will be a clearer sign of the Government's views in the forthcoming debate. He mentioned the proposed increase in staff at the Department of Trade and Industry and it is important to strengthen the defences of that Department against fraud.

We should like to hear more about increasing manpower in police fraud squads, about whose adequacy or otherwise there is great concern. Roskill's recommendations for a unified investigating force must be seriously considered. Investigation spread among 47 different organisations is a disorganised shambles. Similarly, court procedures are far too cumbersome and inadequate to deal with modern technology.

Whatever is wrong, I cannot agree with one proposed change. On behalf of the Labour party, I make it clear that we reject outright the Roskill recommendation that in complex cases the right to a jury trial could be removed. It is impossible to define complexity. Juries have been found adequate to deal with profoundly important and detailed espionage cases involving the nation's security and they are a valuable safeguard against the possibility of a prejudiced judge. The right to a jury trial has existed for many centuries and should not lightly be cast aside now.

Fraudsters are getting away with more than £3 billion a year. Much of that is from small savers who face the devastating loss of their life savings. Until now, the Government have shown a lack of determination in pursuing those fraudsters. Under this Government 20 times more people have been sent to gaol for social security benefit fraud than for Inland Revenue fraud. It is no wonder that on Saturday The Times said that there is a suspicion that the rich and well-connected can get away with it.

In his report Lord Roskill declares:

"In the United Kingdom fraud is a growth industry."

He also says:

"Fraud is posing a threat to London as a financial centre."

[Mr. Gerald Kaufman]

In the past, the City of London has been admired as the financial capital of the world, but unless the Government show more determination and less complacency there is a danger that it will acquire the deadly reputation of being the fraud capital of the world.

Mr. Hurd: I must say that I am a little disappointed at the grudging way in which the right hon. Gentleman has received the remarkable report and my commendation of it. Bearing in mind what he said towards the end of his statement I would have thought that he would have wholeheartedly welcomed the report and joined us in saying that it is right that it should give impetus to further action in tightening the net against fraud. We intend to put legislation into a Criminal Justice Bill that we are planning for the next session. I look to the right hon. Gentleman for more wholehearted support when we come to that than we have seen today.

The right hon. Gentleman asked about the police joint fraud squad. The Metropolitan and City company fraud department is the largest fraud squad in the United Kingdom with 190 officers engaged in company fraud work. As the right hon. Gentleman knows, I am now carrying out an urgent review to assess specific needs for further increases in the establishment of the Metropolitan police, and the size of the joint fraud squad will come into that.

I note the right hon. Gentleman's comments about juries in cases of complex fraud. In his report, Lord Roskill made a powerful case for a change but, as I said, I think that it is sensible for the Government to wait for the views of the House and opinion outside on that important change. The views of the right hon. Gentleman will not stand alone.

Sir Edward Gardner (Fylde): Whatever may be the strength of the case for the abolition of trial by jury in complex fraud cases, will my right hon. Friend bear in mind the fact that any attempt to extend that radical principle to other crimes which can at present be tried by jury would be intolerable and unacceptable?

Mr. Hurd: I note what my hon. and learned Friend has said. The Roskill report made a powerful case for ring fencing that area. I do not believe that any action that follows from that aspect of the report should be regarded as capable of further extension.

Mr. Alex Carlile (Montgomery): I welcome many parts of the Roskill report, but does the Home Secretary not agree that juries have shown themselves peculiarly effective in trying cases of fraud? They have shown themselves willing to convict in 86·8 per cent. of the fraud cases brought before a Crown court. That is a higher percentage than convictions in other classes of case brought before the Crown courts.

Mr. Hurd: I note the hon. and learned Gentleman's views.

Before we concentrate on that recommendation, however, it is important to understand that it is flanked by a series of radical suggestions. For example, the report recommends changes in the law of evidence, which I know that Lord Roskill considers to be of prime importance. It also recommends changes in the disclosure of the case by both prosecution and defence and the institution of preparatory hearings on a more systematic basis. In the committee's view, those are all crucial changes that need to be considered alongside the matter of the fraud trial tribunal.

Sir Peter Hordern (Horsham): Has Roskill any recommendations to make about the position of accountants to a firm, when they think that fraud might have been committed? In future, should they owe their primary loyalty to their clients, as they have always done in the past, or should a duty be imposed upon them to reveal to the authorities where they suspect fraud is being committed?

Mr. Hurd: My recollection is that the answer to my hon. Friend's question is no, because that point did not lie within the committee's terms of reference.

Mr. Nicholas Brown (Newcastle upon Tyne, East): The Home Secretary glossed over the resources issue and said nothing about expertise, which was touched on in the Roskill report. What is the Government's attitude towards training in accountancy and new technology for judges and barristers and in particular for those whose job it is to investigate major frauds?

Mr. Hurd: The report has about 112 recommendations; there are many that I did not touch on, but they were summarised in part of my statement. I entirely agree about the importance of that part of the report. It applies to the police, who are my particular concern, as well as to the professions that the hon. Gentleman mentioned.

Sir Peter Tapsell (East Lindsey): As the answers given yesterday by the Attorney-General about specific cases raised with him seemed to show, is there not a danger that, however much we may tighten legislation on fraud domestically, within the United Kingdom, some of the worst offenders will continue to escape because of the great inadequacy and slowness of the extradition procedures? In that context, will the Home Secretary ask our right hon. and learned Friend the Foreign Secretary whether an international initiative could be taken to improve the extradition procedures not only for fraud, but for terrorism and other crimes which are on the increase, which are facilitated by modern transportation?

Mr. Hurd: My hon. Friend is exactly right. I have already discussed the matter with my right hon. and learned Friend the Foreign Secretary. Fraud offences are extraditable, but, like my hon. Friend, I am concerned at the obstacles placed in the way of extradition of offenders from the United Kingdom. He will have noticed what Lord Roskill and his committee said about evidence being taken abroad. That is a very important point. In addition, in the Criminal Justice Bill next Session, I hope to put before the House important proposals for the reform of our extradition law because I am convinced from everything I have learnt in my present job that, until we are prepared to change the basis of our extradition law, it will be difficult to improve our treaty arrangements with other states. It will be difficult to get back into our own jurisdiction the fraudsters with whom we are concerned unless we have made changes at home.

Mr. Dennis Skinner (Bolsover): Is the Home Secretary aware that the difficulty is not so much convicting people who have committed fraud, as the hon. and learned Member for Montgomery (Mr. Carlile) said, as making sure that there are enough people around to look for them, similar to those who have been employed to look for people who have been fraudulently active on the Department of Health and Social Security front? There should be as many officers in the fraud squad as there are investigating people who are supposed to be claiming too much supplementary benefit. If we had that many people, we might be able to get hold of some of the fraudsters who are difficult to get hold of. Is it not ironic, at a time when the Government are talking about considering the possibility of getting rid of trial by jury because of the complexity of fraud cases, that Sipra, who was given eight months' start by the Chancellor of the Exchequer before he sent the fraud squad in after him, is now out there in another continent, writing novels and laughing at everybody in Britain, having got away with about £70 million from Johnson Matthey Bankers? Peter Cameron-Webb is out there in New York, having salted away £13 million, with his mate Peter Dixon in some other country. Yet the Attorney-General said yesterday at the Dispatch Box that we would have difficulty in getting those people back, and as a sort of cover-up, the Home Secretary says that we shall have to change trial by jury because we cannot get hold of them. What nonsense. The Government are not trying to catch them.

Mr. Hurd: The hon. Gentleman clearly has not listened either to what my right hon. and learned Friend told him yesterday or to anything that I have said today. I have not endorsed the particular proposal to which he has just referred. I have announced, or re-announced, a substantial expansion of Department of Trade and Industry staff to deal with fraud. I have answered a question about the Metropolitan and City company fraud department. I have moved a long way in the direction of showing that we are strengthening Government resources in precisely the direction that the hon. Gentleman wants, but there is no satisfying him. He sits there making his little perorations without listening to the answers that are given to him.

Sir Anthony Grant (Cambridgeshire, South-West): Is my right hon. Friend aware that I agree entirely in broad principle with my hon. and learned Friend the Member for Fylde (Sir E. Gardner) about the maintenance of trial by jury? However, the reason that juries tend to convict in minor fraud cases, particularly in social security fraud cases, is because they understand them quite easily, whereas in major fraud cases, where large sums of money are involved, the standard tactic of the defence is to make those cases as complicated as possible. There is, therefore, a case for the Roskill recommendations, which I believe would prove to be a substantial deterrent to the major villains.

Mr. Hurd: There certainly is a case, and the House and the country will want to weigh that case. In addition, as I have already said, the Roskill report makes a number of other recommendations, a few of which I have mentioned. Visual aids are another recommendation. It is particularly cutting at the expense of the prolixity of lawyers, which was mentioned by my hon. Friend.

Mr. Douglas Hogg (Grantham): Will my right hon. Friend accept that perhaps the most important recommendation in the report for making fraud trials more effective is the requirement that both the prosecution and the defence should state their case in writing? Will he please consider early legislation designed to achieve that end?

Mr. Hurd: Here again, there should be room for discussion. This is a radical recommendation, but my view is that it is almost certainly justified. We shall certainly find room in next Session's legislation for the radical changes in the Roskill report which, after a short period of deliberation, including debate in this House, are judged to be necessary.

Mr. Gerald Bermingham (St. Helens, South): Does not the Home Secretary agree that, whereas all of us welcome the pursuit of the fraudster and the ultimate conviction of those who have committed fraud, we must also take into account the balance that has to be struck between the rights of the prosecution and the rights of the defence? In any steps that are taken in pursuit of Roskill, one must always remember that the paramount basis of all justice is even-handedness between the parties. Does not the Home Secretary agree that methods with regard to disclosure of case, the removal of committal proceedings in fraud cases and the jury system tend to go to the heart of justice?

Mr. Hurd: Certainly there should be time, which we propose to give, to consider what I certainly admit are sweeping changes. We shall look carefully at the views expressed on the Opposition Benches. They have pressed us on fraud for a long time. We shall watch carefully how the Opposition respond to our reform proposals.

Sir Dudley Smith (Warwick and Leamington): Is my right hon. Friend aware that there is considerable public concern about the current jury system? Does he accept that, in due course, there must be several reforms of the jury system if public confidence is to be retained, as retained it must be?

Mr. Hurd: I think that the system of trial by jury for serious offences lies at the heart of our criminal justice system. The question is what changes are needed to clarify and purify it of any accretions or distortions. As my hon. Friend said, that goes wider than fraud. He knows that we have already set in hand an analytical exercise relating to peremptory challenge, and he will have noticed the caustic remarks that Roskill makes on that principle.

Mr. Donald Anderson (Swansea, East): The Home Secretary will be aware of the alarming explosion in salary structures in the City over the past year. What realistic expectations does the right hon. Gentleman have of attracting people of quality from the private sector for short-term appointments?

Mr. Hurd: The hon. Member puts his finger on a difficult point. I am sure that my right hon. Friend the Chancellor of the Exchequer will show his characteristic generosity in considering that problem.

Mr. Toby Jessel (Twickenham): Does my right hon. Friend agree with Lord Roskill that the system of peremptory challenge of jurors "may . . . enable defendants to ensure that a sufficiently large part of a jury is rigged in their favour"?

Does the right hon. Gentleman agree with Lord Roskill that peremptory challenges should "be abolished" as a matter of urgency?

Mr. Hurd: My hon. Friend was the first in the field on that, and I acknowledge that fact. He knows the Government's response on the general question, which was given to him before Lord Roskill reported. I do not want today to add to that.

[Mr. Hurd]

Mr. David Winnick (Walsall, North): Does the Home Secretary recognise that the Opposition's fears are the same as those mentioned by his hon. and learned Friend the Member for Fylde (Sir E. Gardner)? The abolition of juries in cases such as the Home Secretary has described could lead to the abolition of juries in certain other cases, on the basis of the same argument. That could happen, bearing in mind the Government's deplorable record on civil liberties — which is as bad as their record in dealing with serious commercial crime.

Mr. Hurd: The hon. Member is trying to have it both ways. If we are to be serious in pursuing fraudsters, as we are serious in the pursuit of drug traffickers, we must strike the right balance. The exact nature of that balance needs to be considered. The hon. Gentleman should not try to catch us in that trap. There is no reason why a system of tribunals for complex fraud cases should lead to an extension of the principle elsewhere. The Government would only do that if the House agreed and there is a perfectly good argument in the Roskill report for ring fencing that area of complex prosecution.

Mr. Ivor Stanbrook (Orpington): In case it is thought that the diminution of the right of trial by jury is too high a price to pay for improving the system of prosecution of fraudsters, may I commend to my right hon. Friend the possibility of using the civil jurisdiction? That does not carry the difficulty surrounding juries. It makes available weapons that are not available to criminal jurisdiction. There would be a deterrent value in civil jurisdiction equal to that under criminal jurisdiction. Will that possibility be considered, as Roskill apparently did not consider it?

Mr. Hurd: Therefore, nor have I. I note my hon. Friend's point, but I doubt whether the one system could be a substitute for the other. If my hon. Friend would like to develop that point at greater length, I should be delighted to study it.

Mr. Chris Smith (Islington, South and Finsbury): Does not the Home Secretary accept that the prospects of the abandonment of the right to trial by jury is bound to be the most controversial aspect of the Roskill report? By using such expressions as "powerful case" and "excellent basis for substantial legislation", the Home Secretary is likely to give the impression that the Government support that proposal in the Roskill report. Will he make it clear to the House the Government's current view about jury trial?

Mr. Hurd: We shall be having urgent consultations and will listen with interest to the views expressed in the House and in another place, and to general public comment. I made that point in my original statement on the Roskill recommendations on juries, which involve not only proposals about complex fraud cases, but a case for the abolition of peremptory challenge.

Mr. John Maples (Lewisham, West): Will not my right hon. Friend agree that the right to trial by jury has been a fundamental right for a long time and that, whatever arguments there may be for changing the procedure for fraud trials, it would be a dangerous precedent to deny to those charged with one particular crime the rights enjoyed by those charged with other serious crimes?

Mr. Hurd: The longer this exchange continues, the wiser we are shown to have been in saying that there should be a little air around this set of proposals. There should be an opportunity for people to consider and discuss proposals before final decisions are made and the Government start drafting the Criminal Justice Bill for next Session.

Mr. Robin Corbett (Birmingham, Erdington): Is there anything in the Roskill recommendations that would require Barclays bank to take immediate action to stop the apparently fraudulent misuse of its bankers' drafts, which has been going on since April 1985?

Mr. Hurd: No, Sir, and I have no intention of being drawn into particular cases which are not my responsibility.

Several Hon. Members rose——

Mr. Speaker: Order. I will call those hon. Members who have been rising, but I would ask for brief questions, please.

Mr. Anthony Beaumont-Dark (Birmingham, Selly Oak): Will my right hon. Friend not be disheartened by the apparent difference between the hon. Member for Bolsover (Mr. Skinner), who thinks that the Home Secretary is not serious in his wish to catch fraudsters, and the right hon. Member for Manchester, Gorton (Mr. Kaufman), the Opposition spokesman on the matter, who thinks that my right hon. Friend is going too far? If we build an iron fence around the City within which fraudsters know that they are likely to be caught, prosecuted and convicted, that will be the best way to stop fraud. I thought that the Opposition were most keen to do that, as we are.

Mr. Hurd: I thought that, too. I am not in the least disheartened, because what I see, not only in Lord Roskill's report but in the business that follows today, is a clear opportunity for the Government to show, without any fear of contradiction, that they are determined further to tighten the work against fraud. I repeat my disappointment that we do not appear to have the Opposition's support in that.

Mr. Richard Hickmet (Glanford and Scunthorpe): Will my right hon. Friend accept that, for many years, it has been considered a basic constitutional right that those who are prosecuted in Crown courts for criminal offences are found guilty only when the jury is satisfied beyond reasonable doubt of the offender's guilt? The proposition that that right should be removed—the right to jury trial —whether it is made in the House or in a report will be viewed with grave concern in the House and elsewhere.

Mr. Hurd: I take my hon. Friend's point.

Mr. Kenneth Hind (Lancashire, West): Does my right hon. Friend agree that there are two aspects to the report? The first is the prosecution and defence in a trial of those accused of fraud. The other is investigation. Perhaps my right hon. Friend will consider that an essential act in that regard would be to place on company auditors an obligation to report irregularities either to the police or to the Department of Trade and Industry.

Mr. Hurd: Yes, I will consider that, although I believe that that goes wide of the report. A point not picked up in the exchanges is the commission that my right hon. Friend the Prime Minister has given to the Chief Secretary to the Treasury urgently to study the first of Lord Roskill's recommendations, which is for a unified system of investigation in bringing prosecutions. My hon. Friend's point goes a little wider than that, but I want to emphasise the importance of that decision.

Mr. David Ashby (Leicester, North-West): Will my right hon. Friend accept that not only fraud cases but other ordinary crime cases are very complicated? Rather than throwing away the right to jury trial, which most of the House believes in, there is a case for having special juries in complicated cases. Jurors in such juries might be graduates from universities. Does he accept that, very often, peremptory challenges are used by lawyers to improve rather than to worsen the quality of the jury?

Mr. Hurd: The trouble is that people's ideas of quality sometimes vary in a strange way. My hon. Friend is correct to draw the attention of the House to the idea of special juries. That is an old idea which was recently revived in the columns of The Times and is now proposed by my hon. Friend. It did not find favour with Roskill, for the reasons set out in the report, but no doubt that will form part of the debate.

Mr. Richard Ottaway (Nottingham, North): On an earlier occasion it was intimated that the courts' lack of jurisdiction to try conspirators to a crime where the conspiracy had taken place wholly in this country but the crime had taken place overseas—a common occurrence in frauds described in appendix F in the Roskill report —was to be dealt with by the Roskill committee. That has not happened. What plans does my right hon. Friend have to block that loophole?

Mr. Hurd: Perhaps my hon. Friend will allow me to look into that matter, as I would rather not answer him off the cuff.

Mr. Tony Baldry (Banbury): Will my right hon. Friend agree that the jury's purpose is to determine the facts according to the evidence? Very often, that is exceedingly difficult in cases of serious fraud for jurors without experience of accountancy or of how computers operate. In such cases, it is difficult for jurors fairly and justly to determine the facts, and that can lead to injustice. Injustice against one is injustice against us all.

Mr. Hurd: That is a good summary of the main thrust of Lord Roskill's critique. We have to take a little time before setting our decisions in concrete.

Mr. Ivan Lawrence (Burton): I welcome my right hon. Friend's wise caution over the abolition of jury trials and peremptory challenge. Will he consider an area over which there will be much less disagreement, which is the enormous expense involved for the state in prosecuting fraud trials, which often go on at great length and are the subject of legal aid? Will he consider extending the inquiry initiated by a former Solicitor-General into requiring defendants in long cases to have to prove their need for legal aid? If they were subjected to long and thorough inquiries, perhaps few would want legal aid. The cost to the state would be much reduced and the length of trials would be reduced accordingly.

Mr. Hurd: I will draw the attention of my noble Friend the Lord Chancellor to the point made by my hon. and learned Friend. The thrust of Lord Roskill's report is that trials are often too slow in coming on and in wending their way to a conclusion. Many of his recommendations are designed to shorten both processes, and thus to reduce the cost.

My hon. and learned Friend said that I was right to be cautious and that is probably true, but I hope that the House will not be in any doubt about our determination to pursue this analysis and to put into legislation in the next Session some changes that may be controversial, but which will be immensely important. I hope that no one thinks that, because we are being cautious and are not leaping to immediate conclusions, we shall not take the earliest possible opportunity to tighten the noose around fraud.

Mr. D. N. Campbell-Savours (Workington): Are deficiences in the present legal system preventing police from bringing prosecutions from fraud?

Mr. Hurd: I am not quite sure what point the hon. Gentleman is on. Roskill shows that the legal and administrative machinery in this area is creaking—I have acknowledged that frankly—and he puts forward proposals for making the machinery in both areas run more smoothly.

Mr. Kaufman: The Secretary of State cannot be allowed to get away with giving the impression that the Government have become crusaders against fraud. Apart from the reaction on both sides of the House to the proposal for the abolition of the right to jury trial in complex cases, the right hon. Gentleman's statement wraps in rhetoric a failure to respond positively to a single one of the specific proposals by Roskill, whereas the Opposition have already called on the Government to adopt several of the specific proposals that we support.

This belated Government action would never have come about without the strong pressure from the Opposition — from both the Front Bench and Back Benches — over a prolonged period. When the Government show the determination against fraud that the Labour party has shown, we shall begin to take them seriously.

Mr. Hurd: I think that the chronology on the record contradicts what the right hon. Gentleman has said. Certainly, we are crusaders against fraud. I had hoped to carry the right hon. Gentleman with me, but after his first intervention I doubted whether that would be possible, because he seemed to be lukewarm about the matter and anxious to make small points. I hope that his second, more angry, intervention suggests that he is also a crusader.

Statutory Instruments, &c

Question put,

That the draft Local Loans (Increase of Limit) Order 1986 be referred to a Standing Committee on Statutory Instruments, &c. —[Mr. Maude.]

Mr. Walter Harrison (Wakefield): No.

Mr. Speaker: Does the right hon. Gentleman have the support of 20 hon. Members?

Mr. Harrison: I have not checked.

Mr. Speaker: The Question is, as on the Order Paper.

Question agreed to.

Leasehold Reform

4.14 pm

Mr. Gareth Wardell (Gower): I beg to move,

That leave be given to bring in a Bill to amend the Leasehold Reform Act 1967 to prevent the establishment of further leasehold agreements in residential properties; to establish formulae for the calculation fo the price for the purchase by tenants of their existing tenancies held under leasehold agreements; to extend the provision of legal aid to tenants exercising their rights under the 1967 Act and under this Act; and to establish freedom of choice for holders of leasehold tenancies to obtain insurance from the company of their choice.

In his famous Limehouse speech, David Lloyd George said that the residential leasehold system "is not business . . . it is blackmail".

Despite considerable improvements effected by the Leasehold Reform Act 1967 and some additional amendments under the Housing Act 1980, the estimated 1·5 million leaseholders in England and Wales would maintain that Lloyd George's observation is as true today as it was in 1909.

The leasehold system is archaic, iniquitous and inequitable. Leasehold tenure is essentially a landlord versus tenant relationship. Therefore, it will always be incompatible with the rights of home ownership, which we associate with being free from intimidation and having security of tenure, freedom of choice relating to our home and, eventually, full rights of home ownership.

A ground landlord buys a freehold for perhaps £300. On site is a house for which the owner paid, say, £30,000. The home owner pays the landlord ground rent of perhaps £30 a year, but the power of the landlord is disproportionate to the interest that he has purchased in that property. In return for allowing a home to be on his land, the landlord can insist on an amazing number of restrictions and obligations from the tenant.

Rules governing internal and external decoration and care of gardens, for example, are common, and many home improvements require permission and approval. Home extensions may involve an extra layer of fees, payable to the landlord for him to examine the plans and determine what work may or may not be carried out.

The home owner is not free to choose the policy or the company which will provide insurance cover. The insurers are nominated by the landlord, who in most cases receives what amounts to a considerable profit bonus from the commission payments.

Last year, one of my constituents forgot to sign the cheque for the ground rent payment. Within the three weeks that it took for the landlord to return the cheque, for my constituent to sign it and for the landlord to record payment, my constituent had received a notice from the landlord informing him that certified bailiffs had been instructed to distrain goods for the £25 ground rent plus £7·50 costs.

Leaseholders are not protected by section 147 of the Rent Act 1977 and ground landlords do not have to get a court order to distrain goods. That sort of harassment, the fear of infringing conditions in a lease and the lack of control and choice over matters affecting a home, which has been bought, are central to the need to abolish the leasehold system.

If a leasehold home owner infringes any of the conditions of a lease, the landlord can cancel that lease. On cancellation or normal expiry of the lease, all the buildings and property on the plot revert to the landlord. As the report of the Building Societies Association on leaseholding states:

"An Englishman's home, if held on Leasehold, is his landlord's castle."

I am sure that the same is true of the Welshman's home.

My Bill would prevent any new leaseholds being created and prevent any trading in leaseholds except between existing ground landlords and their tenants. The Bill would also establish a fixed formula, on a sliding scale, for assessing the purchase price of freeholds. Firm proposals for such a formula already exist, drafted by the Labour party in 1979, for reform of the 1967 Act. A fixed formula will stop the present common practice of landlords plucking a purchase price from the air.

Under the Bill, flat leaseholders would be offered full ownership by adopting a system similar to the strata title system, pioneered in New South Wales, which is working well. Such a system would not be too difficult to incorporate into British law. It would have advantages for individual flat owners, and it is consistent with the new movement by housing associations and housing trusts towards co-ownership of blocks of flats, which will enable improvements to be made to the national housing stock.

The relationship between the leasehold valuation tribunals and the Lands Tribunal would be changed. The South Wales Leaseholders Association has discovered that if a landlord loses the decision of the leasehold valuation tribunal, the landlord asks for a complete re-hearing of the case on appeal to the Lands Tribunal. Although a tenant can probably afford a hearing at the leasehold valuation tribunal, he cannot afford the costs of the Lands Tribunal, which are all too often out of proportion to the amount of money involved. My Bill would make appeal to the Lands Tribunal relate to points of law only, which is normal in other tribunal systems. Such a change would be fair to both sides.

My Bill will allow leaseholders of houses to purchase their own insurance cover. It will give to ground landlords the right of annual inspection of the policy and a certificate of paid premium. Such a system would undoubtedly work better to protect both parties' interests without undermining anyone's rights and consumer choice.

The provisions are an amalgam of the many attempts to introduce legislation and the recommendations calling for action to deal with the most serious problem of leaseholders. In another place, the noble Lord Evans of Claughton introduced the Leasehold Reform Bill which would have simplified the enormously complicated 1967 Act. The Leasehold Flats Reform Bill, introduced by my hon. Friend the Member for Norwood (Mr. Fraser), was followed by the Co-ownership of Flats Bill, introduced by the hon. Member for Kensington (Sir B. Rhys Williams). Almost a year ago to the day, my hon. Friend the Member for Birmingham, Erdington (Mr. Corbett) presented the Leaseholders (Choice of Insurers) Bill. During the past two years the Building Societies Association, the Law Society, the National Consumer Council, the Welsh Consumer Council, the South Wales Leaseholders Association and the Office of Fair Trading have called for reform of one, or several, aspects of the leasehold system. The Nugee committee report is expected shortly and it will also have recommendations on the topic. It would appear that well researched and reasoned reform is possible and timely.

During the past two years hon. Members representing South Wales have, without exception, received representations from constituents who are leaseholders about harassment and pressure from unscrupulous ground landlords, perhaps no more so than my hon. Friend the Member for Caerphilly (Mr. Davies). We agree that constituents are being harassed and made to feel insecure. We assume that is because the landlords wish to pressure the leaseholders to purchase their leases on the landlords' terms. We have been helpless to stop those practices because the landlords are not acting illegally. When Parliament cannot protect people from the law, it is time to change the law.

Question put and agreed to.

Bill ordered to be brought in by Mr. Gareth Wardell, Mr. Ron Davies, Mr. Alan Williams, Dr. Roger Thomas and Mr. Tom Clarke.

LEASEHOLD REFORM

Mr. Gareth Wardell accordingly presented a Bill to amend the Leasehold Reform Act 1967 to prevent the establishment of further leasehold agreements in residential properties; to establish formulae for the calculation of the price for the purchase by tenants of their existing tenancies held under leasehold agreements; to extend the provision of legal aid to tenants exercising their rights under the 1967 Act and under this Act; and to establish freedom of choice for holders of leasehold tenancies to obtain insurance from the company of their choice: And the same was read the First time; and ordered to be read a Second time upon Friday 14 February and to be printed [Bill 57.]

Orders of the day

Financial Services Bill

Order for Second Reading read

Mr. Speaker: I wish to inform the House that I have selected the amendment in the name of the Leader of the Opposition.

4.25 pm

The Secretary of State for Trade and Industry and President of the Board of Trade (Mr. Leon Brittan): I beg to move, that the Bill be now read a Second time.

The City of London and the financial services sector as a whole comprise one of Britain's most successful industries. It provides jobs for a million people. In 1984, it generated overseas earnings of over £6 billion. It provides the finance for new investment and new ventures on which our prosperity depends.

Last year, for example, new issues of stocks and shares listed on the stock exchange raised £6·2 billion – money which was invested in industry and commerce, leading directly to the creation of new jobs. Those resources are available because the City of London is the repository of the savings and investments of millions of ordinary people. It is our responsibility to ensure that those people can have confidence in the good practice and honesty of those who do business in the City. That confidence is all the more important with the increasing competition between the financial centres of the world.

If the City of London is to remain a leading centre, then there must be no doubt about the integrity of its institutions, because once that doubt takes root it is only too easy for the customers of the City to take their business elsewhere.

This is all the more important at a time when the City is experiencing major changes. I pay tribute to my right hon. Friend the Member for Hertsmere (Mr. Parkinson) whose agreement in 1983 with the chairman of the stock exchange opened the way for those changes to take place.

For those reasons the Government have been determined to take comprehensive and firm action to deal with financial fraud and, at the same time, establish an effective and flexible regulatory framework in which the City can operate.

The Financial Services Bill is one of the most important measures to achieve these objectives, but it is, of course, only one of a range of such measures. They include the Companies Acts of 1980 and 1981, which strengthened the powers of investigators and increased the powers of the courts to disqualify directors for misconduct, the Insolvency Act 1985 which built upon the Companies Acts by making disqualification of directors for wrongful trading easier, the Green Paper on extradition which contained proposals designed to make it more difficult for offenders to escape the consequences of their actions by going abroad, and the banking White Paper which will increase the requirements for disclosure of information, thus helping to detect fraud at an earlier stage.

I especially welcome the recent report of the fraud trials committee chaired by Lord Roskill, on which my right hon. Friend the Home Secretary has made a statement this afternoon. As he has made clear, the report contains many important recommendations on ways in which the conduct of the investigation and prosecution of fraud, and the subsequent conduct of criminal proceedings, can be significantly improved.

In addition, the Government have already announced significant increases in the resources available to deal with the investigation and detection of fraud and other malpractices, including the provision of a further 195 people in the parts of the DTI dealing with this. So let there be no doubt of the Government's determination to take the most vigorous action against fraud wherever it occurs.

Having said that, I should like to make it clear that I do not believe that the City of London is riddled with fraud. The overwhelming majority of the people who work there are honourable and hard-working men and women who are extremely anxious that the wrongdoers should be brought to book. Anyone who suggests otherwise risks doing enormous damage to the reputation of the City, which would be wholly unjustified and damaging to the country as a whole. While I believe that the Financial Services Bill is a valuable contribution towards the elimination of fraud, its primary purpose is much wider than that.

It is right for me to pay tribute to the work of my predecessor, my right hon. Friend the Chancellor of the Duchy of Lancaster, and of my hon. Friend the Member for Edinburgh, Central (Mr. Fletcher). It was their White Paper on financial services in the United Kingdom, published in January last year, which laid the foundation for this Bill. I am only sorry that my right hon. Friend cannot be here to see the work he started come to fruition, and I am sure all the House will wish to join me in sending him best wishes for a speedy recovery.

The primary purpose of the Bill is to establish a framework of regulation which will provide effective protection for investors while at the same time promoting an efficient and competitive financial services industry in the United Kingdom. At present, the rules governing conduct in the City are based on legislation passed over 40 years ago. Inevitably, they are inadequate to meet today's needs, but the effect of the Bill will be not just to bring the law up to date and extend its coverage to include a wider range of investments; it will also establish a new and flexible system of regulation capable of responding to changing circumstances and dealing with new problems as and when they arise.

Of course, no system of regulation can or should remove all risk to the investor. If he makes a foolish decision, on the basis of adequate disclosure, then he cannot look to any regulator to make good the losses from his own misjudgment. It is for him to bear the consequences. But it is legitimate for an investor to expect that those who do business with or for him are fit and proper persons to do so, and that they are subject to rules which protect his interests as an investor. It is to meet that expectation that the Bill is designed.

Under the terms of the Bill, anyone who carries on investment business in the United Kingdom will require authorisation to do so, or, in very limited and special circumstances, specific exemption. That power of authorisation and regulation will lie with the Secretary of State. To do business without authorisation will be a criminal offence, carrying penalties of fines and imprisonment. Contracts made by the business will be unenforceable.

The Secretary of State will also have powers to apply to the court for an injunction to ban a person from carrying on investment business without authorisation or to seek a restitution order requiring investors to be recompensed for any loss that they have suffered as a result of the improper conduct of that business. That last power is a new and powerful weapon, the existence of which will be a major deterrent against misconduct and the exercise of which can provide effective redress for a wronged investor.

For the first time, the Bill provides a comprehensive definition of investment and investment businesses and it is estimated that there may be as many as 15,000 businesses which will require authorisation as a result.

As well as those already covered—

Mr. Alan Howarth (Stratford-on-Avon): On the definition of an investment, to which my right hon. and learned Friend has just referred, he is, I am sure, aware that some anxiety is felt about the definition in schedule 1 of "Long term insurance contracts". Will he undertake that, in Committee, the Government will be willing to reconsider that point to see whether the schedule, as drafted, may not treat as investments some pure protection policies on which potentially no profit or loss could arise, such as, for example, renewable accident and health insurance policies?

Mr. Brittan: Of course, we shall look at that and any other points. Towards the end of my remarks I shall be saying a word about the Government's spirit and general approach towards the Bill in Committee.

Mr. D. N. Campbell-Savours (Workington): Does the Secretary of State accept that a person who invests in a syndicate at Lloyd's is an investor and that what he places is an investment? On that basis, in the light of all the scandals that there have been over past years, why should Lloyd's not be included? Is it not true that if the Bill is passed as it stands, it in no way affects Lloyd's?

Mr. Brittan: I shall be coming to the subject of Lloyd's later.

It is the belief of the Government that the task of regulation of businesses of the kind I have been asking about can most effectively be conducted by those who have direct experience of the financial services industry and who are in close touch with developments in the market.

The Bill therefore enables the Secretary of State to transfer the majority of his powers to one or more designated agencies, made up of providers and users of financial services who will have the knowledge and expertise to ensure that investors' interests are being properly looked after.

The chairman and members of the agency will be appointed jointly by the Governor of the Bank of England and the Secretary of State.

However, powers will be transferred to the agency only if the Secretary of State is satisfied that the agency's rules will adequately protect investors and are in compliance with the principles contained within the Bill and that the agency is prepared to enforce them.

Mr. Anthony Nelson (Chichester): My right hon. and learned Friend has referred to the appointment of the chairman of the designated authority. He said that that appointment will be made jointly under the schedule by the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry and the Governor of the Bank of England. Does he think it right that the Governor of the Bank of England should have an effective veto over the appointment and discharge of the chairman of the designated authority over an investment rather than a banking industry?

Mr. Brittan: In view of the broader role of the Governor of the Bank of England in relation to the City, it is a reasonable requirement that he should be enabled to do that jointly with the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry. I was going to say that the transfer of functions will itself be subject to parliamentary approval

If the Secretary of State is not satisfied that the agency to which powers have been transferred is continuing to meet the criteria set out in the Bill, then he will, once again subject to parliamentary approval, be able to resume those powers either in part or in total. We believe that those arrangements will ensure the proper level of accountability of the designated agency.

Some have suggested that it would have been better to establish a statutory commission; but in doing so they have singularly failed to identify any benefits which our proposals do not already provide. Those who argue for such a system should specify precisely which powers they say are present in a fully statutory system, but are absent from ours and would make our system more effective. I challenge them to do so in the debate. We should proceed from glib labelling to precise proposals. A statutory commission of the kind suggested would lack the advantages of the practitioner-based system that we propose. Its remoteness from the market place and lack of first-hand expertise would make it cumbersome and bureaucratic and unable to react swiftly to changing market needs. Our system enables rules to be made quickly and flexibly by a body which can count on the personal commitment of those it regulates to high standards of conduct, because such a body has been proposed and will be financed by them.

None the less, it is important not to exaggerate the difference between what is proposed and the creation of a statutory commission, for the designated agency will itself be operating within and be controlled by the clear statutory framework set out in the Bill.

Mr. John Butterfill (Bournemouth, West): Clause 104 provides that the Secretary of State must consult the Director General of Fair Trading about any rule changes. Does my right hon. and learned Friend consider that that obligation is sufficiently wide, or should the Secretary of State have a much wider obligation to consult other than merely with the Director General of Fair Trading?

Mr. Brittan: In the context of that provision, it is a reasonable requirement because it relates to the relationship between the areas of policy covered by the Director General and the rest of the Bill's structure. I believe that the requirement is reasonable, but I have no doubt that it is a matter that will be considered in Committee.

There will be two further measures to ensure public accountability. First, the Bill will establish a financial services tribunal to which a business or individual will have the right of appeal against the agency's decisions. The tribunal will be chaired by a lawyer appointed by my noble Friend the Lord Chancellor and will have two other members appointed by the Secretary of State, one of whom will be appointed for his or her relevant practical experience. The tribunal will investigate and report on the cases referred to it and the agency will be bound by its findings.

The second further measure of accountability will be a requirement that the agency submit an annual report which will be laid before Parliament, and will, of course, be open to the House to debate. Although the Bill provides for the possibility of more than one designated agency, the House will be aware that the Securities and Investments Board and the Marketing of Investments Board Organising Committee have announced that they intend to merge to form a single body. It had always been the intention of the Government that this opportunity should be open to them, and I welcome their announcement.

Once designated, the agency will itself be able to authorise a fit and proper person, individual or corporate, to carry on investment business. It will also have the power to withdraw or suspend authorisation in the event of breaches of the rules occurring. The regulatory powers at the disposal of the agency are designed to enable firm and speedy action to be taken to protect investors' interests. They are also hard-hitting and extensive.

Let me outline just some of the powers available to the agency for the protection of investors. It will be able to investigate any authorised business; and it will be able to impose restrictions on the kind of investment business done by any person it has authorised. It may require assets to be kept in the United Kingdom; and it may appoint a trustee to control the assets of an authorised business. It may issue a public reprimand as to a person's misconduct; it may seek injunctions to restrain businesses from breaching or continuing to breach a rule; and it may seek restitution orders for the repayment of losses suffered by investors through a breach of the rules.

Taken together, the range of these powers is just as extensive for the protection of investors as those of the Securities and Exchange Commission of the United States of America. What is more, they will be backed by the criminal law and the full range of criminal sanctions, including fines and imprisonment. It will be a criminal offence to try to induce someone to enter into an investment agreement by making a false or misleading statement, or to engage in any course of conduct which deliberately creates a false or misleading impression of the price or value of an investment.

It will be an offence, except in limited circumstances, for any person who is not authorised to do so to issue an advertisement inviting people to enter into an investment agreement. It will, of course, also be a criminal offence to continue to practise investment business once authorisation has been withdrawn.

As I have said, the Bill provides that the Secretary of State may transfer functions to the agency only if he is satisfied that the rules the agency proposes will afford investors an adequate level of protection and comply with the principles set out in the Bill. These principles draw substantially from the requirements of the common law of agency. Some deal specifically with the new potential conflicts of interest which will arise when dual capacity trading on the stock exchange is permitted from 27 October this year. More generally, the principles include requirements that the rules governing all investment business must promote high standards of integrity and fair dealing.

The rules must also impose a duty that businesses must act with due skill, care and diligence in the provision of investment services. They must make proper provision for the disclosure of interests in, and facts material to, transactions or advice, as well as requiring an authorised business to subordinate its interests to those of its clients, and to act fairly between clients. They must require proper records to be kept and be open to inspection, and they must ensure that there is due regard for the circumstances of clients and that provision is made for the protection of clients' money and property. They must also make the best possible provision for compensation in the event of default by an authorised business.

If the rules are broken, an investor who suffers loss as a result will be able to make a claim against the business; but, to help him avoid having to go to the courts, the agency will have the power to set up an ombudsman or arbitration scheme to resolve disputes. This statutory framework, under which practitioner-based regulation will operate, is designed to promote the highest standards of investment business and deter fraud. It is in the interests of everybody who does business in the City that it should succeed.

Many, if not most, investment businesses may obtain authorisation by joining one of the practitioner-based self-regulating organisations which may be recognised by the agency under the terms of the Bill. Self-regulation has been shown to work, and work well. The stock exchange is living proof of that fact. Self-regulation does not mean relying on people's consciences; it means judgment by one's peers. The scheme proposed in the Bill is in no way a soft option. It will work because it is in the interests of those who will be charged with carrying out that it is seen to do so.

Mr. Peter Thurnham (Bolton, North-East): Will my right hon. and learned Friend clarify to what extent the agency will have the power to ask an auditor to divulge information that he might otherwise consider to be confidential to his clients?

Mr. Brittan: As my hon. Friend perhaps knows, a consultative document was recently issued, and it is designed to explore and consider the way in which the relationship between auditors and the regulators can develop to meet precisely the problem that he has rightly identified.

To qualify for recognition, a self-regulating organisation will have to satisfy the agency that its rules and procedure for enforcement provide investors with a level of protection at least equivalent to that provided by the agency. If a recognised self-regulating organisation fails to continue to meet the criteria for recognition, the agency will have the power to apply for a court order directing the self-regulating organisation to take the steps necessary to ensure compliance. Alternatively, the agency will be able to restrict the types of investment business regulated by the self-regulating organisation concerned, or, indeed, remove its recognition altogether.

This deployment of self-regulating organisations is not some revolutionary and untested idea. Indeed, both the American Securities and Exchange Commission and Commodity Futures Trading Commission make increasing use of self-regulating organisations to regulate investment businesses. Some investment businesses with a wide range of investment activities may have to join several self-regulating organisations or even choose to be directly authorised with the agency for some of their activities. Some may also provide banking services, be registered as a building society or be separately authorised as an insurance company under the Insurance Companies Act 1982. Both the Financial Services Bill and the proposed new banking Bill will lay down the boundaries of the two regulatory systems and provide powers to enable those boundaries to be swiftly adjusted to meet the needs arising from the creation of new financial activities.

Mr. Gerald Bermingham (St. Helens, South): Will the right hon. and learned Gentleman confirm that in this Bill there will have to be a certain amount of tightening-up with respect to, insurance commissions paid to professional persons such as solicitors, accountants and estate agents? Very often the consumer—the purchaser of a house or the person who takes out a policy—is unaware of the exact amount of commission paid to professional persons.

Mr. Brittan: The hon. Gentleman will be aware of the provisions relating to investment on behalf of the professions and the requirements for the regulation of that activity. Those represent an adequate and important new protection.

The Building Societies Bill and the Financial Services Bill contain powers to enable information to be disclosed to other regulators. The Government intend to enlarge the scope of the powers in the Financial Services Bill to enable information obtained under the Banking, Companies and Insurance Companies Acts to be disclosed to other specified regulators in appropriate circumstances.

I now turn to the position of Lloyd's.

Mr. George Foulkes (Carrick, Cumnock and Doon Valley): While everyone recognises the importance of the licensing of insurance companies, can the Secretary of State say whether or not a rumour that is going around, that the proposal is also to license individual insurance salesmen, is correct? There is some worry that it may give them some sort of spurious respectability. It would also lead to a great deal of administrative cost, which might not necessarily be of advantage to the consumer.

Mr. Brittan: We are awaiting proposals on that very point from the MIBOC. No decision has been taken. Of course, the administrative considerations to which the hon. Member for Carrick, Cumnock and Doon Valley (Mr. Foulkes) has referred must be weighed against any advantage that may be seen from the extra protection from the registration or licensing system. I certainly have not reached a conclusion as to where the balance of advantage lies.

Mr. John Smith (Monklands, East): Under the Bill, a self-regulating organisation will be approved by the Securities and Investments Board, which will be able to look at the organisation's rules before approving it. However, it may emerge that some rules need to be changed because they are not working, but the SRO is not willing to change them because it does not suit it to do so. Is it right that the SIB has no power to enforce the change of rule but only a power to disband the whole organisation? This is rather like a nuclear weapon. Will the right hon. and learned Gentleman clarify that point, to which we shall probably return in Committee?

Mr. Brittan: I am happy to do so. The right hon. and learned Member for Monklands, East (Mr. Smith) is not entirely right. The agency will be able to apply to the court for a compliance order. By that mechanism the SIB can deal with a situation in which the rules are felt to be inadequate.

As this is an important point, I should like to explain why we have reached that conclusion. The SROs will only work in the way we want if they attract people of calibre, integrity, experience and knowledge. They will attract such people only if they are allowed to operate in an independent way. None the less, the SROs must not be immune from investigation if something goes wrong. If the SIB, or its successor, is allowed to intervene directly and change the rules, that would undermine the balance between the SIB and the SROs to the detriment of the system as a whole. If a third party in the form of a court is interposed to consider whether there has been adequate compliance with the requirements, that balance would be maintained. There is no question of the SROs being able to disobey the requirements and face only the prospect of disbandment or disavowal. Equally, the SIB is equipped with the real power to intervene if it thinks it is appropriate to do so.

Mr. Paddy Ashdown (Yeovil): Surely the right hon. and learned Gentleman's argument can be reversed—the SIB will attract people of quality and calibre only if it has the power to do things that are important. Would it not be better to give the SIB that reserve power to order the changes and also to protect the rights of the SROs so that they can appeal through the courts if they feel that the law has been overturned? In other words, one would have the presumption of action on the part of the SIB rather than the SROs.

Mr. Brittan: As the hon. Gentleman has fairly put it, it comes down not to a fundamental difference of principle——

Mr. Ashdown: Yes, it is.

Mr. Brittan: No, not of principle. It is a question of where the balance and onus shall be in terms of invoking the courts. It is right to say that if it were done the other way, it would be the SROs that would go to the courts. I think—and I believe that those who have heard my recital on the SIB's powers would agree—that the powers given to the SIB are so substantial that there is little risk that anyone would think that the SIB was an insubstantial body. I think that the balance in the Bill is right.

Hon. Members will know that on Friday I announced that I had decided to set up an inquiry into the regulatory arrangements set up at Lloyd's under the Lloyd's Act 1982. It might be useful to give a little of the background. Hon. Members will recall that in 1980 Lloyd's sponsored a private Bill to reform the constitution of the society. The Lloyd's Act, as it became, created the council of the society and provided for extensive new byelaw-making powers. The council since then has been setting up an extensive and far-reaching new system of regulation. This is a continuing process that is not yet complete, but Lloyd's has already made over 40 new byelaws.

It was shortly after the Act was passed that the facts relating to events in certain Lloyd's syndicates began to emerge — events, of course, occurring before its enactment. Lloyd's has investigated, or is investigating, these and other events under its new machinery, and some of these matters are, of course, currently being examined by the Director of Public Prosecutions. It is, none the less, natural to ask whether, in the light of events, even allowing for the fact that they occurred before the passage, let alone the implementation, of the Lloyd's Act, any further regulatory action with regard to Lloyd's is necessary.

The Lloyd's Act 1982 does two things. First, and of paramount importance, it protects the interests of Lloyd's policyholders. It is buttressed in this by the Insurance Companies Act 1981. Secondly, it regulates the interests of members of Lloyd's the people who provide the capital for insurance business and stand behind the insurance policies.

Distinguishing between those two aims is a tricky problem. The problem is awkward enough for life companies, which are covered by the Bill. Hon. Members will have noted the complex provisions of schedule 8, reconciling investor and policyholder protection. But it is a relatively easy matter there — investors and policyholders are the same people, while in Lloyd's they are different. That is why I have grave doubts as to whether this Bill is an appropriate instrument to cover Lloyd's, even if it were decided that further protection was necessary and that protection had to be of a statutory character.

Because of the genuine concern that has been expressed about Lloyd's I am setting up an independent, full and rigorous inquiry. This will assist me in reaching a final judgment about whether further action is necessary. As the Prime Minister and I have already clearly stated, we will not hesitate to take whatever action we conclude is necessary. This inquiry should in no sense be interpreted as an indication that the Government have concluded that the arrangements currently in place at Lloyd's are defective.

I am pleased to be able to announce that Sir Patrick Neill, currently vice-chancellor of Oxford university and chairman of the Council for the Securities Industry from 1978 to 1985, has agreed to chair the inquiry. I shall announce the other members very shortly. I shall ask the inquiry to consider whether the regulatory arrangements set up at Lloyd's under the 1982 Act provide protection for the interests of members of Lloyd's comparable to that proposed for investors under the Financial Services Bill. The report will be published, and I aim to have it by the summer.

I turn to some other specific points in the Bill. Members of certain professions—accountants, solicitors, and so on—carry on some investment business incidental to their profession. They are already subject to the discipline of their professional bodies, and the Bill will allow those bodies to obtain recognition, subject to meeting the same standards of investor protection as are required by the main regime.

The Secretary of State will be able to prevent a financial firm from any foreign country from doing business in Britain if United Kingdom firms are not given access to that firm's home market, equivalent to that provided by the United Kingdom. The Bill's provisions on reciprocity of access will extend to banking and insurance as well as to the investment sectors. The Bill recognises the importance of investment exchanges and clearing houses in facilitating investment transactions and providing investor protection and contains provisions for their recognition.

Mr. John Heddle (Mid-Staffordshire): Has my right hon. and learned Friend seen a report prepared by the Royal Institution of Chartered Surveyors on the unitisation of property, which advocates a single property unit? In effect, this enables multiple ownership in a single property by the small investor. Does my right hon. and learned Friend agree that, if implemented, that would have the effect of diverting valuable resources to inner city renewal and urban decay? Does he also agree that, if the unitisation of property were a feasible proposition, it might involve amendment of the Law of Property Act 1925 and the Prevention of Fraud (Investments) Act 1958? Will my right hon. and learned Friend undertake in Committee to look at these recommendations to ascertain whether they can be implemented?

Mr. Brittan: I have seen the report to which my hon. Friend refers. It is not free from difficulty, but I am sure that we will want to look at it further.

The Bill also provides a special regime for the application of competition policy to the financial services sector. It reforms the regulation of unit trusts and other kinds of collective investment schemes. It brings together under one statutory roof scattered provisions on public offers.

It replaces the Stock Exchange (Listing) Regulations 1984 and provides a more satisfactory framework for the implementation of the three European Community directives on listing. In particular, there will be a general duty on those responsible for an issue to disclose all information reasonably required by a potential investor. If they fail to do so or supply false information, they will be liable for damages to any investor suffering loss as a result.

The Bill gives the Secretary of State a new power to appoint inspectors to investigate possible insider dealing. The inspectors will be able to question people on oath and require papers and documents to be produced. The Bill also extends the offence of insider dealing by Crown servants to other public servants.

There are three further specific provisions which the Government intend adding to the Bill in due course.

First, in the light of comments on our consultative paper about auditors, we shall propose amendments to enable auditors of investment businesses to have a dialogue with the supervisors of those businesses. In particular, auditors will be expected to report to supervisors when there is a public-interest in disclosure—for example, because of suspicion of fraud.

Secondly, it is intended to facilitate the formation in the United Kingdom of open-ended investment companies.

Thirdly, we shall propose amendments to the Bill to restrict the Insurance Brokers (Registration) Act 1977 to non-investment insurance business, so as to leave room for the emergence of a new institutional structure to regulate life insurance intermediaries.

This Bill is complex and highly technical, but it is also important.

Sir John Page (Harrow, West): I am extremely grateful that my right hon. and learned Friend has referred to the Insurance Brokers (Registration) Act, which is known, nationally and internationally, as the Page Act. There is a rather serious point here for the smaller registered insurance brokers who already have to pay fees as registered brokers under the Act and who, if they went in for life insurance and so on, would have to pay additional fees under this new Bill. Could my right hon. and learned Friend in his kindness think of some way in which this doubly harsh wind might be tempered to the shorn lamb?

Mr. Brittan: I would certainly like to look into the point. I am grateful to my hon. Friend for raising it. I am only sorry that parliamentary convention prevented me from giving the legislation the title that it justly deserves.

It would be absurd to put forward this Bill, which, as I have said, is a complex and highly technical but also important one, on a "take it or leave it" basis, and I shall not do so. We will listen carefully to the views of hon. Members and to points put to us by practitioners and investors. In general, I believe that the balance in the Bill is sound, but we shall respond constructively to what is said during its passage. The Bill will, I believe, provide our financial services industry with a regulatory framework as comprehensive as it is modern. By this legislation we can ensure that both the reputation and the competitiveness of the City are preserved and, indeed, enhanced.

I commend the Bill to the House.

5.3 pm

Mr. John Smith (Monklands, East): I beg to move, to leave out from "That" to the end of the Question and to add instead thereof:

"this House declines to give a Second Reading to a Bill which fails to provide, through the means of an independent, self-standing commission, a clear and direct statutory framework for City regulation, which fails to bring within its provisions some City institutions, particularly Lloyd's, which are most urgently in need of effective supervision and regulation, and which fails to provide to the supervisory authorities the powers which are needed to prevent, detect and punish City fraud."

The need for legislation to deal with fraud in the City and associated institutions is uncontested in the House. We have seen over recent months and years fraud on a scale and to a depth which has caused great and justified concern not only throughout the financial institutions but throughout the whole country. Legislation of this kind, therefore, is long overdue. I do not propose at this stage, however, to go in detail through the complex provisions of many parts of the Bill. That is a task which can be undertaken in a much more effective way in Committee.

Nevertheless, it is important at this stage, before the House decides whether or not to give approval to the shape of this legislation, that we face up to some important and controversial issues which arise from the form in which the Bill is couched and from some of the decisions that the Government have taken. We have covered this area to some extent in a number of earlier debates on the White Paper, and points were made on these occasions about the scope of the Bill. I do not think that the Government have deviated very much from the proposals that were contained therein.

A great deal of the Bill is unexceptionable because it results from the recommendations of Professor Gower, many of which were sensible; these have been incorporated in the Bill. I do not object to the concept of authorisation which lies at the heart of the Bill, but, as our recent amendment makes clear, we believe that there are three important qualifications to be made, three important faults in the way in which the Government are approaching this matter.

The first is the decision on what to include and what to exclude; the second is the technique of enforcement, the whole question of whether there should be an independent commission or whether it should be left to the so-called self-regulating organisations; the third is the question of bringing to book people who are found to have transgressed the laws which Parliament has passed.

On the first point, I find it frankly incredible that at this stage, after what has happened, Lloyd's is to be specially excluded from the provisions of the Bill. We have seen more fraud in Lloyd's in the past two or three years than I hope took place in the whole of its previous history. We saw, for example, £39 million disappear with Alexander Howden, £38 million disappearing in the Minet Holdings affair——

Mr. Brittan: I am sorry to interrupt the right hon. and learned Gentleman so early in his speech but I wonder if he could identify which charges he is making in relation to the past two or three years, which is what he said.

Mr. Smith: They have come to light in the past two or three years. [HON. MEMBERS: "Oh."] We are exhibiting already, it seems to me—or rather the Secretary of State is exhibiting—very great care, before we even get into the question of Lloyd's, to make sure that we are absolutely accurate in what we say. Of course that is fine. I ought to take exactly the same care. He knows, however, perfectly well what I am referring to. He knows about the major scandals that took place in Lloyd's and if he wants me to go into more detail I will be glad to do so, of, for example, the Peter Cameron-Webb syndicate, where something like £130 million has disappeared.

The Minister knows perfectly well that there are people who practise at Lloyd's — some of them have responsibility for this so-called self-regulation — who have had to be brought to book for the way in which they carry out their affairs. Anyone who can speak so blandly about the merits of self-regulation, after having seen what some of these self-regulators have done in their own interests, is someone who is not taking a grip of the realities of the situation.

Sir Anthony Grant (Cambridgeshire, South-West) rose——

Mr. John Smith: I will give way to the hon. Gentleman. I am quite happy to give way to all the apologists of Lloyd's, of whom the hon. Gentleman is, no doubt, another.

Sir Anthony Grant: Is the right hon. and learned Gentleman aware that it was precisely because many of these major scandals were known and because Lloyd's had not the power to deal with them that the 1982 legislation was enacted — and strongly supported by Opposition Members?

Mr. John Smith: It is a touching tale, is it not? All the time that they were really panting to deal with the problem, they did not have the powers in place. Now that they have the powers in place, of course, we can all relax. But that is not the general feeling in this community, and there is still justified concern about the affairs of Lloyd's.

This is a concern which has not diminished with the departure of the chief executive of Lloyd's, whose appointment to that position, I think, lessened the fear that many people have had; the circumstances of his departure are such as to raise once again these very questions about whether Lloyd's can be trusted to look after its own affairs.

There is also the question of the Inland Revenue investigation into Lloyd's, one of the largest ever undertaken by the Inland Revenue. While these two matters, both of which have occurred in very recent times, are fresh in the memory, I do not think that the community will be as easily satisfied as the Secretary of State and his colleagues are.

Mr. Nicholas Baker (Dorset, North): On the answer that he gave to my right hon. Friend who was, with me, a sponsor of the 1982 Lloyd's Bill — since then, I myself have become a member of Lloyd's — what the right hon. and learned Gentleman should be seeking to show is that any of the scandals that he is talking about have arisen in respect of events post-1982, that the council of Lloyd's today does not have the power under the Act to deal with such scandals as have appeared or that there is any negligence or complacency on the part of the council of Lloyd's in dealing with those matters. I submit that there is no such thing and that it is up to the right hon. and learned Gentleman to establish that that is the case.

Mr. Max Madden (Bradford, West): On a point of order, Mr. Deputy Speaker. Would you ask hon. Members who are members of Lloyd's and who intend to speak or intervene in the debate to disclose that interest, notwithstanding whether or not any declaration is made in the Register of Members' Interests? I am sure that it is within your memory that, when the Register was established, clear advice was given that when hon. Members who held an interest spoke or intervened in a debate they should disclose that interest at the time, and not rely on the Register of Members' Interests to declare that interest.

Mr. Deputy Speaker (Mr. Harold Walker): The practice of the House is clear. Hon. Members who take part in a debate and have a direct pecuniary interest in the matter under debate should declare that interest. As the hon. Gentleman has rightly reminded us, every hon. Member is obliged to declare his interest in accordance with the rules of the Register of Members' Interests.

Mr. Smith: I was asked whether I was satisfied that all was well at Lloyd's, and whether I was prepared to accept its assurances. [Interruption.] It is some time since the question was asked, and it was not clearly phrased. Its general import was that I should be content with assurances which appeared to be emanating from Lloyd's. I have already made it clear that I felt considerably disturbed at the departure of the chief executive, and no new chief executive appears to have been appointed.

Mr. Keith Best (Ynys Môn) rose——

Mr. Smith: I wish to make progress. I am willing to be fair and to listen to all members of Lloyd's and all Tory Members with pecuniary interests, but it will hold us up if I do not reach the heart of the debate because of their obsession with Lloyd's.

Mr. Best: I am happy to declare an interest as a member of Lloyd's. The right hon. and learned Gentleman will accept that, if anything, members of Lloyd's have an interest in Lloyd's being included in, not excluded from, the Bill. Does he accept that the successor to Mr. Ian Hay Davison will serve on precisely the same terms? That has been made absolutely clear. Does he further accept that the information contained in early-day motions tabled assiduously by his hon. Friend the Member for Hackney,

[Mr. Best]

South and Shoreditch (Mr. Sedgemore) is known only as a result of the investigations carried out by the council of Lloyd's, as at the end of those investigations matters are made public?

Mr. Smith: Following the departure of Mr. Davison, Lloyd's had to give certain assurances that his successor would have the same powers, but I do not know whether the chairman of Lloyd's offered them willingly. There seemed to be some dissension about the matter. The fact that some controversy existed over the role of Mr. Davison's successor did not make people feel easy about the whole position.

Mr. Foulkes rose——

Mr. Smith: I shall give way to my hon. Friend because, whatever else he is, he is not a member of Lloyd's.

Mr. Foulkes: Can I urge my right hon. and learned Friend not to give way to every member of Lloyd's on the Tory Benches? It will delay the debate, because there are 52 Tory Members who are members of Lloyd's. That may explain why Lloyd's is not included in the Bill.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order. Irrespective of the number of members of Lloyd's in the House, I hope that interventions will be limited and brief because many hon. Members wish to take part in the debate.

Mr. Smith: I hope that some members of Lloyd's will feel that they have made a sufficient contribution already by the interventions which I have permitted them to make.

The reason for a so-called inquiry into Lloyd's which was announced on 10 January was because the Second Reading of the Financial Services Bill was today. The Secretary of State was so anxious to announce an inquiry that he had not even organised the chairman by the time he announced the inquiry. It was imperative that he had something in place when he came to speak on Second Reading. It is nothing more than a transparent device to pretend that the Government are truly worried about Lloyd's.

The press notice which the Secretary of State issued at the time is a giveaway. He explained that the inquiry would consider whether the regulatory arrangements at Lloyd's provided protection comparable to that provided in the Bill, and immediately said that the inquiry

"should in no sense be seen as indicating any conclusion by the Government that the arrangements at Lloyds were defective."

No sooner had he announced the inquiry than he rushed to assure Lloyd's that it did not imply that Lloyd's arrangements were defective. That hardly shows the anxiety which a Secretary of State who is determined to eradicate scandals would exhibit. Therefore, our function in Committee will be to table amendments to remove the exclusion of Lloyd's from the Bill.

It may be that the inclusion of Lloyd's would require special measures, in which case all those involved should provide them. Lloyd's should be included within the scope of a Bill which seeks to regulate financial institutions. If the Government do not give way on the matter in Committee — they show little sign of doing so — the seriousness of their resolve to introduce this new legislation will remain in doubt.

The Secretary of State said that there was merit in self-regulation, but he did not seem to want to go far down that road because he said that some powers would be similar to those which exist in countries with independent statutory bodies. We argue for an independent statutory body primarily because it is independent. The trouble with too much self-regulation is that it can be turned too easily to self-protection. Regulation should be based on an independent commission, as it is in most countries in the western world which have supervisory systems. The Labour party has advanced that view for more than 10 years, and I have noticed recent converts to that proposition.

The problem with the Government's proposal is that recent happenings have caused a loss of faith in the capacity of some organisations to regulate themselves. We are told that, while there may be merits in an independent commission, it would inevitably be legalistic and bureaucratic; the Securities and Exchange Commission in the United States is referred to. We do not necessarily need to follow the United States' experience, even if there is any truth in the allegations, and I am not sure whether there is.

First, there is no question but that in the United States people are much more interested in litigation for its own sake than we are. Secondly, life in the United States is complicated by the existence of federal and state legislation working together. That inevitably means that any supervisory body must be more complex than it would need to be here. I do not believe that any conclusion adverse to an independent commission in the United Kingdom can be drawn from the United States' experience.

It would be much simpler and clearer to move towards an independent commission. It may not be popular with those who are to be regulated, which seems to be the main reason why the Government have moved against it, and it may not be popular in the City, but, with respect to the Government, that is not important. The question in the public interest is: which will provide the more effective system of regulation?

The Labour party is not alone in advancing that view, although it has advanced it for longer than any other body that has commented on the whole question. On 18 October 1984 a Financial Times leader about financial services' legislation stated that the proposals put forward in the White Paper were "only in skeleton form: the flesh and the muscle have yet to be filled in. The preliminary verdict, though, is that the Government would have done better to take a deep breath and go for an independent statutory agency."

I have also recently noticed that Sir John Nott, who was Secretary of State for Trade in one of the recent Conservative Governments and who is now a figure in the City — actively involved in another matter which concerns the Secretary of State and the Prime Minister —believes that the time has come when it is necessary to have an independent commission. There is a growing body of opinion within the City itself that the most effective way in which to approach this matter is through an independent self-standing commission. The failure to take that step forward is one of the crucial omissions of the legislation.

Mr. Brittan: Will the right hon. and learned Gentleman tell me in what way the body which he has in mind will be more independent, more free-standing than the Securities and Investment Board, jointly appointed by the Governor of the Bank of England and the Secretary of State?

Mr. Smith: It would be independent and would not be dependent for finance on the organisations which are to be regulated. The point about a self-regulating organisation is that it springs from the bodies which are to be regulated; they finance the organisation and are bound to have a heavy influence on how it goes about its affairs. It would be possible for the cost of the operation to be——

Mr. William Cash (Stafford) rose——

Mr. Smith: I hope the hon. Gentleman will sit down. I have given way extensively. I must be allowed to develop my argument, particularly in response to the Secretary of State's intervention.

The financing of these bodies is important. I am not suggesting that the cost should be borne by the taxpayers. There are other ways in which those concerned could provide the money. The fact that it is done in its present way is bound to raise some suspicions. [Interruption.] Conservative Members can titter and grimace but they must remember that, to people outside, they look like people defending special vested interest. The interest of this side of the House is to take account of the proper public interest.

Mr. Cash rose——

Mr. Smith: I will not give way to the hon. Gentleman. I do wish that we had decided to televise the House of Commons. If this debate were on television the public would be able to see the vested interests ranged against me. Almost all the Conservative Members who have intervened have a special interest in the context of this legislation.

Another major omission from the structure of this Bill is that it does little in the process of enforcing the law. We may have a detailed and comprehensive system of law but unless it is enforced properly, there is little point in having the laws on the statute book. We have been told that extra bodies will be provided for the Department of Trade and Industry investigation branch. More people will be provided at the office of the Director of Public Prosecutions. The more there are the better. Certainly there is a need for more people to be engaged actively in the detection of fraud which exists in the City.

We know perfectly well that the Conservative party has been content for years to live with the system wherein the detection and the prosecution of fraud in the City was done in an especially lax manner. It is staggering to contemplate the fact that not one criminal prosecution has arisen from the Lloyd's scandal. If the Government gave this the sort of priority which they give to other matters then something would have been done years ago. I remind the Secretary of State of the enthusiasm that has been shown by members of the Government for the detection and prosecution of fraud in the social security system. We have had campaigns by Ministers; one Minister who is no longer with us, his services dispensed with by the electorate at the last election, made a name for himself with his constant obsession with social security abuse. The right hon. and learned Gentleman's Parliamentary Private Secretary has a close knowledge of these matters, and indeed might be called an accidental beneficiary of the electorate's wisdom on that occasion.

The report of the Public Accounts Committee of 7 November 1983 states that there are 5,500 staff engaged in anti-fraud activities. These 5,500 people find out frauds, which are estimated to cost the Department of Health and Social Security £190 million a year. All the social security fraud which is detected and prosecuted is equal to the sum in the major Lloyd's scandal. There are only a handful of people dealing with the whole of the City but thousands are committed to the social security system. The Government constantly tell us about the problems of law and order in our society. The Government tell us of the virtues of the short sharp shock treatment for offenders. I wish that the Government would think of a short sharp shock for some of the offenders in the City; they would benefit greatly from that approach to their misdemeanours.

Mr. John Maples (Lewisham, West): A long sharp shock.

Mr. Smith: I stand corrected by the percipient hon. Gentleman. A long sharp shock is what is required for some of the offenders to stop them practising their trade to the detriment of fellow citizens.

If the Government are at last coming round to do something, belatedly and unenthusiastically, about prosecution of fraud in the City and the financial institutions, they are doing so because of mounting public concern and pressure and because they know that they cannot hold the line any longer. Like the Establishment in dealing with all radicalists, they will retreat in the face of the popular demand for something to be done. There is nothing like the enthusiasm which there should have been from any Government who are possessed with a real concern to bring fraud in the City to book. This legislation avoids some of the controversial matters which should have been tackled by the Government. The time for the Government to be bold has never been more ripe because of the changes to which the Secretary of State referred and which will occur on 27 October this year, the so-called "big bang".

The Secretary of State presented the arrangements that were made between his right hon. Friend the Member for Hertsmere (Mr. Parkinson) and the stock exchange as some carefully planned imaginative change for the future. It is nothing of the kind. It was a hastily cobbled deal to exclude the stock exchange from the restrictive trade practices court. It will bring about a series of changes that will alter the face of the City and which the authors of the agreement had not the slightest conception would occur when they entered into it. The character of the City will change fundamentally. Formal institutions will own stock exchange members; the previous divisions of the functions of the stock exchange will be obliterated. Inevitably there will be large international financial conglomerates. There will be organisations offering a complete range of financial services.

It is bound to be a period of change, a period of depersonalisation as institutions become conglomerates. The old boy system, in which people adhered to a code, cannot be maintained when these old boys are taken over by foreign financial interests. There will be new people, new systems. In these circumstances, the time was never more ripe for an independent commission which could tackle these mighty institutions and not have to depend upon some consensus among the petitioners. The commission should be able impartially to enforce the law passed by Parliament and have the capacity and weight to take on the mightiest of the financial institutions.

Mr. Alan Howarth (Stratford-on-Avon): The right hon. and learned Gentleman earlier mentioned that for ten years the Labour party has taken the view that there should be some statutory self-standing independent commission. Many I ask him why, when the Labour party was in government, it did not introduce such a system?

Mr. Smith: As the hon. Gentleman will probably remember, the last Labour Government of 1974 to 1979 did not have a working majority. That apart, the approach taken by my right hon. Friend the Member for Birmingham, Sparkbrook (Mr. Hattersley) when he was Secretary of State for Prices and Consumer Protection and I was Secretary of State for Trade was that the stock exchange should be referred to the restrictive trades practices court. It was a perfectly sensible and intelligent policy.

The incoming Conservative Government after 1979, and Sir John Nott as Secretary of State for Trade, adhered to that decision. The Stock Exchange was knocking at the Secretary of State's door shortly after that election asking for that reference not to be made. He took the view that the Government should adhere to the Labour Government's policy. I and my right hon. Friend the Member for Sparkbrook were constantly asked by the Stock Exchange not to refer it. Now that the reference has been removed and we live in completely different circumstances as a result of the deal struck with the Stock Exchange, that argument which always had merit, is essential.

There has also been change with new technology, the speed with which money can be transferred, the internationalisation of decisions and a 24-hour market in every corner of the world. Trying in those circumstances to approach the formidable task of ensuring that the law is observed and administered when it involves some of the most powerful institutions in the world and there is only a ramshackle self-regulating orgainsation to do it is not satisfactory. We need a powerful and independent body. It should be the task of such a body to bring offenders to book. At the moment, all that happens is that reports are made by the police or other organisations and sent to the Director of Public Prosecutions.

It seems that a fairly relaxed view is taken about whether prosecutions should be made. Many factors are taken into account, such as the complexity of pursuing the offender and the length of trials. Rich people can influence the decision whether to prosecute by threatening that, if they are prosecuted, the authorities will have a long and complex task on their hands. The same is not true for social security claimants, who are got into court very smartly. The powerful and the rich, because they can complicate the process, can almost buy themselves immunity from the process of prosecution while having all the rights that the law confers on them.

I am all for simplifying the procedure, if possible, to ensure that we get specialist officers. It will not do any longer for a sergeant in the Metropolitan police to be given the task of bringing to book some of the most devious minds in society. In today's Britain, however, they are given a pretty free hand to make as much money as they can. All these things can be done, and I hope will be done, but they would be strongly reinforced by an independent body with some clout.

With modernised markets and as a result of the "big bang", the case for an independent commission is overwhelming. One reason why the Government do not share that view is that they do not want such an effective institution as those who are to be regulated are, by and large, the Government's supporters. Such people are doing well at the moment. Industry has declined and unemployment has soared but the new rich have been created — people who manipulate money rather than produce goods. They have benefited from tax changes introduced by the Government and the near-elimination of capital taxation in successive Budgets. They have benefited from the special treatment afforded to high earners in Budget after Budget. They have benefited, too, from a society which admires prowess in making money. Such a culture is being fostered by the Government.

We have seen, however, that people who get rich quickly are not moderate about pursuing further riches. On the whole, the reaction to getting money easily is to try to get even more money even more easily. There is no doubt that the standards in some financial institutions have been affected by the climate that I have described, which has a great deal to do with the Government's economic and social approach.

The Bill provided a chance to do something effective. That chance has been missed. We shall do our best to improve the Bill, but I am sorry to say that an inauspicious start has been made.

Mr. Patrick Jenkin (Wanstead and Woodford): My right hon. and learned Friend the Secretary of State referred to our right hon. Friend the Member for Chingford (Mr. Tebbit). I echo what he said when wishing him well. I rang up this morning to find out how he had come through his operation. I am told that he has come through well and is making good progress.

The right hon. and learned Member for Monklands, East (Mr. Smith) talked rather more rubbish than we are accustomed to hearing from him. It is right to remember that Professor Gower was asked to make his report in 1981 and that Lord Roskill and his committee were established in 1983—before many people outside had heard of the hon. Member for Hackney, South and Shoreditch (Mr. Sedgemore). The suggestion that the Government have taken an interest in the problems of fraud only in response to public disquiet in the past few months scarcely bears examination. The right hon. and learned Member rather demeaned the character of the debate with his peroration in that regard.

I know that many others wish to speak so I shall confine my comments to the Bill, Lord Roskill and Lloyd's. I warmly welcome the main thrust of the Bill. My right hon. and learned Friend described it as practitioner-based regulation within a statutory framework. I listened to the Opposition spokesman carefully and I am still at a loss to understand what he hopes to achieve by setting everything in a framework which he describes as a statutory commission—a rigid statutory commission.

I suppose that it would be full state regulation run by people appointed by Ministers and under the detailed and continuing scrutiny of the House. That would be wrong.

The reasons are well stated in a recent speech by the chairman of the Stock Exchange who summed it up admirably thus:

"The statutory process is too slow to recognise abuse, too exact in its interpretation of permitted behaviour, and too slow in dealing with offences—if it gets round to doing it at all. If you do not believe me, look at what has happened to insider trading since it became a statutory offence or at the poor record of regulation of dealers in securities directly licensed by the DTI. Changes in the law, furthermore, take too long to be enacted."

In my discussions with people in the United States who are accustomed to operating in markets there, it was made abundantly clear to me that, if they were starting afresh, they would go for a system precisely such as is in this Bill. They would not wish to repeat their mistakes and go for a full statutory system.

London has remarkable financial markets in which practitioners have shown great skill and a talent for innovation and flexibility that has served the country well. Markets need to be able to respond quickly to new needs, new technologies and a new climate. The regulatory system must be able to respond quickly as well.

I spent last weekend in a Group 2000 conference—an Anglo-Japanese group that was set up a couple of years ago by the Prime Ministers of the two countries. One of the subjects that we discussed concerned the differences in access to the financial markets in London and Tokyo. It was said that more than 40 Japanese banks have set up to do in London what they are not allowed to do in Tokyo because it is over-regulated. We urged upon them reciprocity, so that British financial institutions could go and take advantage of the business that is to be done in Tokyo; but the lesson was not lost on our Japanese friends that an over-regulated market is one which actually drives business overseas. If regulation is too rigid and heavy-handed, it fails to allow new businesses to develop and new products to be marketed and these will go to our competitors and not to ourselves.

Therefore, I support the main structure proposed by the Government—if I might so summarise it, supervised self-regulation. As the right hon. and learned Member for Monklands, East said, there is a mass of detail which will require careful scrutiny by both Houses. I think that this will be helped greatly by the document published before Christmas by the SIB entitled "Regulation of Investment Business—The New Framework". I make it very clear that I would support one board rather than two, together with the idea of combining the self-regulating organisations so that there are as few of them as possible to minimise what are obviously the complex problems of conglomerate businesses engaging in a series of separate markets. However, I hope that the extent of the direct regulation by the intermediary body, the SIB, will be as limited as possible and that every effort will be made to devolve the maximum authority to the self-regulating organisations to carry out the day-to-day running.

It is because the SIB has itself to provide for the possibility of it being the direct regulating authority that I think many of the details in that booklet have to be spelt out in great particularity. There is a danger that the intermediary body may itself be too prescriptive and seek to set too standardised a pattern when the very reason for the existence of the SROs is that they are dealing in widely differing markets serving widely differing patterns of investment and therefore needing different regulatory systems. I ask my hon. and learned Friend to say in reply whether even now it might not be possible to have a clearer distinction between the role of the SIB as the supervisory and authorising body and its role when it has to authorise traders direct—that is to say, its function as a regulator.

I wish to say a brief word about Roskill. I listened to the Home Secretary's statement this afternoon. I welcome very much the readiness with which the Government have taken swiftly on board the recommendations of what was by any standards a very powerful committee, which has made a formidable body of recommendations. Much has been done. The fraud investigation group is under way. We heard on Monday from my right hon. and learned Friend the Attorney-General that there are to be increased resources for the Director of Public Prosecutions. The Roskill report shows that a great deal more needs to be done. I simply say to the legal professions and perhaps to some of my right hon. and hon. Friends who are themselves lawyers, that I hope that the legal profession will show the same readiness to recognise the need for change in the legal system in the same way that the institutions in the City of London have recognised the need for change. I agree with the statement made in the leading article of The Times on 11 January:

"The public will not forgive the legal system if it obstructs the bulk of the reforms."

I should perhaps say at this point that I am, although non-practising, a qualified lawyer and I have no City interest to declare.

In particular I support the proposal that complex fraud trials should be conducted by a judge in a special tribunal with assessors. I support the proposals for limiting the prescriptive right of challenge of jurors. The argument is a simple one. A clever financial fraudster—and some of these men are very clever—is not being tried by his peers if they consist of people who know nothing of finance or who lack the ability to grasp complex transactions. It may well be that the mass of repeated small frauds are successfully prosecuted, but the big ones are not and that is not satisfactory. It is right that we should look to our procedures in the courts to make sure that we are successful in prosecuting and convicting fraudsters.

The enthusiasm of the Opposition to see more successful prosecutions for large complex frauds may be measured by their readiness to accept the recommendations of the Roskill committee.

I come to my third point, with which the right hon. and learned Member for Monklands, East also dealt—my concerns about clause 40 and the exclusion of Lloyd's. I am bound to tell my right hon. and learned Friend that this exclusion has caused me some unhappiness. I might add that it did not require the disreputable self-publicising activities of the hon. Member for Hackney, South and Shoreditch under the cloak of the privilege of this House to make us aware of the insurance scandals which have without doubt stained the record of an important and valuable institution.

Indeed, in so far as the hon. Gentleman has indiscriminately mixed well-established facts open to anyone who reads the records of the Lloyd's investigatory tribunals with a welter of personal smears and innuendoes, he may actually—as he has been warned by the City fraud squad—be making the activities of the fraud squad more difficult and the prosecutions which he claims to wish to see less easy to attain. The hon. Gentleman is no different from the sleazier end of the popular newspapers in recycling lurid court proceedings for the titillation of their audience. The only difference is that those newspapers are subject to the laws of libel and slander to which the hon. Gentleman, who well understands these matters, has been very careful not to subject himself. It is, if I may say so, a measure of the changed character of the Labour party that some 40 or 50 of the hon. Gentleman's hon. Friends have joined him in his squalid political vendettas.

My anxieties stem from the other end of the scale, and a wish to restore and enhance the reputation of Lloyd's. It is a hugely important part of our invisible earnings—a huge earner of foreign currency. Moreover, at a time when world capacity for general insurance seems to be shrinking, Lloyd's stands out as able and willing to accept growing volumes of business. Indeed, the chairman of Lloyd's told me only a few days ago that it looks as if the amount of business that will be able to be done in 1986 will be no less than 20 per cent. up on that which could be done last year.

I start from the proposition: when all the rest of the financial services are to be subject to a new regulatory regime of supervised self-regulation, why should Lloyd's be an exception? To this a number of answers are given. First, it is said that Lloyd's runs an insurance business and the new regulatory system concerns investment business; any investment management is clearly incidental — indeed, an intrinsic part of the business of insurance. Technically, of course, that is right, but if one talks to any members of any of the syndicates that have suffered in many cases grievous loss as the result of mismanagment of their affairs by the underwriting agents, I think that they would find that argument difficult to accept. I find it interesting that it is an argument on which not many of those active in Lloyd's place much weight. When people enter a syndicate as names, they are making an investment because they see it as a profitable way to invest their assets and they are prepared to accept the risks. They are as entitled to equivalence of protection as any other investors. I think that is the argument. I do not attach much weight to it.

Another argument advanced by my right hon. Friend, which has much more substance, is that Lloyd's already has its own tailor-made regulating system under the Lloyd's Act 1982. That is quite right, and it is also right to put it on record that all the well-publicised scandals happened before that Act was implemented. It is also right — I hope that people outside the House will note this — to give credit to Lloyd's for what has been done since that Act was passed. A great deal has been done, such as divestment by brokers of ownership of managing agents; a new system of investigation and discipline, which has already dealt with many past offenders; new rules for publishing annual financial reports by underwriting agents; and as important as anything else, new rules and a code of practice covering conflicts of interest, thereby ending the damaging practice of so-called baby syndicates.

All that is already in place, and so it will be with other self-regulating organisations. Therefore, I do not necessarily take that as a conclusive answer.

It is also said that, in effect, Lloyd's is already supervised. There are eight external members of council elected by names, and three members nominated by the Governor of the Bank. In addition, there is the independent chief executive who is also a member of council and deputy chairman. All that is quite true and is a great improvement on what went before.

But will not many other self-regulating organisations have external members and distinguished outsiders? Lloyd's might argue that the three nominated members — Sir Kenneth Berrill, Mr. Walker Arnott and Mr. Brandon Gough — might come to see their function as entirely otiose and worthless if Lloyd's was subject to the general supervision of the SIB. I cannot speak for those gentlemen and have not consulted them, but I doubt whether that is so. As I have said, we want to see the maximum devolution of the regulatory function to the self-regulating organisations, and all SROs will want to ensure that they are fully qualified and capable of earning the respect and trust of those whose affairs they will regulate. Therefore, that is not a argument to which I attach much importance.

None of those arguments necessarily rules out extending the system to cover Lloyd's, but I agree that they are not conclusive. It was against that background that we had the announcemept, with six months' notice, of the resignation of Ian Hay Davison, a man of unimpeachable integrity and ability, whom I have known well for more than a quarter of a century. I think I can accurately summarise his reasons for tendering his resignation. He felt that his independence—essential for the proper conduct of his functions — was being compromised by the relationship that appeared to be developing with the chairman and council of Lloyd's, and that he could not continue to perform his crucial task as an independent chief executive as effectively as had been intended when the then Governor of the Bank persuaded the previous chairman of Lloyd's to appoint him. Much has been said and written about this event, and I have the advantage of having had long and separate discussions both with Mr. Davison and with Mr. Peter Miller, the present chairman.

My conclusion—I put this forward simply as my own view — is that the episode is symptomatic of a continuing division of view within the underwriting community at Lloyd's about just how far they are prepared to let the rules be drawn up and administered with the benefit of continuing expert and independent outside guidance. People in Lloyd's obviously want to see Lloyd's above reproach, while retaining the advantage of a market unique in its skills, enterprise and flexibility. That is a wholly laudable ambition which requires the support of this House, and is similar to the way in which all men of integrity in oher markets are ready to be supported by the device of external supervision.

I would go further: I know for a fact that some in Lloyd's would welcome external supervision as demonstrating their determination to be seen to be concerned to put their house in order. Ultimately that is what this is all about, and that brings me back to the Government's role because there is a political dimension.

Ministers have rightly said a great deal—and it has been welcome — to demonstrate their commitment to securing the highest standards of integrity in our business life. We cannot have it said, however unfairly, that those who cheat the welfare state or the Inland Revenue must be pursued with full rigour but that those who cheat in business may be subject to a less rigorous regime. It would reinforce the Government's determination to rebut this criticism if they were to accept in principle that the system of supervised practitioner regulation should be extended to Lloyd's.

My right hon. Friend has announced an inquiry under a distinguished chairman, whom I have also known for many years, and that will no doubt help to clarify the issues. But in the last resort that cannot alter the political need for the Government to be seen to be doing everything they can to restore confidence in the integrity of our financial markets. I accept that this Bill may not be the right vehicle to amend the Lloyd's Act, but I am quite clear that the extension of external supervision to Lloyd's will have to be done sooner or later. I wish to leave Ministers in no doubt that that is my view.

5.57 pm

Mr. Paddy Ashdown (Yeovil): I listened with care to the speech of the right hon. Member for Wanstead and Woodford (Mr. Jenkin) and agree with a number of the points that he made. In particular, the right hon. Gentleman made a compelling and powerful case in relation to Lloyd's.

The City—Britain's financial services industry—is a major source of foreign currency earnings, the supplier of finance for our industry—a fact that is all too frequently overlooked—and the place to which individual investors entrust their savings. However, it has recently had its reputation damaged with talk of an infestation of corruption and shady dealings.

Unlike some hon. Members, I do not say that everyone in the City and the City itself is bent, nor will the alliance, like the Labour party, succumb to the temptation of blanket condemnation of the whole of the City as a wicked capitalist institution—[Interruption.] The hon. Member for Dagenham (Mr. Gould) may object, but I suspect that the whole of the Labour party is not together on this matter, and many members of the Labour party use that rhetoric.

What cannot be doubted is that there is now so much serious concern about crooked dealing in the financial institutions of the City of London that the City's own greatest invisible asset—its reputation and probity—is being undermined. Proper protection for investors, particularly after deregulation—the so-called "big bang"—will enhance rather than diminish the City's primacy and reputation. It will also make it possible for those who will seek to use the City after the big bang to do so with confidence.

But as the right hon. Member for Wanstead and Woodford said, a balance must be struck. On the one hand, the investor must be protected, but on the other, those within the industry must also have a framework within which they can operate efficiently. If regulations are too onerous for potential investors, users of the City of London will simply go elsewhere, and Britain will have lost one of its primary industrial assets and a great source of wealth.

We therefore believe that it is right to combine statutory regulation with self-regulation, as generally outlined in the Bill. Frankly, it would be wrong simply to set up a parallel to the Securities and Exchange Commission in the United States. Such an institution, which appears from the amendment to be what the Labour party wants, would provide a field day for lawyers in that there would always be a squabble about the letter of the law instead of the spirit of the law being enacted. We are in favour of regulation that permits partnership in a framework of statutory power and policing by experienced practitioners. The statutory framework proposed by the Government is too weak and in some areas seriously deficient.

Lloyd's has been referred to by several hon. Members, in particular the right hon. Member for Wanstead and Woodford, with many of whose comments I agree substantially. As a first reaction our view is that Lloyd's should be brought within the scope of the legislation. These are complex matters and we do not have a closed mind on them. [Interruption.] Labour Members might like to listen. We are concerned to ensure that something is done about Lloyd's but not to ensure that the purely political rhetoric of the Labour party has primacy. The Under-Secretary of State may enlighten us when he is replying to the debate. There appear to be powers in clause 2 to encompass Lloyd's if that is required. An alternative may be to amend the Lloyd's Act 1982 or to choose another mechanism for cleaning up Lloyd's of London.

We cannot accept complacency over the matter. We do not accept that all is well now as a result of the Insurance Companies Act 1982. The PCW scandal and others occurred before that Act was in place but there is evidence that the PCW scandal was merely the tip of the iceberg and that there are still areas of Lloyd's that cause concern. We do not have to indulge in some of the hyperbole that has been obvious to recognise that. The fact and the manner of the recent removal of the chief executive of Lloyd's, Mr. Hay Davison, give special cause for worry and do not enhance Lloyd's tarnished reputation.

We are prepared to listen to the Government's arguments on what to do about Lloyd's. As some have said, there might be a problem in the Bill over hybridity if Lloyd's were brought within its scope. The Securities and Investments Board, as envisaged, would not have enough power to cope with Lloyd's. Our initial belief is that Lloyd's should be drawn within the scope of the Bill, but we are prepared to judge that issue on its merits and as a result of the forthcoming inquiry, provided that inquiry is not used by the Government, as so often in the past, simply to shelve the matter.

However, we are not prepared to sit idly by and do nothing while the reputation of Lloyd's continues to suffer from rumours of scandal and malpractice. [Interruption.] We hear wonderful comments from Labour Members who clearly are driven more by ideology than by good sense. They seem to believe that they are elected to the House of Commons simply to take the dogma out of the last party manifesto instead of using their brains to come to a sensible conclusion about what might be done.

Mr. John Smith: The amusement on the Labour Benches has been caused by the recollection that the leader of the Liberal party only a few weeks ago called for an independent statutory commission such as I have been advocating. Was that his first reaction or is it the policy of the Liberal party?

Mr. Ashdown: I should like to know exactly what the right hon. and learned Gentleman means by the phrase which he keeps using, independent statutory commission. What we are proposing, as is clear from our amendment, is a commission which would indeed by publicly funded; that would make it independent in all senses of the word. We are talking about a commission which should be independent in precisely those terms but would nevertheless be able to combine statutory and self-regulatory powers. What is wrong about that? When the Labour party spokesman sums up, perhaps he will enlighten us. What does the right hon. and learned Gentleman mean by the all-embracing and simplistic phrase, an independent statutory commission? What does that mean in detail?

Mr. Nicholas Baker: Perhaps I could help the hon. Gentleman. I declare an interest in that I am a lawyer. It seems that the spokesman for the Labour party wants a Securities and Exchange Commission on the American lines because he wants to promote work for lawyers. That is one of his aims. The other, more serious and worse aspect of the motivation of the Labour party, is to knock, as it does frequently, an institution whose overseas earnings in 1984 were £564 million. That is what the Labour party is up to. The hon. Gentleman might take that on board.

Mr. Ashdown: I take that point on board but in the interests of time I shall move on to other points.

In respect of auditors, we wish to see a specific duty laid down within the Bill for auditors to report frauds which they discover in the course of audit. We accept that that would change the nature of auditors' responsibility. However, it needs to be accepted that auditors could and should be a key line of defence against corruption and that they simply cannot in the modern world continue to place themselves in an ivory tower where their only responsibility is to the firm which employs them.

The SIB should have a duty to draw up criteria for membership of, approve and amend rules for, and arbitrate in demarcation disputes between, self-regulating organisations. The SIB should have a reserve power to order an SRO to carry out its instructions. It is interesting and contrary to the arguments put forward by the Secretary of State that Sir Kenneth Berrill, the head of the SIB, seems to take the same view—in other words, the onus should be on the SIB to act independently and others should seek redress if the law has been overturned.

The statutes of each SRO should set out a clear line of responsibility for imposing rules of conduct. There will be a real problem within SROs with cross-membership and lines of demarcation. We need to know who is responsible for what, and where the responsibility lies. In passing, as was also mentioned by the right hon. Member for Wanstead and Woodford, there could be a significant danger in allowing too many SROs to exist. A careful eye will have to be kept on that.

We wish to see assurances that there will be a strong lay element in the managing bodies of the regulatory authority and the SROs. The appointment and removal of all SIB board members, who should be full-time, and appointments to the chairs of SROs, should be made by the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry and should be subject to parliamentary scrutiny.

Those are realistic and significant proposals for strengthening the statutory framework within which the City of London can put its house in order. We are prepared to see the statutory framework tightened further if the City is unable to ensure that the self-regulatory element is properly enforced and effective.

As to enforcement and prosecution, the resources allocated by the Bill to investigating and prosecuting fraud are wholly inadequate and will remain inadequate even with the additional resources announced by the Secretary of State on 10 January. Hitherto the failure of enforcement has been notorious in quantity, quality and attitude. The quantity of enforcement is a function of the resources which the Government must commit. That has been touched on by other right hon. and hon. Members. In regard to attitude, no system of regulation will work unless the City wants it to and makes it work. That is why we support a degree of self-regulation.

Achieving the necessary quality of enforcement will not be easy. That is why wiser heads in the City see clearly that unless the brightest and best professionals are working in enforcement, it will not succeed. Indeed, second-rate enforcement paradoxically encourages the wide boys. Therefore, we urge the Government strongly to accept that the enforcement arrangements should satisfy some key criteria. First, enforcement and prosecution functions should be separate although they should liaise closely. Secondly, we are opposed to an enforcement agency which is part of the Department of Trade and Industry because we are unimpressed with the Department's record in policing the City. That should be the exclusive responsibility of a separate enforcement arm of the SIB. The enforcement function should be conducted by experienced practitioners in the City. Service of that nature should be seen as an enhancement to a general City career.

Thirdly, prosecution should be handled by a special unit of the independent service with exclusive responsibility in the same area. Finally, in so far as the police are necessarily involved in some matters because of their special statutory powers, the City fraud squad should be retained but should be considerably enhanced. As with all other aspects of the Bill, there will be boundary problems, but bestowing exclusive powers in respect of the City on this triumvirate of special units offers the only chance of that success in enforcement without which the rest of the Bill is so much hot air.

These regulations should be seen at best as putting the City on probation. If they prove inadequate for the protection of individual investors following deregulation, they will have to be reviewed and strengthened. The Bill proposes a system primarily balanced towards practitioner regulation. It may be that, in the light of developments, we move further and further towards transaction regulation. Review and subsequent adaptation are vital. I note that there is a provision for review in clause 99. In our view, the reports rendered under this clause should be subject to annual parliamentary debate.

It is possible to welcome the fact that the Government have brought before us a Bill to reform the City of London, but it is not possible to welcome the Bill as the instrument of that intention. It is inadequate to the great task that it purports to set itself. The City is a vital institution. We have no wish to see it destroyed or so emasculated that it cannot continue to perform its vital function for Britain. We have no wish to see the City hogtied with the sort of regulations that seem to be proposed by the Labour party's amendment. Nor do we accept the apparent complacency contained in the Government's proposals. We shall vote against the Bill tonight to show our view of the inadequacy of the Bill as presented. However, if, as I imagine, the Bill goes through, we shall have to fight to see that the reforms that I have advocated tonight are incorporated into the Bill in its final form.

Several Hon. Members rose——

Mr. Speaker: Order. Before I call any more hon. Members to speak, I point out that I have a long list of hon. Members who wish to take part in the debate. I have no authority to limit speeches to 10 minutes, but I hope that hon. Members will bear in mind that such a limit on speeches would be helpful to their colleagues.

6.12 pm

Mr. Alex Fletcher (Edinburgh, Central): I listened carefully to the speech made by the hon. Member for Yeovil (Mr. Ashdown), which I think showed the impact of the new alliance politics in Britain, because if I understood correctly, the hon. Gentleman seemed half to accept the Bill. No doubt, in an hour or so's time, his colleague in the SDP will half reject the Bill and then we shall have some idea of what conclusions to draw from their joint speeches.

I congratulate Ministers in the Department of Trade and Industry on the way in which they have presented the Bill to the House. As the House knows, my right hon. Friend the Member for Chingford (Mr. Tebbit) worked hard on the White Paper during his stay in hospital. Unfortunately, he is again in hospital as we debate the Second Reading. I know that he will appreciate the wishes of the House, and the remarks of my right hon. and learned Friend the Secretary of State in opening the debate.

I am completely unbiased — I think that this is a splendid Bill. I shall make two comments about its content. One issue that has come up in every speech, not least in that of the right hon. and learned Member for Monklands, East (Mr. Smith) is why there is not an SEC. Another issue, which has also been mentioned by all speakers so far, is the importance of the enforcement powers in the Bill.

The critics of the Government's proposals opt for some kind of independent statutory commission, SEC or whatever, and this is seen in the Opposition's amendment. However, this has more to do with familiarity with a Government-type commission in these circumstances than with a rejection of the statute-backed self-regulation proposed by the Bill.

Many of us are familiar with the SEC in the United States and similar organisations in Canada, Australia and elsewhere. We are also aware that most EEC countries have heavy governmental control in investment business and insurance. Therefore, it seems to me that the reflex reaction in a debate such as this is to opt for something of the same sort — a Government-controlled commission. However, our needs are different. The United States, Canada and Australia all have federal structures. Therefore, in the case of the United States, Washington needs an agency to apply federal rules and regulations throughout the country. We have no such problem so on that count alone we are different and need to examine the situation differently.

Government regulation in Europe has stifled the development of financial services, not just internally but in the development of financial services throughout the Community. We do not wish to go down that road. Our need is for a system of regulation that builds upon the best that we have at present, and the stock exchange is an excellent example of self-regulation. We have to make the best comprehensive so that it covers all investment business.

It is important, the Bill proposes, that the United Kingdom is subject to a high standard of regulation or, as I would use the term, investor protection. The Bill demonstrates how this can be done without a Government-type statutory body. In explaining the particular system that the Bill proposes, our biggest difficulty is in the use of the words "self-regulation" as if compliance with the new laws and the rules that will stem from them were voluntary.

The Bill makes it abundantly clear that this is not a "take it or leave it" voluntary system. On the contrary, all investment business will have to be authorised by a recognised regulatory body. Therefore, regulation or investor protection in the United Kingdom will be just as compulsory and comprehensive as elsewhere. Perhaps the major benefit of the Bill is that it proposes a system that will be more flexible and therefore more responsive to the needs of fast-changing domestic and international markets —much more flexible and responsive than any type of statutory commission. Therefore, the new regulatory system proposed in the Bill will form a new first line of defence against fraud and malpractice.

I say this because, for the first time, we shall have legislation that requires all investment businesses to be authorised by licence, and because I expect the Securities and Investment Board to introduce stiff audit requirements as part of the fraud prevention process. As a result, the detection of fraud should be enhanced and remedial action should be more immediate. Similarly, complaints from investors should be dealt with more effectively than at present.

It is important to remember that these steps will be entirely additional to the powers that the Government already have at their disposal to deal with fraud or suspected fraud — for example, the powers under the Companies Acts available to the Department of Trade and Industry to appoint inspectors to wind up companies. What matters here—by a happy coincidence, this has already been touched on today by the statement on the Roskill committee — is that the resources available to the Department should also be enhanced to match the powers available in the new regulatory system.

As my right hon. Friend the Member for Wanstead and Woodford (Mr. Jenkin) pointed out, the Government have already taken a number of steps in this direction, such as the Roskill committee, looking at the receivers in court cases, the rules of evidence in jury trials and so on, which is all part of the process of dragging the legal profession into the latter half of the 20th century.

My right hon. Friend also spoke of Lloyd's. The Government have put a sensible proposition to the House. It is correct to say that the Bill is not suitable for amending the Lloyd's Act. I have been critical of Lloyd's over the past few years, but we need to give it more time—the Government say Lloyd's should have until the end of this year — to satisfy the Government as well as public opinion that it is putting its house in order. To back that up the Government have announced the setting up of an inquiry. That is the correct preliminary step for any legislation that might be necessary in the next Session of Parliament.

Mr. Cash: I hope that my hon. Friend will also accept that clause 43 empowers the Secretary of State to remove Lloyd's exemption, so that if, after the inquiry he has now announced, he was not satisfied, he would be able to take the exemption away from Lloyd's anyway. That answers all the points that have been made.

Mr. Fletcher: Another process in the steps that the Government have taken is the passing of the new insolvency legislation that puts greater duties and responsibility on directors. That includes the directors of financial services companies.

In the matter of staff resources the Government need more properly trained and experienced in-house staff to make the enforcement powers work for example, in the Solicitor-General's Office, the Department of Trade and Industry, the company investigation branch and the insolvency services. I welcome the Roskill recommendations and the Home Secretary's statement this afternoon. It is not enough to agree to additional staff numbers. The Treasury must permit the salaries offered to the staff to reflect the market value of the qualified and experienced people that are needed if the Government's attack on serious financial fraud is to succeed.

The Home Secretary referred to the Roskill recommendations for a unified command of fraud investigation. He said that it was being pursued by the Chief Secretary. My right hon. and learned Friend the Secretary of State will know that the last time that that was pursued within Government the Departments failed to agree which of them should be in command of a unified fraud organisation. I hope that in view of the firm recommendations of Lord Roskill the Prime Minister will determine which Minister, and therefore which Department, should take command of a unified structure. Clearly, Roskill has confirmed that, although the fraud investigation group is only a year old, the present split command is inadequate and requires urgent reconsideration at the highest level.

I support the suggestion to engage experienced professional people on short service engagements. They could be lawyers and accountants in their fifties who are approaching retirement or who can retire early who have had experience of audit work. I am not speaking for myself. My hon. Friend the Member for Kingswood (Mr. Hayward) is looking at me quizzically. I am not retiring yet. Certainly, there are people with that type of experience who could do an invaluable job in helping to investigate fraud. I think that it is a good idea to offer those short service engagements to those who might need them in the future.

It is important to remember that the Bill is not an emergency measure that has been brought before the House because of stories about alleged fraud at Lloyd's or Johnson Matthey Bankers or elsewhere. As my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State said, the origins of the Bill go back to July 1981 when the then Secretary of State asked Professor Gower to undertake a review of investment protection. That excellent report was published in January 1984 and led to the January 1985 White Paper which was a follow-up to the July 1983 decision to remove the barriers to competition in the financial sector. The right hon. and learned Member for Monklands, East (Mr. Smith), who opened the debate for the Opposition, referred to the chummy agreement made between my right hon. Friend the Member for Hertsmere (Mr. Parkinson) and the stock exchange. That was a view that some people held then. For all I know, the stock exchange held that view. I know that now the stock exchange, among others, realises that there has been a strong blast of competition through all of the City institutions. The Bill has not been prepared in a rush to meet a crisis. It is a more positive measure than recent comments might suggest. It is aimed at giving investors, at home and abroad, even greater confidence in the United Kingdom as a place in which to do investment business. It is aimed at encouraging wider share ownership and bringing share ownership opportunities to every high street in the country. It is aimed at imposing share shops and generally removing much of the mysticism surrounding personal investment. In other words, it is aimed at enhancing and expanding the financial services sector of our economy. I believe that in the Bill the Government are demonstrating their commitment to a proper and comprehensive system of investor protection. The financial sector in the City and elsewhere in the country must make an equally firm commitment if top quality people and financial resources are to be available to ensure the success of the new system. It is only a partnership of Government and industry that can ensure the success of the legislation.

I am glad that Ministers have made it clear — the Secretary of State said so again today — that, while sticking to the principles surrounding the Bill, they will take a constructive view of the opinions of others. With the best will in the world a Bill is inevitably a different animal from a White Paper and many ideas will flow from the City and elsewhere to members of the Committee. I am glad that the Government will be constructive in listening to any proposals that may be made. There are many important details to be discussed in the Bill and all that I can do is wish it every success in Committee.

Mr. Brian Sedgemore (Hackney, South and Shoreditch): I will begin by ignoring the inelegant personal abuse of the right hon. Member for Wanstead and Woodford (Mr. Jenkin). The answer to that lies in the 800 or so letters and the 50 Christmas cards that I received backing me in the campaign to clear up fraud. The card that I liked most was sent to me by Mr. Peter Middleton who is the permanent secretary of the Treasury. It is a picture of Siena in Tuscany. I believe that Peter Middleton must have known that when I went on my Florentine holiday in the summer of 1985 I was going to spend some time in Siena looking at the banking practices of the Medici in order to compare them with those of the current Bank of England.

The only point that I want to concentrate on is the exclusion of Lloyd's from the Bill. I wish to argue that Lloyd's should be brought within the ambit of the Bill. There are two reasons for that. I believe that the evidence that Lloyd's is prepared to cover up for top people cannot be disputed, and I believe that there are too many people at Lloyd's who do not accept the rule of law. I know that some Conservative Members prefer a general philosophical debate to hard fact, but they will have to listen to a few hard facts. The matter of covering up for top people is important in any society or organisation.

I put down some early-day motions criticising Sir Peter Green, the former chairman of Lloyd's. He responded, as he is entitled to, on Thursday 9 January. His response has caused consternation at Lloyd's because it is unusual for a defendant to point a pistol at his own head, pull the trigger and blow his brains out. I do not believe that special treatment should be given to Sir Peter Green, and I am therefore calling on Lloyd's to help the House to decide whether it should be brought within the Bill to answer the charges that arise out of his defence. He says that I have been unfair in my criticism of the way in which the Imperial reinsurance scheme works. Members of the House will know that Imperial reinsurance is a non-risk reinsurance policy and that it is a banking policy designed to evade exchange control and avoid taxation.

In the light of that I was astonished to read this sentence from Sir Peter Green, as were many people at Lloyd's to whom I have spoken subsequently.

"We were advised by the brokers that such terms were at least as good and in some cases better than any other similar cover available in the Market. In the circumstances, Imperial was entitled to the interest it retained."

I invite any right hon. or hon. Member to intervene if he wishes. The purport of that statement is that it was open to the directors of Imperial, including the past chairman of Lloyd's to steal the interest on the money in Imperial. That was the basis of one of the charges against Ian Posgate, and of one of the charges in the Brooks and Dooley case, and it is the basis of one of the charges being examined in the Bellew Parry Raven case. It is extraordinary that the chairman now admits to what is effectively theft, and, by my calculations, that theft involves over £3 million.

Lloyd's should make a statement tomorrow on why it has been several years before charges have been brought. Lloyd's should say that it is about to charge Sir Peter Green with theft in relation to the Imperial policy and the interest, with a breach of fiduciary duty and with a conflict of interests. If Lloyd's does not do that, it should give us a public explanation. Is it because there has been an agreement to protect the top person at Lloyd's? That would be scandalous, and every Conservative Member would agree if that were so.

Secondly, Sir Peter Green makes the extraordinary statement: "I have paid the tax, or at least the tax which I have not paid, I am about to pay." However, in the statement he does not say why the chairman of Lloyd's had discussions with two Governors of the Bank of England —Lord Richardson and Robin Leigh-Pemberton — and why eventually he was told that he should step down at the first available opportunity. He has not told the people what the settlement was that he eventually reached with the Inland Revenue about the non-payment of tax and whether it involved hundreds of thousands of pounds or—I use my words advisedly—millions of pounds.

The way in which Sir Peter Green covered for Peter Cameron-Webb over the Unimar scandal and the way in which Lloyd's has carried out no proper investigation into that scandal—I know about the Tuckey inquiry—bodes ill for self-regulation at Lloyd's

There is only one basic question that should have been asked about Unimar. Did Sir Peter Green try to find out who the beneficial owner of Unimar was? If he did, he was dishonest in not revealing it to the names. If he did not try to find out, he was grotesquely negligent in his inquiry and never intended to reach a successful conclusion.

I am told that in that inquiry by Sir Peter Green, he had access to all the papers and asked all the right questions. If he had access to all the papers, he had access to the papers that I have in my possession—for example, the letter from Mr. Banyard to Mr. D'Ambrumenil, dated 5 December 1978. Whether Sir Peter Green read it is another matter. The letter said:

"I have prepared all the documentation in respect of the P. Cameron-Webb Whole A C Q S Treaty for the 1st half of 1978 . . . I disagree that they should be issued and will not add my name to them as I am not satisfied that there is not some element of non-disclosure or misrepresentation in the placing of the Treaty.

Furthermore, by giving the 10 per cent. overrider to Unimar the members of the Syndicate will lose this income which amounts to approximately £200,000. It also appears unrealistic to expect £200,000 net profit to the Syndicate under such an arrangement as, taking an average profit on Treaty business at 5 per cent., this would call for a Gross Premium Income to the Syndicate of £4,000,000.

I have no intention of resigning either from Seascope or the Syndicate as I feel fully justified in my refusal to administer this account until such time as it is put right and handled in a proper professional manner.

Mr. Tucker and Mr. Cole join me in those views and so I believe do Mr. Tobin and Mr. Proctor. Mr. Cole and I could not authorise any of the staff in our Department to process this Treaty in the way suggested by Unimar."

If Sir Peter Green had the access to all the papers that he said he had, he had access to the letter from Mr. Tucker on the day he resigned from Seascope, the company that administered the scheme, dated 30 August 1979. He wrote:

"If it is perfectly legal, why does not Cameron-Webb himself pay the commission (it will probably be in excess of £400,000 by early next year to this Monte Carlo Company). If it is perfectly legal why does Mr. D'Ambrumenil refuse to obtain Bank of England permission and that of the Committee of Lloyd's as I have repeatedly requested?"

If Sir Peter Green had access to all the papers, he had access to this letter from Mr. Tucker to Mr. D'Ambrumenil dated 17 September 1979:

"As you know I have been very concerned about the payments made on your instructions to Unimar in Monte Carlo . . . I was told that the Company's lawyers, Morton, Rose, Botterell and Roche, had advised on the matter and that I could see the advice but, in fact, this has been subsequently refused."

If Sir Peter Green had the access to all the papers that he said he had, he had access to this memorandum from Mr. Tucker, a director of Unimar, in which he said:

"The Treaty was placed on the terms of the Treaty as set out in the papers, notably a 10 per cent. overrider and 2·5 per cent. brokerage. Later I was informed that out brokerage was to be halved and given to a broker called Unimar in Monte Carlo. This was unusual firstly because I had never heard of the company —subsequently I found out that Unimar did not exist prior to the Treaty placement. Secondly, the request came from Cameron-Webb, bearing in mind Lloyd's Underwriters are expressly forbidden to deal with anyone except a Lloyd's broker. Thirdly, no check was made on Unimar and no information given, which was abnormal.

At the next Executive meeting I maintained that the Unimar payments were illegal and required Bank of England approval, and even if this was forthcoming, I doubted that the Lloyd's Committee would agree. Privately this latter point had been confirmed to me . . . I refused therefore to handle the Cameron-Webb Treaty and informed the Board that I was advising the staff in my division to have nothing to do with it."

Perhaps Sir Peter Green was influenced by the letter, dated 24 June 1982, from Peter Cameron-Webb and Peter Dixon, who are spending the proceeds of their ill-gotten gains in foreign countries. It admits that the contract and the treaty never expressed the intention of the parties. It claims that they tried to rectify the terms of the contract and the treaty in 1979 but somehow everyone forgot and it was rectified only in May 1982. The letter goes on to assure Sir Peter Green that the contract and the treaty were always honestly administered.

[Mr. Brian Sedgemore]

Could anyone conduct an inquiry with such background and with such documents, and simply present an oral, not written, report to the Lloyd's committee: "I am satisfied that everything was all right"? At least there must be a prima facie doubt in the person's mind. It is outrageous that Lloyd's has carried out no inquiry into that.

Sir Peter Tapsell (East Lindsey): In the past, has the hon. Gentleman submitted all the documents that he has just read to the House to the Director of Public Prosecutions? If not, the speech that he is now making will make it extremely difficult to bring anybody to trial.

Mr. Sedgemore: I am sure that those documents are and have been made available to Lloyd's.

Sir Peter Tapsell: I asked about the Director of Public Prosecutions.

Mr. Sedgemore: The point about the Director of Public Prosecutions is that he will want the papers from the Lloyd's inquiry, which has not been held, to process the matter. Whether he will process it quickly, I do not know. The answer is that, as far as I know, he does not have those documents, but I cannot be certain about that.

In an early-day motion, I also asked that the relationship between Janson Green and Cresvale Securities be examined. In Sir Peter Green's defence, there is a document which he supplied, from Mr. Valentine, who is connected with Cresvale Securities. He says that there has been an inquiry into Cresvale Securities and Janson Green. It was undertaken by Lloyd's, the Department of Trade and Industry and the Bank of England. This information was given last Thursday. That is astonishing.

I telephoned Lloyd's and I have also spoken to those who are advising me on these issues. I did not find a single person at Lloyd's who had heard about any of these inquiries. If Lloyd's has conducted an inquiry, what were its terms of reference, when did the inquiry take place, who carried it out, what were the results of the inquiry and where is the report? Similar questions must be asked of the Bank of England. I am sure that the Under-Secretary of State for Trade and Industry will be able to tell us whether the Department of Trade and Industry has carried out an inquiry.

However, my point is this: is it possible in this day and age for three major institutions to carry out an inquiry, but for nobody—I do not know whether any Conservative Members know anything about these inquiries—to know about its existence? Is Mr. Valentine's information false? I believe I am entitled to say to the House that there has not been a proper investigation of the ex-chairman of Lloyd's. Is that the climate which still exists at Lloyd's? Mr. Peter Miller went to the City forum, which I addressed recently, and said that nobody would get an amnesty and that there would be no cover-up. That suggests that there should be outside regulation.

My last point relates to Lloyd's not liking the rule of law. This is a very important point. A number of people said that they believed that they were defrauded by managing agents at Lloyd's. Whether or not they were defrauded is another matter, upon which they can go to law. However, they said that they believed that they were defrauded and they decided to take legal action. When they decided to take legal action, they also decided to change their syndicate. However, when they tried to change their syndicate they could not get into another one. The only reason given for the refusal was that they were taking legal action against their previous syndicate. That is an abuse of the rule of law. Every citizen of this country has the right to go to the courts to try to establish legitimate, legal redress.

When I told people about this they said, "Well, Mr. Sedgemore, you are not telling us anything new. That is widespread at Lloyd's." I am horrified to find that Mr. David Coleridge, who only recently relinquished the post of deputy vice-chairman at Lloyd's, wrote a letter dated 2 June 1983 to a person who has decided to exercise his legal rights according to the laws of England, in which he said:

"However, my dislike of taking any transfer name, who is contemplating litigation with his former Underwriting Agent still remains. I think I ought to tell you also that Three Quays Underwriting Management Limited, (the Underwriting Agency for Non-Marine Syndicate 190—Dick Hazell) has informed us that they would not accept you on their Syndicate through our Agency if you do decide to transfer."

I am told that there are countless—no, not countless, that is an exaggeration, but many—examples of that happening at Lloyd's. If Lloyd's is not prepared to accept the rule of law and to act without fear or favour in relation to top people, that is surely the most powerful argument one can provide for bringing Lloyd's within the ambit of the Bill.

Sir William Clark (Croydon, South): Despite your plea, Mr. Speaker, we have listened to a 17 or 18-minute speech from the hon. Member for Hackney, South and Shoreditch (Mr. Sedgemore) which had very little to do with the Second Reading of the Financial Services Bill. He used those 17 or 18 minutes to continue his sordid, scurrilous attack upon people in the City, although he is absolutely scared stiff to make those allegations outside the House. He is abusing parliamentary privilege. The only comfort that we can draw from this is that even hon. Members of his own party do not agree with him. [HON. MEMBERS: "Name them."]

I welcome the Bill. It proves that the Government have taken the initiative. I pay tribute to my hon. Friend the Member for Edinburgh, Central (Mr. Fletcher) who did much of the work on the Bill. However, we should be careful not to provide too much regulation. As my right hon. and learned Friend the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry has already said, the City is an extremely important part of our economy. It represents about £6 billion of invisible earnings. The City also provides jobs for 2 million people. We must treasure this.

However, the Government were absolutely right to introduce the Bill. It provides my right hon. and learned Friend the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry with many powers which he can delegate to the boards. The Securities and Investments Board and the self-regulatory organisations will contain outside members. We must make certain that the SROs and the SIB are absolutely independent and that they do not consist only of members of a particular industry. Any future action that is taken must be swift. In the past there was delay in initiating action on fraud. However, the key factor relating to the SIB is that it should be provided with sufficient teeth to discover whether or not fraud has taken place. It is right to leave it to the professionals to run the SIB provided that lay persons serve on it, too. The right hon. and learned Member for Monklands, East (Mr. Smith) said that the Labour party has been committed for 10 years to the establishment of a statutory board. Why the Opposition did not establish such a board when they were in office I do not know. If they had felt so strongly that a statutory board was needed, they could have established one.

We must, however, make absolutely certain that no member of the SIB or the SROs can be sued for libel or slander when they carry out investigations of firms or companies. The members of the council of the stock exchange are indemnified from legal action. I understand that the SIB has provided itself with such an indemnity, but the SROs will be doing the work. They will discover whether or not there has been fraud. They must therefore be provided with a similar indemnity; otherwise it will be very difficult to persuade laymen to serve upon them. That applies in particular to the international SRO.

I have to declare two interests. I am a consultant to the Life Insurances Association and to the Commercial Union. My right hon. and learned Friend the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry referred to licensing. I believe that there should be a licensing system for salesmen of life assurance, whether it be straight life assurance or whether it be connected with a pension scheme. However, it should be qualified. That is what happens if one belongs to a profession. Accountants and lawyers are provided with exemption because they have passed examinations. Provided that it is qualified, licensing would solve many of these problems.

Mr. Alan Howarth: Will my hon. Friend give way?

Sir William Clark: I hope that my hon. Friend will forgive me if I do not give way. I am trying to keep within the 10-minute time limit.

Clause 41 seems to deal with commissions; that point should be discussed in Committee. There seems to be a difference in the treatment of agents. Tied agents are exempt persons and I see no reason why they should be treated differently from agents who are not tied. It has been pointed out that, particularly with the conglomerates, it may be necessary for firms or companies to belong to one or more SRO. There may be some administrative difficulty with that, but that is a major point.

In its new form, the SIB needs to be strengthened. One may compare the stock exchange, which has a staff of more than 2,000 people, with the staff of Sir Kenneth Berrill numbering 40 to 50 people. When such a small body takes on such a mammoth task we must ensure that it is properly staffed. The SIB should be able to take swift action. If anything is wrong, immediate action must be taken and the DPP must be alerted. I welcome the fact that the fraud squad is to be expanded.

I also welcome the possibility of recommendations in the Roskill report being accepted, particularly in the case of large frauds. Lay members of a jury in a case that may last a year, a month or two months become lost and baffled by science. Consequently, it might be a good idea to have the tribunal system for large frauds.

We can maintain the confidentiality between client and auditor in relation to the completion of audits. If an auditor qualifies an audit certificate, it should be automatic that he immediately informs the SRO or the SIB. That would not affect confidentiality because, if an auditor should see something out of order in the accounts, he can question the client and explain to him that reference must be made to that matter in the audit certificate.

I am pleased that the regulations will insist on clients' accounts. There is a loophole in the law that allows many companies to take money from the public for investment or from those going on holiday. That money should go into a clients' account until that contract is completed. That would remove the difficulty that exists, particularly in the travel industry, where firms have gone broke or into receivership and the deposits paid by the would-be holidaymakers have been lost. There would be no question of the receiver having a lien on a client's account.

In future there will be a banking supervisory Bill, and the Lloyd's inquiry. The Lloyd's scandals which the hon. Member for Hackney, South and Shoreditch is so keen to publicise under parliamentary privilege, all occurred before 1982. Since 1982, the Bill has tightened up the position.

I do not think that it is of much moment whether Lloyd's comes under the Bill. That is not a major issue. In view of our reform of social services, the upsurge in the pensions business and the increase in the number of small investors because of our privatisation programme, it is essential that we give maximum protection to ensure that the small investor is safeguarded. I welcome the Bill as a step in that direction.

Mr. Austin Mitchell (Great Grimsby): There is something rather odd in the arguments presented by Conservative Members. The essence of what has been said is that there is something slightly rotten in the state of the City though it is not quite as rotten as my hon. Friend the Member for Hackney, South and Shoreditch (Mr. Sedgemore) implied. Conservative Members say that we do not need to do very much about that. They believe that the Bill, which does not do much, will in the end be satisfactory because we must trust those who created the problem in the first place.

In answer to that, I must state that the Bill is unsatisfactory considering the circumstances and the Government who produced the Bill. The Bill must be considered against an extraordinary background of fiddle and fraud. That might be acceptable to Conservative Members, but ordinary people in the kind of constituency that I represent are aghast and puzzled at what is happening.

The City seems to have shown the ethics of Thatcherism, the spirit of grab and greed and "do it quickly because the country is on a downhill slope" coming home to roost almost like the last days of a decaying empire.

There has been the JMB scandal. On a lending portfolio of £500 million, £248 million was suspect. There is the scandal at Lloyd's—the school for scandals—which has exceeded even its best efforts of the 1970s in the PCW affair with £130 million-worth of losses. Cameron-Webb and his associate made off with an estimated £40 million and no prosecutions resulted. There have been fiddles in the applications for British Telecom shares, with merchant bankers and others making a killing on the applications as well as the killing they were making in fees for their professional services.

Money is being made from the Government's privatisation programme and on top of that there is the frenzy of bids, takeovers and mergers pouring the credit and money available not into investment to provide for the country's future or into jobs, but into a frenzy of speculation. It is no wonder that there is an aura of sleaze hanging over our financial institutions. That is undesirable.

The Government are trying to legislate, but this Government represent many of the vested interests that caused the problems in the first place. One in seven Tory Back Benchers is a member of Lloyd's. The Conservative party has not been too nice about selling honours in return for contributions to the Conservative party's political funds. That party has not been too nice about selling the country's foreign policy in endorsing star wars in return for the hope of contracts to come — though they are almost certain not to come — from the American Government.

The Government's attitudes and ethics are guiding the legislation and it is no wonder that the legislation is unsuitable. Springing from such a background, the legislation cannot be satisfactory and it is hard to resist the conclusion that the Government do not know what they are doing. They commenced with an instinct to do as little as possible, to give power to the boys, to allow them to regulate themselves and not to disturb them too much. The result is the botched job that is the Bill before us. That botched job attempts to deal with a changing situation which is moving too fast for the Government and which will soon be out of control unless strong action is taken to control it.

The measure is vague and at the same time extremely complicated. It gives power to the Secretary of State on the assumption that he will delegate to a body about which we know very little. That body in turn will delegate powers to SROs, most of which have not been set up and therefore have no experience.

Mr. Barry Porter (Wirral, South): The hon. Gentleman has made certain assertions about hon. Members and their connections. At least his hon. Friend the Member for Hackney, South and Shoreditch (Mr. Sedgemore) had the courage to say who those people are. Will the hon. Gentleman give more details about the assertions that he makes?

Mr. Mitchell: The only assertion I made was that one in seven Tory Back Benchers is a member of Lloyd's. If the the hon. Gentleman is interested he can look that up in the Register of Members' Interests.

Mr. Maples: As one of the one in seven Conservative Members who is a member of Lloyd's, I must say that the hon. Member for Great Grimsby (Mr. Mitchell) and his hon. Friends are missing the point. Those of us who are members of Lloyd's are deeply concerned about what has been happening there. The enhanced protection given to members of Lloyd's could surely help us and for that reason we are not standing in the way.

We feel that a designated agency to deal with the securities business in the City of London is not the appropriate statutory vehicle for regulating insurance. The frauds that have taken place in Lloyd's are essentially insurance frauds and if there is an agency to control that problem it should be one to deal with insurance aspects. It should not be confused with the board set up to deal with the business of securities.

Mr. Mitchell: The answer to that is to change the definition of investment and to appoint a special SRO to deal with Lloyd's.

The Government, with their background, are suspect in any decision that they take about Lloyd's. The question that hon. Members who are members of Lloyd's have to answer is whether there should be effective supervision of Lloyd's, given what has been happening there. If they feel that there should be, no doubt they will support our efforts in Committee to get Lloyd's included in the Bill. That would be the most simple, straightforward and direct way to deal with the problem.

Power is delegated to the Secretary of State, who will hand it on to a body of which we know nothing, which will pass it on to SROs, most of which have not been appointed yet, and therefore have no experience, to operate on a principle about which we know nothing and on the basis of powers that they will not have, using regulations about which we know nothing, particularly as regards the important problem of conflict of interest.

In that framework, no one will have power over the SROs and everything will overlap, particularly the jurisdiction of the SROs over the players, many of whom will work under competing jurisdictions.

Finally, the major problem of Lloyd's is excluded from the legislation. It is amazing that Lloyd's has only just required its syndicates to offer a "true and fair" account. Indeed, it was argued that if that requirement were brought in too quickly, 130 of the 530 syndicates would not qualify, because their accounts would not be appropriate.

With all those confusions and gaps, the legislation can only be characterised as typically English, typically complacent and not good enough. The only solution to the problems confronting us is the sort of statutory institution which virtually every other capital market has established. They have institutions regulated by a statutory authority.

Such an institution would fulfil all the requirements in this instance. First, it would be independent and would be seen to be independent. It would be seen to be a custodian of the public interest and of the interests of the small investor and not the custodian of vested interests and those involved in markets. This is not a question of running the prison by allowing the prisoners to take it over; the institution should operate independently and on behalf of the public.

A statutory institution, with a legal base, would have the power to impose its will on the SROs. That is what we need. If the SROs refuse to do what they are asked to do, what will happen? I know that they could be derecognised, but that is the equivalent of dropping an H bomb on them —the ultimate deterrent. That is not an adequate power. We need a statutory authority with the power to impose its will on the SROs if there is a conflict or if they do not move fast enough or cannot cope with the situation.

A statutory institution would have the power to institute prosecutions. The suggested body would not have that power. We need the power of independent investigation and prosecution.

Finally, the statutory authority would need to be strong, because of the uncertainties that lie ahead. We are entering a period of rapid change in technological innovation and in the internationalisation of competition. We do not know what the consequences of the big bang will be.

If we wish to compete, we do not want to have to offer a sleazy, amateur version of Liechtenstein, where we hope to be attractive because regulation is less effective here.

We need regulation to be more effective and we must lead the way in the international harmonisation of regulation which must come. That is why we need a statutory authority.

The consequences of change are unpredictable. We can foresee the domination of the gilt market by two big players, both of them American. What implications does that carry for Government funding? We can foresee the domination of the stock market by big players, with the slaughter of firms and the slaughter of jobs and a takeover by two species of organisation—the international players who are big enough to survive the lean years and the banks, using the profits from their financial business, which has always been operated in a fashion that is harmful to the needs of long-term investment and productive industry.

We need a strong institution with power to take strong stands and to impose its will. If we wish to impose a recognition of the national interest, we must consider who is to be the custodian of that interest in the rush towards liberalisation and a more effective competition.

We must have a strong, effective, independent regulatory organisation with a statutory base. We do not need the confusion, uncertainty and casualness of the legislation.

At one end we are dealing with huge problems of scale and with disciplining and controlling powerful international institutions. At the other end, we need the power to protect the small investor who needs more protection than he is likely to receive from the legislation. It is open to doubt whether the small investor will get enough protection when self-regulation by the ethical wide boys is introduced. We need a strong enforcement agency to provide protection for the small investor.

We also need new rules and it is not clear from the December document on the regulation of investment business that we shall have the firm rules and regulations that the small investor needs. According to that document, even the basic requirements will not be forthcoming or will be introduced only in a half-hearted fashion. It is essential that there should be no cold calling. The document envisages that there could be cold calling, subject to a cooling-off period.

It is also essential that there should be full compensation—or at least 90 per cent. compensation—to investors if an investment business becomes insolvent. In fact, a compensation limit of £30,000 per customer is envisaged.

It is essential that independent intermediaries should have to declare their commission so that anyone who is having policies or investments pushed on him can assess what is in it for the person pushing them and his motives for pushing them. In the December document, that issue is fudged. It seems that no requirement for such a declaration is envisaged.

There is a need for a prominent statement of the cash-in, surrender or maturity values of policies, but it is not clear whether we shall get that requirement. There also needs to be a statement of all charges being imposed; we need a standard statement so that people can evaluate one policy against another. Again, it is not clear from the document whether we shall get that.

An independent investment ombudsman is needed to whom complaints can be referred, so that people can be satisfied that their complaints are being investigated. There has been talk of an ombudsman, but the way that it has been expressed could mean a multiplicity of ombudsmen. Investment businesses must be fully responsible for their salesmen, so that if there are persistent breaches of rules by salesman the company and the salesmen can be disciplined. However, what is envisaged is a simple licensing scheme for salesmen rather than a regulation under which the companies can be disciplined.

The regulations to be made under the Act are unknown and we do not know how they will operate. There is far too much uncertainty. Too little is being done to protect the small investor. There is also uncertainty about how to deal with the big people at the other end of the scale.

The Bill is like so much else that has come from the Government—a limited step. It is a step on the right road that should have been taken years ago, but it comes too late and it does not cover the real problem. The Bill is half-hearted and it is a wasted opportunity. We shall do our best to improve it in Committee.

Sir Anthony Grant (Cambridgeshire, South-West): In a rather woolly speech the hon. Member for Great Grimsby (Mr. Mitchell) made one or two good points. His basic premise was wrong, but I share his desire to help the small investor and to ensure that there are strong powers in the Bill. However, when he mentioned honours and star wars, I concluded that he was doing what all of us sometimes must do, which is to respond to the requests of the Whips to keep the debate going from one to one on either side.

I declare all my interests on the register and especially my capacity as adviser to Barclays bank and Bowring insurance brokers. I am not and have never been a member of Lloyd's, which is far too risky for me.

I declare another interest. Many years ago I was a founder member of the wider share ownership movement with the late Maurice Macmillan. In those happier days we had the support of Labour Members, which was very valuable. I am pleased that recently the cause has obtained the support of the Chancellor of the Exchequer.

I formed the group with Maurice Macmillian because I believe in the spread of wealth and ownership throughout our community. To achieve such a spread, the small investor must be encouraged. However, he will not be so encouraged if he is not adequately protected against those who must bluntly be called crooks. He does not need to be protected against honest risk because that is what investment is all about, but he must be adequately protected against fraud. That must be the fundamental purpose behind the Bill, and it should be the policy of any Government.

I declare another interest. I am a past master of the Guild of Freeman of the City of London. I spent 20 years working professionally in the City of London, of which I am a liveryman. It is immensely sad that the standards that prevailed when I started working in the City have, alas, deteriorated. Far too many flash Harrys attracted to the City are long in aggression and cunning but short in morals. In the City the old saying used to be "My word is my bond." All too often now if a man says that his word is his bond, one would be well advised to insist on taking his bond.

The rewards of fraud are substantial and they make the great train robbery look like minor pick-pocketing. It is one thing to pass a law but it is quite another to enforce it. It is vital that the fraud squad and those engaged in enforcing the law should have adequate resources. For far too long they have worked on the man and boy principle. They have worked valiantly and done their best, but the villains have flown too rapidly and easily.

I was pleased to see that in answer to a question on Monday 13 January from my hon. Friend the Member for Harrow, East (Mr. Dykes) the Attorney-General announced increases in resources and in the staff of the fraud squad. I do not know whether they will be adequate. Much more must be done to improve the quantity and quality of those who enforce the law if we are to achieve our objectives. Some fraud is now big business and is on an international scale.

If the Roskill report is implemented, it will be of great value. I believe in trial by jury and consider that it is fundamental to justice. However, there is a good case for considering the report's proposal that complex fraud cases should be heard by a judge and two assessors. The Opposition are justified in saying that many people are prosecuted — quite rightly — for small social security frauds. Those simple cases are easy for a jury to understand, but major fraud cases, where millions of pounds are involved, can be immensely complex and can be made even more complex.

When I practised in the City, the standard defence was to make the case as complicated as possible. Jurors are irritated in the first instance to be made jurors because it interferes with their lives. They are annoyed to discover that it is not a juicy murder or sex case that they can understand. They are angry to find that they have three or four weeks to sit through a monumentally complicated fraud case. If the case is made more complex, the jury will take the easy course and acquit the defendant. The Roskill proposals merit further consideration. I am sorry that they were treated so half-heartedly by the Opposition. When they have had a chance to digest the proposals fully, I hope that they will realise that the Roskill proposals could be a valuable implement to provide a deterrent to the worst fraudsters.

Happily, dishonesty is confined to a small minority, but that small minority does huge damage to the reputation of the City. We must be careful that any legislation is not a steam roller to squash the ants in the strawberry bed. The Government seek to enact the Bill before the big bang in the autumn, which is the revolution whereby brokers, jobbers, and banks will merge and there will be an invasion of foreigners. That is already taking place — notably by Americans with very large purses.

The intention is to enable the City to compete in an increasingly tough international market and to enable us to use the traditional expertise of the City institutions that contribute so much to the British economy. New regulation of new activities is necessary. We cannot have a free-for-all and no one would suggest that we should.

A Securities and Exchange Commission on American lines is sometimes suggested, but I believe that that would be undesirably rigid and would hamstring the City at a time when it needs the flexibility to compete internationally. It is significant that the chairman of the SEC in the United States is not wholly satisfied with his commission. I am not surprised. He is looking with envious eyes at what we are doing. The Government are right to reject that solution.

I do not believe that the Opposition's amendment would do anything to achieve the desired effect. The object is to achieve the right balance, and I believe that the Bill does that. The hon. Member for Great Grimsby should realise that the powers reserved to the Government are considerable should the self-regulation fail.

The big bang or City revolution poses a problem that the Bill does not solve. I wish to put that problem to my hon. and learned Friend who is to reply. It relates to conflicts of interest. I did not catch the remarks made by my right hon. and learned Friend the Secretary of State about the agency and whether it could lay down principles, but no doubt my hon. and learned Friend will clarify the point when he replies.

As one who took through the Lloyd's Bill in 1982, I find it ironic that the stock exchange, which strongly supported me, as did the House, in separating brokers from underwriting agencies to avoid conflict, has now gone the other way. It has merged brokers and jobbers. That has caused the problem. They are plainly forming the huge conglomerates which will be needed to compete internationally. I am involved with one of them. Banks, jobbers and brokers work together as a conglomerate to compete against big competitors abroad.

There is at law a broker-client relationship of trust. It is one of principal and agent between the broker and the client. However, the jobber at the other end of the corridor might be innocently and honestly making the market itself. There is a possibility that a conflict will arise. We are told that the so-called Chinese walls of the City will prevent any such difficulty. I venture to doubt that, because an aggrieved client may well sue. As I understand it, the Government say that if that happens the courts will resolve the problem and we shall have a body of case law and understand what it is all about.

How can the City wait three years in this competitive business while a possibly vexatious litigant pursues a claim which may well be rejected? We may have to wait even longer if, as someone has suggested, the Law Commission studies the problem of principal and agent. That is a genuine dilemma for those working on the new revolution and trying to make it work well for Britain. I hope that when he replies my hon. and learned Friend will give some reassurance to those people who are anxious about that issue.

A great deal of nonsense has recently been talked about Lloyd's. I repeat that I am not and never have been a member of Lloyd's, but I carried the Lloyd's Bill through the House in 1982. I was then well supported by the Labour Opposition. The Committee, which was most ably chaired by the hon. Member for Oldham, West (Mr. Meacher), scrutinised the Bill with the greatest care and approved it, as did the House, with a substantial majority.

The Bill, which was a private Bill, was scrutinised by the House for a record length of time. Opposition to the Bill came from my hon. Friends who thought that it was too tough and rigorous. The Lloyd's Bill, which was largely an enabling measure, was valuable and necessary to bring Lloyd's up to date—something which had not been done since 1871. Under that measure, Lloyd's publishes new regulations. It has done so almost every week. As far as I can discover, there has been no objection to the new regulations. Lloyd's has also used its new powers to pursue miscreants, all of whose misdeeds occurred before the passing of the 1982 Act.

I believe that the hon. Member for Hackney, South and Shoreditch (Mr. Sedgemore) was right to castigate the scandalous goings on in Johnson Matthey Bankers. However, he has gone hopelessly adrift over Lloyd's. In so far as his allegations are true—and many of them are—they are old hat and have been or are being dealt with. The latest points that he has made would carry more conviction if he uttered them outside the House. While his campaign has done little to help British companies compete abroad, I am sure that we all rejoice that it has helped him in his battle for reselection, about which we are all delighted.

I wish to deal with the suggestion that Lloyd's should be brought within the scope of the Bill. It is probably impractical and certainly premature, but I do not take a rigid view about it. I respect what my right hon. Friend the Member for Wanstead and Woodford (Mr. Jenkin) said. I understood his argument, but he overlooked one rather important point. When the scandals were emerging and my Bill—I call it my Bill—was going through, every attempt was being made by our competitors overseas to knock Lloyd's and to say that it was a scandalous place which was not working and was out of date. When the Bill was passed and we could take action over those scandals, our competitors' criticism was largely muted and Lloyd's business continued happily overseas, to Britain's benefit.

If it is suggested that the 1982 Act and the regulations stemming from it are insufficient, or that Lloyd's was not using its powers adequately, that could have an adverse effect upon our competition overseas and would give the impression that we do not know what we are doing.

Having said all that, no one can suggest that everything is perfect. The right course to be taken, therefore, is the one taken by my right hon. and learned Friend—to set up an inquiry to investigate whether Lloyd's powers are inadequate and are not being handled properly. If that is so, amending action can be taken.

To bring Lloyd's within the Bill would do nothing. It would not give it any more powers or make them more effective than those it already has under the 1982 Act. More powers may be required——

Mr. John Butterfill: Does my hon. Friend agree that it would be illogical to bring Lloyd's into the scope of the Bill without bringing in the remainder of the general insurance market?

Sir Anthony Grant: That is right. That is why I said that it was certainly premature and probably impractical. I agree entirely with what my hon. Friend says.

The Government have adopted the right course. We should judge by uses, not abuses. The overwhelming majority in the City are honourable people contributing to our society and to the British economy. The overwhelming number of people in Lloyd's and the insurance market are honourable and honest, contributing vastly to Britain's invisibles and overseas earnings. Brokerage and insurance contribute well over £1 billion per annum to our invisibles. Lloyd's gives honest and honourable direct and indirect employment to about 83,000 people.

The Bill can be improved in Committee. All Bills can. The Bill is a brave and skilful attempt to steer a course between the rocks of excessive rigidity and the whirlpool of financial anarchy. It should be given a Second Reading as a preliminary to ensuring that London remains the world's financial centre.

Mr. D. N. Campbell-Savours (Workington): We shall have the opportunity to debate much of the Bill's detail in Committee. Those of us who are fortunate enough to be selected by the Committee of Selection look forward to those debates.

I should like to take up one thing that the hon. Member for Cambridgeshire, South-West (Sir A. Grant) said. He referred to the good old days when one's word was one's bond in the City. The old school tie in Threadneedle street is having to give way under the new arrangements to the stiletto in Shoe lane. Values are changing in the City. There will be a substantial change on 17 October when the big bang takes place and we see a completely new regime effectively taking over many city institutions.

I believe that the contribution of my hon. Friend the Member for Hackney, South and Shoreditch (Mr. Sedgemore) to these debates in the past few months has been crucial. On the margin one is bound to be slightly inaccurate—that is the way of the world—but 99 per cent. of the arrows that he has fired since the beginning of his campaign have hit home.

The measure of how successful he has been in his campaign is seen in the antagonism shown by Conservative Members. Ministers, including the Chancellor of the Exchequer, and Back Benchers have repeatedly and systematically set out to attack him and undermine him personally. In the way he has persisted he is serving the public interest and in the end his efforts will be adequately rewarded by way of legislation, whether it is produced by this Government or by the next Labour Government. The demise of this Government will come with the discrediting of free market principles, particularly those being practised in the City.

Mr. Nelson: That is what the Opposition are about.

Mr. Campbell-Savours: The hon. Gentleman says that that is what we are about. It is the business of any hon. Member of this House to draw attention to deficiencies in that area, and if legislative change is required, then that is precisely what we are about. I am glad to see that the hon. Gentleman endorses our position. There is clear evidence that the recent spate of City scandals has done considerable damage to the Government, and unless the Government act to deal with these matters of great public concern, more damage will be done. The Government are caught by a Catch 22. If the restrictions they introduce in the City are too fierce, business will be lost, but if the regime they introduce is too liberal, the Government will lose credibility.

In terms of debate that provides us with the ultimate irony. Modern capitalism, when revealed to the public in its raw, unbridled, unregulated, unrestrained and unattended state, is ugly. It is violent and repulsive to public opinion. That does not necessarily mean that I am in favour of planned economies or extreme economic principles. I believe in a mixed economy, but it has to be a mixed economy based on clear regulation and firm rules which cut out the excesses of those who wish to abuse the legal framework.

In whatever area one looks, the argument today is for intervention. This is non-intervention, and it is pleasing to know that during this debate some hon. Gentlemen from the Government side are courageous enough to stand up and say that they recognise the need for intervention. They understand the need for compromise, and I hope when we go into Committee in a few weeks time we can forge some cross-party alliances with the single intention of strengthening the Bill in the areas of weakness outlined by my hon. Friends and contained in the speeches by hon. Members opposite.

The Bill certainly needs strengthening in its application to Lloyd's. That fact has been recognised by Mr. Stephen Merrett, the chairman of one of our largest underwriting groups. A recent newspaper report said:

"Mr. Stephen Merrett, chairman of one of the largest underwriting groups in the market, has told names on his syndicates that Lloyd's disciplinary rules introduced following the 1982 Lloyd's Act 'have not had quite the effect that we would have liked.'

Mr. Merrett cited the delay in bringing members to account and publicising major investigations as one way in which the new rules are not working fully. He has also talked of 'the extraordinary levity of the sentences in view of the seriousness of the crimes of which people have been accused.'"

He goes on to say:

"Where persons have a responsibility for the unlimited liability of members of the society we believe it to be quite wrong for theft, fraud or misappropriation of one kind or another to be treated as if it were a matter of no great consequence and appropriate only for a temporary suspension."

Those are the words of a senior man in Lloyd's. They are not the words of a Labour Back Bencher, but of a man working daily in the market. He understands how the market works and he is clearly demanding far higher standards. He deserves the support of this House.

It may be that Mr. Merrett was one of those who sat through the proceedings of the Bill in 1982. I remember the night well. I sat in this very place next to my hon. Friend the Member for Oldham, West (Mr. Meacher). The Benches were packed on the Government side, but what was more remarkable was the crowd in the Gallery. I think it was about 11 o'clock at night and one could not move in the Gallery. A suited army of citizens from the City was there to pay regard to our performance and our proceedings, and they knew what was happening. I believe that many of the people in the Gallery that night knew that the House was being deceived. They knew that the Bill before us would not work and that in the end statutory regulation would be necessary. Perhaps the same gentlemen are here tonight to watch our debate. It may be that there are those among them who recognise the great deficiency that has been thrown up in the last few years.

Sir Anthony Grant: Will the hon. Gentleman give way?

Mr. Campbell-Savours: I will. I know that the hon. Gentleman was here that night.

Sir Anthony Grant: The hon. Gentleman will find that the greatest interest in the Gallery was shown by those who were anxious to see that the powers proposed in the Bill were going to be in the Bill and not defeated by my hon. Friends.

Mr. Deputy Speaker (Sir Paul Dean): Order. It is not in order to refer to the Gallery.

Mr. Campbell-Savours: I am sure I can refer to the Gallery "on that occasion" insofar as I am not referring to it tonight. I do not know who was in the Gallery but I know they were all gentlemen from the City and that they had come to watch our proceedings. They seemed enormously pleased with the work done by my hon. Friend. I remember thinking to myself, "There is something wrong. It cannot be right that my hon. Friend is gaining all this support."

Mr. Hugh Dykes (Harrow, East): Why don't you get on with it?

Mr. Campbell-Savours: Perhaps the hon. Gentleman wishes to intervene.

The Government response to arguments about Lloyd's has been to produce a rabbit out of a hat in the form of an independent inquiry. We are not fooled, because it seems that this decision to produce a rabbit out of a hat was taken only last week. An announcement was made last Friday and built into the statement, as my hon. Friend has said, was a quote from the Secretary of State which in itself set out to undermine the inquiry. The quote said:

"It did not mean that Government felt Lloyd's arrangements for self-regulation were defective."

The Government set up an inquiry and in doing so said that they did not believe the rules were defective. To some extent that could set the terms of reference for the inquiry. Perhaps, within the curious logic practised by the Secretary of State or the Under-Secretary, hon. Members can find some other way of interpreting that statement.

Mr. Butterfill: Does the hon. Gentleman not agree that it would be even more of a rabbit out of a hat if we were to tag Lloyd's on to this Bill without thinking how it would relate to the Bill?

Mr. Campbell-Savours: As I understand it, we could well have introduced legislation with this Bill to deal with Lloyd's. Nothing prevents us from doing that and it would have been in order, so I cannot see the point made by the hon. Gentleman. He may believe that it would require a different approach, but we were in a position to legislate during the course of the Bill to deal with the problem of Lloyd's. I am sure the hon. Gentleman accepts that. The Government are refusing to place on record the fact that something is wrong. They have spent the last 12 months denying the fact that there has been inexcusable activity in various parts of the City. The Government should ask some of their hon. Friends who lost money in Lloyd's. Those hon. Members have only recently been surfacing.

Salaries in the City are another matter of concern. The major expansion in the City is fuelling a pay explosion. Mr. Nigel Halsem, the managing director of the Michael Page Partnership, a City employment agency, says that salaries have doubled in two years in the Eurobond market. He says that it is commonplace for salaries of £50,000 basic and perhaps a further £150,000 commission to be paid. Some people may say, "The best of luck to those who are capable of earning such salaries when they are young men." What about the people in the country who say, "Where is the fairness in those people earning such high salaries? Is it reasonable that they can secure such high income levels through high commissions?"

Recently, a 31-year-old Eurobond dealer moved from a British to an American bank in the City for a basic salary of £62,000 a year with a guaranteed bonus of £100,000 after two years and a possible bonus of £300,000 if he performs well. A 28-year-old went to an American bank for a basic salary of £50,000 a year and a slice of 20 per cent. of the profits that he makes for the firm — guaranteed £250,000 a year. In a typical deal, a 28-year-old analyst earning £35,000 with one firm of City stockbrokers was lured to another firm under American control for a pay package of £130,000, including incentive bonuses. Those are almost football transfer fees.

Mr. Butterfill: Or SOGAT.

Mr. Campbell-Savours: Will 27 October and the big bang deal with this? Estimates suggest that large overseas operators are pumping hundreds of millions of pounds into the City to buy up talent. Will salaries fall when the big bang comes? How will the market respond? Will the operators stop this practice, which is referred to as "churning"? Will they start involving themselves in unnecessary transactions simply to boost their incomes on the back of commissions? Some people do not like pay cuts. How does the City intend making up the salaries of those with a high salary expectation?

The role of the banks is another matter of concern. One of the more positive aspects of the attack by the former Secretary of State for Trade and Industry on restrictive practices in the City was the ending of fixed commissions. Since then, there has been a steady movement of large international financial institutions, including banks, into the City. Will the banks cross-subsidise from orthodox banking to dealings in the City? We know that the fiercest of competition will be in gilts. At the moment, two jobbers have 80 per cent. of the business — Akroyd and Smithers, owned by the bankers S.G. Warburg, and Wedd Durlacher Mordaunt and Co., partly owned by Barclays, another bank. They rely on fixed commissions. Next year, 29 market makers take over. One United States firm has said that it will not make money for at least seven years. I am told that some banks will be in on that market, but how will they pay for it? There seems to be only one possible way to pay for it — to cross-subsidise. Who pays?

Mr. Austin Mitchell: I do, with my overdraft.

Mr. Campbell-Savours: My hon. Friend is absolutely right.

Mr. John Browne (Winchester): What about the chairman?

Mr. Campbell-Savours: The hon. Member for Winchester, (Mr. Browne) knows who will pay. I think that he is a consultant to one of the clearing banks. I am sure that he would want to explain to the House how it intends funding the losses expected in the gilts market. Some of his colleagues seem to agree partly with my suggestion that there might be a high level of cross-subsidy. Unless the banks cross-subsidise, foreign institutions will move into the market to take it over. It is predicted that within a few years gilts will be under the control of foreign institutions. Perhaps some hon. Members would like to intervene to tell me that I am wrong and that that will not happen.

Mr. Dykes: No.

Mr. Campbell-Savours: The hon. Member for Harrow (Mr. Dykes) does not want to be bothered.

Mr. Austin Mitchell: My hon. Friend is right. All the viable industries and firms that have been put out of production and closed down by the banks will at least have the satisfaction of knowing that their money will subsidise the banks in the gilts market.

Mr. Campbell-Savours: What can I add to my hon. Friend's wisdom? A Labour Government will not want foreign control of that market. We will want United Kingdom control. We may well have to act to restore control because of the conditions that have been created.

The role of auditors is of concern. I agree wholeheartedly with the hon. Member for Yeovil (Mr. Ashdown) in this respect. He referred to his reservations and to the recent Green Paper which deals with the new responsibilities of auditors. The Green Paper states that, in the spirit of deregulation, confidentiality does not prevent disclosure to an appropriate authority where public interest is involved. This would include cases of suspected fraud and any breach of a statutory duty liable to cause significant harm to a third party. The Secretary of State used the word "expect"—so this is only an expectation of the auditors. The right hon. and learned Gentleman said that the Government might introduce amendments to deal with this aspect. I hope that, in doing so, he accepts that we should place statutory responsibility on the auditors to report where they find fraud. Under this method of self-regulation, the system does not work.

Auditors that operate under the Companies Acts are subject to two types of control — Companies Act legislation and professional rules of conduct laid down by the institute of which they must be a member. The Companies Act 1985 contains two relevant sections. Section 237 states the circumstances in which an auditor must qualify his report on the accounts. This includes cases where proper account of records has not been kept. Section 393 strengthens the powers of the auditor by making a criminal offence of anything that which is

"conveys or purports to convey any information or explanation which the auditors require"

"misleading, false or deceptive in a material particular."

The guidelines issued by the accountancy profession are more vague. The guidelines issued by the Institute of Chartered Accountants in guidance note 1306 on the disclosure of defaults or unlawful acts states:

"It is an implied term of a member's contract with his client that a member will not, as a general rule, disclose to other persons information about his client's affairs acquired during and as a result of their professional relationship"

during an audit

"against his client's wishes. Therefore, where a member becomes aware that a client has committed a default or unlawful act, the member should in principle keep the matter between himself and his client by virtue of the contract. A member who acquires knowledge of the commission of a criminal offence (other than treason), or a default which is a civil wrong, is under no legal obligation to disclose what he knows to a proper authority. There are, however, circumstances in which, in spite of the contractual position, a member may be obliged to disclose information to the authorities or may be free to do so if he wishes".

Then it sets out the circumstances:

"(a) the auditor is obliged to disclose information by a Court; (b) or where the client has authorised disclosure; or (c) where there is a public duty to disclose information."

The code of practice says:

"Council therefore recommends that members, even though free to do so, should not disclose past or intended crimes or civil wrongs (except treason) which they are legally obliged to disclose unless they feel that the damage to the public likely to arise from the non-disclosure is of a very serious nature."

The truth is that there are no real obligations. Unless this is reinforced in the Bill, once again these people will escape. In my view, self-regulation in this particular area is out.

Is the Bill strong enough? Sir Kenneth Berrill is unhappy and has made his discontent public. He says that he "wants stronger powers to discipline the SROs". He wants the SIB rules to have precedence over SRO rules. What we want is a statutory body with teeth, real power to police the City, something akin to what is available in America, but different.

There has been so much discussion tonight about the difference between what we want and what is available that I can only compare what the Government want to set up with Securicor and what Labour Members want with the Metropolitan police. Perhaps that is the best distinction that one can draw. There is a distinction and it is an important one. Securicor is privately funded. It has powers, the powers available to any citizen. It even has the power of arrest, the citizen's power of arrest. The Metropolitan police force is a statutory authority. In so far as the Metropolitan police would appear to be an effective policer of London, I should have thought that a similar body operating in the City would be seen to be an effective policer of City institutions.

The statutory body would define rules and the SROs would comply. Default would lead to trouble. At the moment we do not even know what the rules are. I hope that we shall learn much in Committee about the intention of the Government in that particular regard.

Several hon. Members rose——

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order. May I repeat Mr. Speaker's appeal for brevity? Many hon. Members still wish to speak and time is getting short.

7.52 pm

Mr. Anthony Nelson (Chichester): It is always a pleasure to follow the hon. Member for Workington (Mr. Campbell-Savours) who traditionally speaks with colour and conviction and today comprehensively. If he will permit me to say so, and stripping away some of what might be regarded as prejudice and hyperbole, he has raised issues with which I can agree—in particular, the anxiety to ensure that this is good legislation and that we stiffen it up and improve it, where necessary, in Committee. I can assure him that if I am able to play any part in that, I will do so.

I welcome the Bill as a significant improvement in investor protection and a radical and much-needed change in the regulation of the financial services industry. The financial services industry now accounts for 7 per cent. of our national income, employs 2 million people and generates over £6 billion in foreign exchange. The reputation, integrity and attraction of the industry to investors at home and abroad have been ensured in the past principally by three forms of control — the law of convention, common law and statute law, in that order.

The law of convention provided, through self-regulation, an acceptance of personal obligation in exchange for privileged membership of exchanges such as, for example, the stock market through membership of the Stock Exchange or merchant banking through membership of the acceptance houses committee. That led to the old adage, "My word is my bond." That motto characterised the City for many years and served its reputation well.

Common law was perhaps less important than that basic self-regulating convention. It provided a recourse to the courts in civil disputes, for example, on matters of agency or contract law, and the recognition of the limits of good practice as defined by precedent and case judgments.

Historically, it can be said that statute law was the last and least important of those forms of control which governed the City, imposing, as it did, legislative restrictions and obligations — examples are the Companies Acts and, in this instance, the Prevention of Fraud (Investments) Act 1958—on the activities of the multiplicity of institutions in the City.

Since the development of the City under this system of convention and of common and statute law over 300 years, rapid and major changes which have taken place in recent years and months have rendered such regulation inadequate. First, there has been a massive expansion in the number of investors, the medium of investment and the practitioners in the financial services industry.

Secondly, there have been major changes in technology which have led to the more rapid transfer of funds, greater flexibility in the range of investment instruments now available and, indeed, the size of the markets which are accessible.

Thirdly, the internationalisation of the industry and the arrival of foreign companies, many with enormous resources and different standards of practice, have also changed the commercial environment substantially.

Last, and by no means least, the restructuring of the financial services industry and the merging of different activities into financial conglomerates, heralded by the abandonment of stock market minimum commissions and rules on outside shareholdings in stockbroking firms, have made the process of change very substantial.

All these changes have left the investor more vulnerable to malpractice and fraud, created apprehension about future standards of conduct and conflicts of interest, and undermined the old adage, "My word is my bond" to the extent, sadly, that the new motto ought to be, "My word is my flexible and revocable instrument", with the result that statute law has become a more important basis of regulation than the convention of voluntary good behaviour or than common law which has thrown up some conflicting and inadequate judgments in recent years.

For those reasons, I congratulate my right hon. and hon. Friends and predecessors on their efforts to strike the right balance in this Bill and the presentation of it between freedom and fairness, and indeed on consulting so widely among interested groups before presenting these provisions.

Turning to the contents of the Bill, I welcome, in particular, the decision to establish one board rather than two or more for the supervision of self-regulating organisations. The decision to go for the "Snow White and seven dwarfs" regulatory system is a challenging one and will obviously have some teething troubles, but I believe it to be the right decision. My hon. Friends will know that some of us have been pressing for it for years. I am very pleased that this Government have been responsive to the views expressed by Opposition Members and by many on the Government Benches in successive debates on the Gower report. Indeed, in my own submission to the Gower committee, it was my preferred solution, which at the time was felt by the Government and by Professor Gower to be unworkable; but opinion is gradually moving much more in that direction and I welcome it. I welcome, too, the provisions to make it a criminal offence to trade without authorisation or to make false or misleading statements.

This is the occasion to point out, however, those areas where one feels that improvements can be made or where one has some misgivings about the tenor and content of the Bill. I would have preferred to see the SIB or the delegated authority given statutory recognition, authority and objectives rather than the so-called "flexible" structure of enabling the Secretary of State to transfer his functions to a designated agency. Opposition Members make a valid point when they say that such a statutorily recognised authority would be independent, free from sudden discharge, totally responsible for the organisation of its market and more overtly, objectively, publicly accountable for the control and regulation of the many activities within its boundaries. The Bill goes a long way towards establishing such a designated agency, but I would not have minded, and would still like to see in more detailed areas, more statutory definition and authority being given to the body.

Much of the new structuring and many important detailed rules are to be introduced by order after the legislation is enacted. A more general point, which I hope will find accord with my hon. Friends, is that there is far too much legislation by order nowadays. It is preferable to consolidate as much as possible into primary legislation. Examples of that can be found throughout the Bill. I understand the complexity and range of its provisions, but it is in the detail of matters such as disclosure requirements and cold calling limitations that we can judge how authoritative the Bill will be, and the extent to which it can genuinely protect the interests of investors.

In the past, I have expressed strong reservations about the composition of supervisory boards and self-regulating organisations which historically have been, and remain, too practitioner—oriented and cosy. There have been welcome improvements in increasing the so-called lay membership of such authorities, but all too often those lay members are on the periphery of the practitioners, and do not genuinely represent the interests of the consumer and the investor, as they should.

The principal function of both the designated agency and the SROs should not be to provide an easy working machine which is not subjected to criticism. Their principal objective is to protect investors. Their face must always be pointed towards the investor, and they must apply that criterion to every decision. They must ask whether the decision protects the investor. That is their job. Their principal function is not to co-ordinate a nice smooth market and to keep everyone happy, but to represent the interests of the profusion of people who come to the market.

The provisions in schedules 5 and 2, which relate to the composition of the governing bodies of the designated agency and the SROs, are imprecise and place insufficient emphasis on the representation of investor or public interests through lay membership. Also, schedule 5 provides for the appointment or removal of the designated agency chairman by the Secretary of State and the Governor of the Bank of England acting jointly, thereby giving the Governor a veto and an undue influence over the investment market. I raised that question with my right hon. and learned Friend the Secretary of State at the beginning of the debate, and we should return to it in Committee.

Clause 151, which enables the Secretary of State in the national interest to disqualify from carrying on financial business in the United Kingdom anyone from a country which does not afford us favourable access to its financial markets, should find no place in the Bill. The provision is irrelevant to the protection of investors, and flies in the face of our long-established tradition of open access to markets. We should consider seriously that aspect of the Bill, although it may be peripheral to some of the Bill's objectives.

I shall now deal with the question whether Lloyd's should be in or out. Initially, I was receptive to arguments for drawing Lloyd's within the ambit of the Bill, but after consideration I have concluded that that would be an error of judgment. First, the principal business of Lloyd's is different from that engaged in by those involved in the investment markets. Just as commercial banking and non-life insurance are outside the scope of the Bill, so should Lloyd's be. Secondly, there is a distinction between the types of people and the objectives of those who become underwriters at Lloyd's and of those who invest in stocks and shares. The former place their assets at risk, although retaining direct ownership of them, in order to engage in the insurance business as principals. The latter convert their assets into investments in the businesses of others. There is a significant difference between the characteristics of the sole trader and the passive investor. They should be afforded the regime of protection.

The Government have announced an inquiry into the regulation of Lloyd's, and we should await the outcome before hastily absorbing an essentially different industry into the ambit of the Bill. Nevertheless, I have a responsibility to point to my preferred alternative. Unlike some, I am not satisfied with the way in which Lloyd's is going even now, although I recognise that substantial changes have been instituted since 1982. My preference would be for a public, not a private, Bill, if we could overcome the legislative problems of hybridity, which would tighten the supervision of Lloyd's and provide, among other things, for the appointment of a chief executive with terms of reference. It should provide less self-interest on Lloyd's ruling body, an end to "baby" or preferred syndicates, legal responsibilities for Lloyd's policy signing office, and more disclosure on such practices as reinsurance to close, and the credentials of offshore rollover funds.

I feel sorry for the affected Peter Cameron-Webb names who, as a result of fraud, maladministration, inadequate supervision and straightforward bad risk-taking, have lost about £168 million over the years. They and other underwriters are entitled to higher standards of probity and supervision, but they are not entitled to evade their responsibility in the final analysis to pay the calls on them. I have heard that they are selling up and moving abroad before further calls are made on their assets. That would do immense harm to the reputation of Lloyd's, whose underwriters have historically been prepared to pay claims promptly, and it would be no less evasive and unlawful than they accuse Mr. Cameron-Webb of being.

Greater protection for investors is needed urgently. The new regime provided for in the Bill must cope with the aftermath of the big bang, which will be bloody with a bear market following this bull market as surely as night follows day, and with marketing techniques and investment instruments the like of which we have never seen before.

It is vital for the interests of investors and the financial services industry generally that we enact good legislation which will stand the test of time, and command the widest respect. The Bill may not go quite as far as I should like it to go, but it is most welcome as far as it goes, and it will enjoy my support tonight.

8.7 pm

Mr. Gerald Bermingham (St. Helens, South): Most hon. Members who have spoken have dealt with Lloyd's and the City, and little has been said about the guy at the end of the chain who will pay the bill. He is the fellow who pays insurance commissions and is talked into a policy which he does not particularly want because he is buying a house and is sold an endowment policy with it. He is the guy who pays the interest on his overdraft because the banks need to compensate their profits. The Bill should protect such people.

I accept that Second Reading is not the time to take the Bill apart clause by clause. I welcomed the Gower report and hoped for a Bill that would go to the heart of the problem, and look after the chap at the end of the chain, that is the small investor, or the man who pays his monthly premium on his endowment policy or pension fund. I hoped that such people would be looked after, but I fear that the Bill will not do that.

I hope that I shall be fortunate enough to serve in Committee. Perhaps some of the Committee's time could be spent on asking those questions. The chap who pays the bill may be a name at Lloyd's who has been defrauded, a small shareholder who has been sold a pup in a bucket shop, or an old lady who puts her savings on the line and finds her investment worthless. Such people should be protected. It is all very well to say, "Lloyd's is out of this. It is a separate entity." A moment ago the hon. Member for Chichester (Mr. Nelson) spoke of some members who are thinking of going abroad to avoid further frauds. That people are driven from this country by the fraud of others is an absolute disgrace and a sad reflection upon the institution of which those who committed fraud were said to be proud members.

As a barrister I am not at all satisfied with the running of Lloyd's. I doubt whether, if tested, Lloyd's code of conduct could be shown to be the same as the code of conduct that we expect from the man in the professional office, the man serving behind a shop counter. There are still things going on and things that are talked about which are smelly and fishy. One hears rumours as one walks the streets of the City and talks to the people involved in the business world about what is still being done, about money that is still being shifted abroad, about how there is a new wheeze whereby premiums can now be moved this way or that or reallocated.

While all this continues, the reputation of Lloyd's continues to sink and so does the reputation of the City. There comes a time when one has to end amateurism and have a little bit more professionalism. This is urgent because, as has been said so often tonight, in October this year we have the big bang. This is the arrangement whereby the distinction between the jobber and the broker is to go. This will save everybody money on commissions. The end result has been a rat race of job-swapping in the City, escalating salaries and golden handshakes, for the likes of which many a man in the coal or steel industry would give their right arm, ear or eye.

At the end of the day who will pay? It will be the likes of the small investor because the services and commissions will not be the same. The other effect of the big bang will be the invasion of the overseas banks and the overseas merchant houses. The City will never be the same again. If we change the City but still want it to be the financial market centre of the world we must regulate and order that market so that it equals if nothing else, the rest of the world. We must cut out the crook and the spiv. They should have no place within the centre. We must make sure that when somebody acts as an adviser or as a broker they act by a set of rules which conform to the criminal law. Anyone who makes a sly or fast buck, who seeks to cheat or to deceive must pay the full penalty of the law and quickly.

In clause 147 there is one superb subsection to which I shall refer, and if I am lucky to be on the Committee I shall go back to it in much greater detail. Subsection (9) reads:

"Nothing in this section shall require a person carrying on the business of banking to disclose any information or produce any document relating to the affairs of a customer unless

(a) the customer is a person who the inspectors have reason to believe may be able to give information concerning a suspected contravention."

This is fine until one looks at subsection (2), which states:

"The appointment under this section of an inspector may limit the period during which he is to continue his investigation or to confine it to particular matters."

In other words, we appoint an inspector to investigate insider dealings—we have been so brilliant in tracking down the people in insider dealings that in the last two years we have had four or five prosecutions. If one listens in the coffee shops of London one will hear whisper after whisper about that company and this company. We all know that it is going on but we have done nothing to track down the people.

According to clause 147, the inspector may go in for only a limited period as may be deemed advisable, and the banks are limited as to what they need give away. Subsection (9)(b) states:

"the Secretary of State is satisfied that the disclosure or production is necessary for the purposes of the investigation."

I ask you. The Secretary of State has to be satisfied. We are talking about the way dishonest people make considerable sums of money at the expense of other investors — indeed, at the expense of the investment company itself within which the insider dealing is taking place. This is just one example of one clause and one subsection of this Bill which demonstrates how much is needed to be done by way of amendment if we are to create a set of investment protection rules and regulations which in some way might give the investor proper protection.

I want to see the City as the financial capital of the world but we shall only do so if we have a City that is clean and where there are no suspicions of fraud, of people making the quick buck, easy money. We shall achieve this only if we have a set of regulations that are equivalent to those in the rest of the world and of which we can be proud. We shall have this only if the supervising bodies — I agree with much of what the hon. Member for Chichester said—have teeth that can bite fast and deep. We must be prepared to toss out the rotten apples from the barrel. We must have a proper policing force, perhaps police officers in our fraud squads who are sufficiently trained to bring prosecutions speedily. The courts of the land must impose penalties that deter.

Until we have all these things we shall not have protection for the investor. This Bill is a little step on the way. A great deal needs to be done. It has to be done carefully and with courage. If the prejudices of yesteryear are forgotten and everybody on those committees works with a clean City in mind we may do something that is worth while.

8.17 pm

Sir Brandon Rhys Williams (Kensington): Earlier this afternoon it was declared that Conservative Members who sought to take part in this debate all had vested interests. I should like to say that I am not a director of any public company. I do not own any shares in any public company. I am not a partner in any business. I am not a member of Lloyd's. I am not a trustee of any profit-making property. I have no consultancies or retainers, and I am not a member of a trade union.

Hon. Members may say that all that means that I do not know much about business, and they could well be right. However, I did serve for 20 years in heavy industry and in consultancy before being elected to the House. I have sufficient interest in business to have brought forward specific suggestions to amend company law in every Session of Parliament since 1969. I did this with the support of well-informed Members on both sides of the House.

I consider that the Bill has a number of deficiencies. That is due to the Department's preoccupation with serious fraud and gross mismanagement rather than the milder business diseases which are unfortunately all too common in Britain. Insufficient attention has been given to the way in which fraud and other disasters can overtake a business in a climate of general inefficiency, management sloppiness, malpractice, corner-cutting and business practices which may be within the law but are generally accepted as contrary to the ethics of business people. That is the ground in which fraud can grow, and unfortunately all too often does.

In recent months I moved into a house which had been standing empty for a number of years. As soon as we turned on the central heating, the most hideous mushrooms appeared out of previously innocent-looking timber and plaster. It was, of course, dry rot. The experts told me that I could get rid of the symptoms as and when they occurred, but that the real solution was to have a firm, sound, dry and well-ventilated structure. I think that the Bill is rather like people who are trying to pick off the mushrooms by using chemical methods in this spot and that without attending to the background in which business is carried on in Britain.

The Bill defines investment business in such a way as to include managing investments and advising on the exercise of rights conferred by the ownership of assets. It appears to put most emphasis on the time of the purchase of the asset—possibly the disposal of investments to some extent—rather than on the advice that should be given to investors on constructive, continuing and responsible ownership of assets.

Are the owners of assets to be regarded and protected as absentee landlords once they have acquired their assets, or do we hold to the concept that investors should be component elements in a well balanced mechanism, including suppliers, customers, workers, managers, supervisors and proprietors, all working together in a fruitful relationship? I am sure that that is a more healthy aim, but it is not the Bill's aim.

I have often said that the weakness of the British economy is attributable in quite large part to the fact that so much of our enormously voluminous company law is obsolete. The great 1948 Act was obsolete by the time that it was enacted, and much of what we have done since has added to the complexity rather than attend to the fundamentals of business practice. We ought to consider company law as a whole. The same goes for partnership law. It is a great pity that the Department is not offering constructive thought on the background against which business is conducted.

I welcome the Bill. I am sure that it contains much that is necessary, nevertheless, it seems to be yet another major Bill regulating business which constitutes a rather wasted opportunity and perhaps a rather heavy drain on parliamentary time. But I am sure that it should go through, and I do not believe that we should clutter this already complex Bill by adding provisions relating to Lloyd's. I am not a member of Lloyd's and I do not know a great deal about insurance, but if existing legislation concerning Lloyd's is not working, another Bill aimed specifically at that target or at insurance generally would be better.

We should be making new provisions to strengthen existing supervisory elements governing how investors' assets are used. I am thinking, of course, of auditors and directors, especially non-executive directors, who are often ineffectual components in the business structure. About 100 years ago it was obvious that, as business was becoming more complex, the owners of assets needed advice from supervisory elements who would help to ensure that their businesses were properly managed. In Germany, there gradually evolved the concept of a supervisory board, whereas Britain experienced important battles which led to the imposition of the compulsory audit.

I am not suggesting that compulsory audit is wrong, but it has not stood us in good stead, because the practices and responsibilities of auditors have not been sufficiently sharply defined by Parliament. We have a large body of highly responsible professional people, but we are not making them as effective as they should be in preventing conditions which ultimately provide the opportunity for fraud.

Auditors and non-executive directors could be ruled by company law that could make them far more effective. All we need is quite minor changes in statutory procedures governing how companies are run. I shall not try to define them now. I have spoken on this subject often, and I hope to introduce a Bill in two or three weeks in which I shall set out several specific recommendations for minor changes which I believe could have big results.

That approach, which the Department has neglected for a long time, is just as important as setting up new agencies and could be just as fruitful as increasing the Department's staff.

8.24 pm

Mr. John Whitfield (Dewsbury): I welcome the opportunity to speak on this important Bill. As Lord Roskill's committee so aptly said:

"If the Government cherishes"—

I understand that they do—

"the vision of an equity-earning democracy, with greater encouragement for ordinary families to invest their savings in shares, it faces an inescapable duty to ensure that financial markets are honestly managed and that transgressors are swiftly and effectively discovered, convicted and punished."

[Mr. John Whitfield]

In addition to suggesting changes in the law relating to the conduct of fraud trials — those recommended by Lord Roskill's committee are many, complex and far-reaching —Lord Roskill rightly says that there must be changes in practice and attitudes which will make demands on everybody involved in investment business. The Bill is concerned with such people's practices and attitudes.

The difficulties of bringing fraudsters to trial and securing their conviction are manifold, as is well known. I whole-heartedly welcome the report's recommendations in that regard and was pleased to hear today that parliamentary time will be found in the next Session to enable the majority of those recommendations to be implemented. However, improvement of criminal law procedures is not enough. We must ensure that our financial markets are managed honestly and that transgressors are brought to court, convicted and punished.

Self-regulation is a fine concept, but if the present system worked well, we should not be debating the Bill. Irrespective of whether one considers the Lloyd's insurance market, the stock exchange or my self-regulatory organisation, the Law Society — that is the only interest that I have to declare — the records show that, although each august establishment appears able to deal with the most blatant excesses of its ordinary members, it is unable or unwilling to cope when it comes to the atrocities, if that is not too strong a word — it often is not—committed by members of its hierarchy.

I need mention only three names to prove my case— Sir Peter Green, about whom we have heard a great deal today, Kleinwort Benson in the context of the British Telecom share allocation and the solicitor Mr. Glanville Davies. In each case, the regulatory authority concerned seemed unwilling to deal with serious examples of financial irregularity or abuse of a privileged position. In each case, the people concerned were on what has been aptly termed the inside track—they were members of the top table of the organisation.

Even in less important but equally serious cases when illegal or unlawful profits have been made at other people's expense—for example, the baby syndicates at Lloyd's, insider dealings that proliferate on the floor of the stock exchange, the abuse of buying shares for unnamed accounts, the facilities that have been offered to known rogues such as Mr. Jim Raper to plunder the assets of public companies for their own personal benefit and the share tipster who tips his own shares, the regulatory authorities, when they exist, have more often than not been unable or unwilling to prevent the commission of the offence or to provide a remedy.

Too often recently, we have had to listen to that weak and wet response to criticism which runs, "We have done all that we can. It is now up to the Director of Public Prosecutions or the inspectors of the Department of Trade and Industry. It is not our fault if they do not do anything." The chairmen of the stock exchange and of the council at Lloyd's are especially guilty of such buck-passing.

There is an enormous gulf to be filled between the present system of self-regulation and the criminal law. I understand that the Bill tries to fill that gap by introducing a system of statutory backing for self-regulation, which will preside over our fast-changing financial markets.

In this connection I welcome the new statutory provisions and powers to make rules for the conduct of investment business contained in chapter V of the Bill. Particularly I welcome the surely long overdue provisions in clauses 49 and 50, which will require those conducting an investment business to take out indemnities against claims and to hold clients' moneys in accounts separate from those containing their own moneys. I welcome clause 54, which provides for the disqualification of certain prescribed unfit and improper individuals; clause 56, which enables restitution orders to be obtained against those who have contravened the provisions of the Bill; and clause 57, which provides a new civil remedy for anyone who has suffered loss as a result of any breach of the rules.

I also warmly welcome the powers of intervention vested in the Secretary of State pursuant to chapter VI, which will enable him or the agent he appoints to prohibit an authorised person from entering into particular transactions or from disposing or dealing with any of his assets and give the Secretary of State power to sequestrate those assets. All these very necessary powers should be exercisable in my view in relation to any authorised person when it appears to the Secretary of State that they are required for the protection of investors—which is what the Bill is surely all about — or that the authorised person is not fit to carry on an investment business or has contravened the provisions of the Bill or furnished the Secretary of State with false or misleading information. I am therefore surprised and disappointed that, with one isolated exception, none of these very necessary powers of intervention seems to me to apply to any authorised person who is a member of a self-regulatory organisation or a professional body.

Subject of course to what my hon. and learned Friend has to say on this subject, it seems to me from reading the Bill that the vast majority of authorised persons will be safe from the Secretary of State's powers of intervention simply because they are members of their SROs. The Bill seems to have teeth, but the teeth will hardly ever be used.

It seems to me that this is the weak point, the Achilles heel of the Bill. The Secretary of State in my submission must retain for himself the powers to intervene in the affairs of the members of an SRO, because otherwise the public suspicion will remain, in spite of the new rules and system of supervision which the SIB will exercise, that the SROs exist to protect the best interests of their members, particularly their more influential members. This is the image which the council of Lloyd's, the stock exchange and even the Law Society have in the minds of members of the lay public who have had cause for complaint against many of the members of those organisations.

I hope that, in Committee, the Government can be persuaded to remove subsection (4) of clause 59 which provides that exemption. It is simply not enough to rely upon the Secretary of State's power to revoke a recognition order under clause 11. It is a power which he will be extremely reluctant to use, and the SROs will know that to be the case. One cannot imagine, for example, the authorisation as an SRO of the stock exchange itself ever being revoked.

What of Lloyd's itself? I will not detain the House long on this subject, because the point has been well covered by my right hon. Friend the Member for Wanstead and Woodford (Mr. Jenkin) and my hon. Friend the Member for Cambridgeshire, South-West (Sir A. Grant). I think that the Secretary of State has headed off the mounting campaign to include Lloyd's within the ambit of the Bill by announcing last week the inquiry into whether that market is really protecting its members against the massive frauds which have occurred in the past and which many suspect are still taking place. In the light of the coming departure from the council of Lloyd's of the Government-imposed watchdog, Mr. Davison, this was the least the Government could have done. Hon. Members are of course aware that Lloyd's has its own piece of legislation, the Lloyd's Act 1982, but I fear that, even if one tenth of the allegations made in this House from time to time by the hon. Member for Hackney, South and Shoreditch (Mr. Sedgemore) are true, the system of self-regulation set up by that Act is not working very well. Let us pay heed to that experience now and so be especially vigilant in dealing with the financial services market in the Bill.

There are already—without waiting for the results of the inquiry which has been set up—grounds at the very least for having severe reservations about the working of self-regulation at Lloyd's. We should not and must not discount that knowledge in our consideration of the Bill. Accordingly, we should ensure that, without exception, all those involved in investment business be subject to the powers of intervention.

The Government have rightly obtained a reputation as the champion of law and order. Bearing this fact in mind, let none of us on this side of the House forget, as Sir Kenneth Berrill himself has already pointed out, that to those of our constituents who for modest rewards actually make things there is something obscene about those in the City who, not content with just making a good living, as they do, through sheer greed and worse break the rules in order to make illegal and unlawful profits at the expense of the rest of us. They are a small minority, but they have to be dealt with.

Let us on this side of the House be seen to be imposing law, order and an effective system of regulation on such people and not shrink from setting up procedures which will enable the Secretary of State to deprive those who break the rules of their livelihoods as soon as those transgressions are discovered, while leaving those same people to face any criminal charges at a later date.

Mr. Robert McCrindle (Brentwood and Ongar): The House will be relieved to know that, almost alone among contributors to the debate, I propose to say virtually nothing about Lloyd's, other than to suggest that, while the day may well come when the Lloyd's Act 1982 proves insufficient, I believe those hon. Members who suggest that now is the time are anticipating a course of events that has not yet been able to run its full course. I have no doubt that we will come back to the consideration of Lloyd's, but I regret that in the course of the debate so much attention has been paid to a matter which is not included in the Bill.

Living, as we do, in a period when the consumer's interest is paramount, it is perhaps surprising that we have not thought fit to update the legislative protection in this respect until now. I suppose it is fair to say that one or two scandals which affected relatively few people but received much publicity acted as the trigger. Following the rightly praised report of Professor Gower and the stock exchange agreement, to which reference has been made, it became clear that something approaching a revolution in the provision of financial services was on the horizon. Thus, the combination of isolated but serious scandals, a major change in the City's activities and the era of consumer protection has led to the requirement for legislative change, the manifestation of which is before us in the shape of the Bill.

The Bill enshrines the principles of self-regulation by those offering financial services. I know that many disagree with that approach. Many feel certain that something akin to the United States Securities and Exchange Commission, with central Government involvement, would be preferable. I have to concede that even in the City there are misgivings. Many are convinced that the approach embodied in the Bill simply will not work and that tougher central Government control will have to ensue. I do not agree. In fact, I believe that is an excessively gloomy view and a rather unfair anticipation of the considerable movement represented by the Bill.

I believe that it is appropriate to give those in financial services the challenge to deal properly with the public. The vast majority of providers of financial services are honest people. It is regrettable that so much concentration is upon those who are not and who are clearly very much in the minority. I believe that many people—honest traders—in financial services want to provide a good and straightforward service. To encase such people in the straitjacket of bureaucracy, which I think could be well represented by the Securities and Exchange Commission approach, would be unacceptable, particularly to the small traders who abound in some of the areas under discussion within the ambit of the Bill.

If self-regulation is right, and if the Bill deserves a Second Reading—as it does—does that mean that there is no scope for improvement? On the contrary, there are wide gaps and omissions, most of which are for discussion in Committee. At the moment, all I need say is that although I understand the need for the Securities and Investments Board, I am concerned that so many of the rules that will underpin the legislation are to be left to a body that is effectively outside parliamentary control. If we cannot change that dramatically in Committee, we may feel that more positive guidance to the SIB is desirable.

I instance the licensing of an insurance salesman. There will be different opinions among hon. Members about whether or not that is a good thing, but it may not be wholly desirable to leave the decision on such important matters entirely to the SIB.

Further consideration should be given to whether we could at least lift the veil on the type of regulations that are likely to be issued by the SIB as this whole matter progresses.

More specifically, I draw the attention of the House to a glaring omission that I hope to seek to remedy if I am asked to serve on the Standing Committee. I refer to the failure to include non-life insurance within the ambit of protection of the consumer. Here I declare an interest as the parliamentary adviser to the British Insurance Brokers Association. I believe that anyone who considers that there is no scope for protecting the purchaser of fire, accident or motor policies has never been in the field and has not witnessed the considerable difficulty that can arise when a purchaser receives a policy that is either wrongly based or inexpertly sold. The Government's simple explanation is that this type of insurance cannot be included in the Bill because it does not constitute an investment as defined in the Bill, but that explanation does not go far enough.

I could give many examples of hardship caused by inexpertly arranged policies. It is true that there have been few frauds in this area, but must we await the development of fraud before adequate consumer protection—which is no more than the purchaser of these non-life type policies has a right to expect—is extended to such policies? I hope that the Government will think again about this glaring omission. I repeat, if I am asked to serve on the Committee, I shall seek to amend the Bill to take care of that omission.

At this stage there is only one other aspect of the Bill to which I wish to draw the attention of the House. I am concerned that the protection offered to the investor when he is dealing with what clause 41 calls "an exempt representative"—before the Bill appeared it was called a tied agent—will be less than when he is dealing with an independent intermediary. In the public interest, there should be equalisation of protection. There should be a straightforward understanding in the public mind either that a person is dealing with an independent intermediary, with all that that implies, or that he is dealing with a representative of a particular life office. At present we are running the risk of obscuring the issue. We should turn our attention to that matter when the Bill goes into Committee.

I give a broad but sincere welcome to the Bill, which is a major step forward in investor protection and places responsibility on the practitioners. That is surely the right way forward. It does that, albeit with powerful guidance from the SIB. It will be welcomed by thousands of honest providers of financial services, just as I believe it will be welcomed by many of those to whom consumer protection will be extended.

8.45 pm

Mr. Ian Wrigglesworth (Stockton, South): Given the remarks of the hon. Member for Brentwood and Ongar (Mr. McCrindle) and other hon. Members, I imagine that we shall have an interesting Committee stage. I wish the hon. Member for Brentwood and Ongar and Ministers well in their deliberations, which I shall probably not be joining.

The remarks of the hon. Member for Chichester (Mr. Nelson) reminded me of the campaign that he has fought to get legislation of this sort on the statute book. At times the hon. Gentleman has ploughed a very lone furrow in order to try to bring about changes that are similar to those that are contained in the Bill. He reminded me of previous debates, and when he mentioned the old City adage

"My word is my bond",

he took me back to my banking examinations in the 1950s when I worked in the Midland bank. Before I came to the House I worked in the National Girobank and I am now an adviser to Barclays bank. I have therefore taken a long interest in this subject.

I welcome the legislation. It is overdue and has been long debated. The previous antagonisms and fears in the City about this sort of legislation have been misplaced, and will be proved to have been misplaced when this measure comes into operation.

I wish to make three general points before commenting on the structure in the Bill and the powers and standing of the SIB and the self-regulatory organisations.

First, as a number of hon. Members have already said, the abuses that have recently taken place in the City, as well as in times gone by, are not typical of the overwhelming majority of those who work in the City. That needs to be put clearly on the record, because it would be unfair and unjust if a substantial body of people—who are doing a perfectly honest and hard day's work and performing a useful task for the country—were blackened by recent events.

Secondly, fraud and malpractice will still continue even when the Bill gets on to the statute book. I am amazed at the naivety of those who think that we shall get a whiter than white, Persil-clean Lloyd's simply by bringing Lloyd's within the ambit of the Bill. All the evidence that I have seen from other western capitals and institutions in New York and Hong Kong shows that despite massive regulation, fraud still continues, collapses still take place and there is still malpractice. That is not an argument for not putting the measure on the statute book, but we should not run away with the idea that problems will no longer exist if we move in the direction outlined in the Bill.

Thirdly, the City makes a major contribution not only to our financial affairs but to the manufacturing and service sectors and to the life and prosperity of the country. That should also be put on the record.

So far, hon. Members have indulged in semantics in relation to the structure of the regulation prescribed in the Bill, because the gap between what is contained in the Bill and what the Labour party is proposing is not that wide. The proposals in the Bill have substantial statutory back-up. The kernel of the argument is the balance between the powers of the SIB and the powers of the SROs. I do not know what the Labour party is proposing in detail; I do not know whether it proposes that there should be no SROs. That is not the case in the United States. Although there is a Securities and Exchange Commission, activities are regulated by the New York stock exchange and various other bodies.

Even under the proposals of the Labour party, I assume that there would still be some self-regulation and that it would not abolish the stock exchange council and the other organisations that exist. The question is what balance there is between the two spheres. In our amendment we have gone for a toughening of the Government's proposals. We do not think that they are as tough as they should be but again it is a matter of balance.

It is not just a question of toughness but of the standing of the organisation. The SIB must not be seen as a City body but as a body representing the public interest and, of course, investor and consumer interests. That is why we have suggested that it should be substantially if not entirely publicly funded, so that it is seen to be a public body and not a creature of the City. We have also suggested that membership of the organisation should be reviewed by a Select Committee of the House. That would be similar to the procedure adopted in the United States for public appointments. That procedure would have a beneficial effect on public appointments in this country if it was more widespread.

By those two principal means, the independence of the SIB would be greatly enhanced and its standing as a body protecting the public interest would thereby be greater. Most important, it would have the confidence of the public because it was seen to be a public authority.

If we were starting with a clean sheet there might be an argument for a different organisation of the sort proposed by the Labour party, but we are not starting with a clean sheet because we already have a substantial number of self-regulatory organisations. Therefore, it is inappropriate to go for the sort of statutory commission that the Labour party is proposing.

The powers of the SIB should be strengthened. Reference has already been made to the fact that the SIB has a nuclear deterrent power to act against SROs or just the power to issue remonstrance to them if they are not carrying out their duties properly. Clearly the SIB should be able to take action to change the rules of SROs without recourse to the courts. That is too complicated a mean of making changes.

In Committee and during the further passage of the Bill in another place the Government should take into account the way in which regulations will dovetail with international requirements. Virtually all the markets in the City operate on an international scale. In so far as it is possible it is important that our regulations dovetail with regulations in other financial centres around the world so that companies and institutions operating here are not at a disadvantage.

I have some worries that I hope will be considered during the passage of the Bill. I am concerned about overlap and confusion between different SROs. Quite a number of them are being established very late in the day. They are being set up without any track record, without real organisation and without real knowledge of how they will do their job. Everything is being done in a great rush. I hope that the SIB and Ministers will keep a close eye to see that there is not confusion and overlap. Individual institutions will have to register with a plethora of SROs because of the different activities within their organisations, and that may cause problems.

I do not believe that all of the City of London is aware of what will hit it after the big bang takes place. There will be rapid changes and an entirely new environment very different to the past. The aggressiveness, power, might and capital of the new international institutions that will come into the City will be a real challenge to the indigenous British institutions. The City will be much more aggressive and competitive. I hope that the City will become a larger international centre for the benefit of this country. It is because of the increased competitiveness that the Bill, with a tougher framework for the SIB, is necessary. I hope that when it comes back for Third Reading it will be of that character. Then we shall be happy to support it on its way to another place.

8.57 pm

Mr. John Browne (Winchester): I support the Bill but first I declare an interest in that I have worked in the stock exchange not only in London but in New York. I also control a company which may become subject to the Bill.

I support the Bill basically because it strikes a well-informed and good balance between allowing creativity in response to the needs of the market place and control in the interests of all participants, including the investors. By going for self-regulation with teeth we shall have policing by professionals rather than by amateurs.

Two basic issues divide the House. The first is about whether Lloyd's should be included. I shall not speak about that, in deference to other hon. Members who want to speak, because much has been said already.

The other issue is the balance of control. How much control should there be and where should it rest? Should there be State control or market control by self-regulation? One can examine the two extremes, one in the United States and one in the Euromarkets. In the United States under the Securities and Exchange Commission, there is relatively tight control.

Some have urged that we should have a Securities and Exchange Commission here. I ask those who do so to think of several factors. The United States' markets are different from the British markets and have a different origin. I worked on the New York stock exchange for about three years. The 1933 and 1935 Acts and the Glass-Steagll Act of 1933 have resulted in much higher costs in the market —there is no question about the enormous legal costs and the many delays. They have also led to two essential ingredients—a relatively clear market where everybody can see what is going on, and a relatively clean market. Those factors have added greatly to the size and liquidity of the United States market.

On the other hand, we have a much freer market in the Euromarkets. For an investor in Eurobonds and securities, there are two hidden securities. All the main issues of securities in the Euromarkets are subject to the United States Security and Exchange Commission because, although the issues are made in the Euromarkets, their main market is the American one. The issuers know that if they commit a crime in a Euromarket, they would be out of issues in the United States. Therefore, the SEC has a hidden effect in the Euromarkets. The second control is the central bank regulations.

The United Kingdom has an immensely important series of markets, which make an enormous contribution to the country in terms both of earnings and of generating business. This allows small companies to grow. Our markets have a different character from those of the United States. There is a need for action because of the advent of the big bang, the resulting growth in size in the markets and the internationalisation of those markets. We are in a good position because we have seen how world markets in currency, bonds, securities and so on have evolved. We are in 1986, not 1936, so we do not have to face the uncertainties that faced the Americans in the early 1930s. We can learn lessons from the SEC and from other markets that may have been over or under-regulated.

We must look first at the essential ingredients of a market for securities, which would include the following factors. First, the market must remain creative and responsive to market needs. Secondly, it must be clear and open. Thirdly, it must be clean—in other words, well-policed. Fourthly, it must be efficient in terms of both execution and cost for the issuer and the investor. Fifthly, it must be liquid—in other words it must be large. Markets become large only if the small investor is adequately protected. Therefore, the Bill should be guided towards ensuring that those factors are kept paramount.

There are two points of difference between the two sides of the House. The Socialist party wrongly believes in control—in other words, a political response to the market — as opposed to our belief in enterprise in responding to the market place and market response. Secondly, it believes in policing by politicians and civil servants, both of whom are amateurs within financial business. We believe in policing by professionals, by people who understand the market. In other words, we believe in self-regulation subject to the Secretary of State.

I urge on my hon. and learned Friend the Under-Secretary three additions to the Bill. One is the protection of the members of the boards. As my hon. Friend the Member for Croydon, South (Sir W. Clark) has already said, it is vital if they are to do their job properly that they should have protection from libel and so on. Much more emphasis must be placed on the conflict of interest between the issuing or underwriting of securities and the management of assets — fund management. Thirdly, there must be greater emphasis on a complete and full disclosure of all the facets of a trade or bargain, including the volume of securities. It should not be an enormous task, with computerisation, even with the British way of trading. The sterling value of negotiated commissions must be disclosed to the purchaser.

[Mr. John Browne]

I support the Bill because it is timely and good. It is self-regulation with teeth and that will allow creative professionals to operate and build up the market even more strongly. That will happen when the market is policed by professionals and not amateurs.

9.5 pm

Mr. John Butterfill (Bournemouth, West): I congratulate my right hon. and learned Friend the Secretary of State, the other Ministers in the Department and their predecessors on introducing the Bill, which is a most imaginative measure. We have denigrated the service industries too much and we have not appreciated the extent to which they contribute to our national life and are likely to do in the future. As many of the Third world countries develop their own manufacturing capability, so it becomes more important for us to rely on added value and on the specialist services that many of the companies in the City provide. It is, therefore, particularly important that we create an environment in which they can operate efficiently, and where the small and unsophisticated investor is protected. The Bill goes a long way towards that.

I have no personal interest in Lloyd's or any other aspect of the Bill, but it would be wrong to bring Lloyd's into the scope of the Bill. If we are to deal with Lloyd's it must be done in the context of insurance as a whole in a way that will not inhibit British insurers, which face increasingly agressive overseas competition.

I welcome the conditions in the Bill concerning disclosure and support the comments made by my hon. Friend the Member for Winchester (Mr. Browne). I have a deep suspicion of the principle of Chinese walls and I believe that that can be overcome only by the fullest possible disclosure. I am concerned that many of the major investment transactions that the Bill deals with relate to the process of house purchase and the purchase of insurance policies or packages related to house purchase. I hope that the Minister can give some assurance that there will be no conflict between what we impose in the Bill on those who are related to financial services and what is likely to happen in the Building Societies Bill. Many of the activities of building societies impinge absolutely and directly on what is proposed in the Bill.

There are many other areas in the Bill where problems remain unsolved. In particular, there is the conflict between insurance brokers and employed agents. I do not think that the Bill contains the necessary measures to protect the public in that area. I hope that some consistency will be imposed upon the self-regulating organisations in terms of their disciplinary procedures or there will be problems of unfair competition. I hope that the Minister can reassure us that the Securities and Investments Board will have a responsibility to ensure consistency of disciplinary procedures.

There are many other areas in the Bill where too much is left to regulations. On that matter I agree with my hon. Friend the Member for Chichester (Mr. Nelson). It would be much better if the Bill could spell out exactly what we wish to achieve in those areas. I am particularly concerned about clause 50 which deals with the matter of interest on clients' funds and whether those who are operating in that area will be required to account for interest. The Bill says that at the moment that will be left to regulation. I do not think that that is good enough. We should spell it out that all those who hold clients' funds should account for the interest. That was done in the Estate Agents Act 1979, subject to a de minimis rule. That is right and it should apply to everybody including solicitors, to whom it does not apply now.

Mrs. Kellett-Bowman: Or on house purchase.

Mr. Butterfill: Indeed.

There are many areas where we need to ensure that the regulations are absolutely clear. For example, the fact that we are proposing that an advertisement can be free from regulation, provided that it calls for a prospectus to be available, is open to considerable abuse because the advertisement could be extremely misleading, and then present the would-be investor with a confusing prospectus.

In general, I congratulate my hon. Friends on producing the Bill. I wish it well and hope very much that I shall be able to make a contribution in Committee.

9.10 pm

Mr. Bryan Gould (Dagenham): This long-heralded Bill is handicapped by the fact that it is required to meet a purpose that is far wider and more complicated than the one for which it was originally intended. As many hon. Members have reminded us, the genesis of the Bill was a series of scandals six or seven years ago that led to the report prepared by Professor Gower, which led to the White Paper, which has now produced the Bill.

While the Government were taking that leisurely course over getting to grips with City fraud, the City for which Professor Gower had written his report and for which the Bill is intended has, particularly over the past two years, changed almost beyond recognition. The starting point for that process of change — the City revolution, as some would call it — was, again, as many hon. Members reminded us, a deal struck between the then Secretary of State, the right hon. Member for Hertsmere (Mr. Parkinson), and the stock exchange. The deal arose out of the litigation proposed in the restrictive trade practices court, which was almost certain to produce substantial changes in the stock exchange rule book.

Despite all ministerial assurances to the contrary, that deal is universally seen as having been intended to stabilise the situation to buy some time. All that one can say is that rarely can such a step have so directly produced an outcome that was so much the opposite of what was intended. In fact, it launched the City into the big bang and ushered in a period of frenetic change. Far from slowing down the pace of that change, the Government found that they had a tiger by the tail.

As the hon. Member for Stockton, South (Mr. Wrigglesworth) said, it is doubtful whether even the City itself fully recognises what that revolution will mean. On the evidence of the Bill, it is clear that the Government do not fully recognise that. The City of the future will be dominated by huge international financial conglomerates in which the international giants—Merrill Lynch from New York and Nomura Securities from Tokyo—will play a dominant part. The securities market will no longer be a cosy club; it will be open to all comers. The old clubby atmosphere will have gone. The old institutional safeguards will be swept away. The process will be spurred on by technological change, and the ease of electronic communication. The City will become just one part of a 24-hour international capital market.

The City itself will change in the business of what it sells. It will no longer sell little bits of expert information picked up on the wind, and little bits of gossip. It will find that it has to compete in a way which, up to now, has been unfamiliar to it — in speed, comprehensiveness, accuracy, reliability and price competitiveness, as well as, significantly, the amount of investor protection that is offered. It is worrying that, as a consequence of those changes, the City will be opened up to the full blast of international competition, which manufacturing industry has already had to endure ahead of the City. It will be interesting to see whether the Government adopt the same cavalier attitude towards the fortunes of the City as towards the fortunes of manufacturing industry.

As the hon. Member for Chichester (Mr. Nelson) said, once that process is fully launched, once the huge international firms are shouldering aside smaller domestic enterprises, there will be blood on the carpet. The smaller firms will go to the wall because the volume of business will not expand fast enough to accommodate all those who want to get in on the act.

The gilts market is a good example. No longer will it be a market that is dominated by two major jobbers that have a cosy relationship with the Bank of England. It will be a market in which 29 market makers will be scrambling for position. Not all of them will survive. There will be a premium on those with the largest resources: those who are prepared to sit out losses over a very long period. In that game the foreign giants will have all the cards in their hands. It will create major problems, not least for the Government. I cannot believe that even this Conservative Government will be content if the business of funding its borrowing requirements is in the hands of foreign institutions that have little or no loyalty to the British economy.

In this context there is much more of a problem for the investor. It is inevitable that, as the competition intensifies, corners will be cut and that rules will be bent. As the old safeguards — the institutional divisions between jobbing and broking—go, no longer will there be shared assumptions about the way in which business should be done. In the new international conglomerates, conflicts of interest will inevitably be built in. I agree with the comment of the hon. Member for Winchester (Mr. Browne) that Chinese walls are flimsy structures upon which to place much reliance. With many newcomers, intensified competition and many people scrambling for business, the investor may be at the bottom of the pile. The problems will be compounded when, as was pointed out by the hon. Member for Chichester, the inevitable bear market arrives. There will be a shake-out and the survival of some firms will be in question. At that stage consumer interest will be put under the greatest pressure.

All these developments are taking place against the background of great concern about the level of City fraud. In the five years since Gower was commissioned, the Government have pursued a somewhat leisurely course. Apparently they are in no hurry to put an end to these malpractices or to bring the wrongdoer to book. As some of my hon. Friends have already pointed out, that is in marked contrast to the alacrity and zeal and the tremendous resources that have been devoted to tracking down low level, social security fraud.

During this five-year period, City fraud has grown apace. Scandals have proliferated. An atmosphere akin to a casino has developed, in which huge rewards have been paid to the winners without making too much of a distinction between those winners who abide by the rules and those who do not. We have seen criminals fleeing the jurisdiction of this country and cocking a snook at the authorities from the decks of their yachts. Insider dealing is still rife. If one looks at the Arthur Bell share price before the Guinness bid, one sees a very good illustration of that.

Unfortunately, London is acquiring the reputation of a financial centre that is soft on fraud, where anything goes, where the chances of getting caught are remote, where the police resources that are provided are inadequate to detect fraud and where the prevailing ethos — this is most damaging —fails to distinguish clearly between what is right and what is wrong.

All of these problems are epitomised not just by Johnson Matthey and Lloyd's, although they are important and where everybody can see that things went badly wrong, but, more worryingly, by episodes such as the British Telecom launch. Neither the Government nor the City firms that were involved seem to understand that what happened was unacceptable. May I remind the House that the City firms that were involved professionally in that launch and that were already charging unusually high commissions and fees for their professional services also dealt in the shares. They used their privileged access to the shares, by virtue of their professional capacity, to make huge capital gains for themselves, thereby blurring the essential distinction between acting for others and acting for themselves in the same market.

The reason why I regard this with such seriousness is that it is exactly the kind of practice that can no longer be tolerated in a modern City. Yet that is exactly the sort of practice that will be difficult to control, given the new structures in the Bill. In a situation of revolutionary change, uncertainty and frantic competition, we must ask how the Bill matches up to those responsibilities.

There is much in the Bill that the Opposition can support. We welcome the general structure of authorisation. Contrary to what has been said in wilful obtuseness by alliance Members, we welcome the combination of self-regulation and statutory regulation that is provided in the Bill. Any hon. Member who has taken part or listened for a moment to any of the debates on this subject over the past two or three years, would know that that was the case.

The Government believe that the structure provided in broad terms in the Bill matches up to the general recognition on the part of all but a few backwoodsmen, that the City depends for its survival and future prosperity on effective regulation. If the City will not provide the investor protection that is available elsewhere, investors will take their business elsewhere. There is a clear lesson to be learned from the market in commodities. Ten years ago Chicago introduced very strict regulations and London dealers thought that that was marvellous as business would come to London because the market would not tolerate the strict regulations in Chicago. Experience has shown that the reverse was true: people like to deal in a situation where they know how they stand and that they are properly protected by the rules.

Mr. Anthony Beaumont-Dark (Birmingham, Selly Oak): I would like the hon. Gentleman to comment on one point. Too often it is said that the City and the Government are soft on fraud. We all accept that some of the goings on at Lloyd's were not just unacceptable but disgraceful. However, big changes have been made. The hon. Member for Hackney, South and Shoreditch (Mr. Sedgemore) made great play within the privilege of the House about the Johnson Matthey affair. Does the hon. Member for Dagenham (Mr. Gould) agree that it is unfair to suggest that nearly all the merchant banks and brokers and the City are soft on fraud, when 98 per cent of the City is highly reputable, is jealous of its reputation and works hard to make a great living for this country's balance of payments?

Mr. Gould: I am surprised that the hon. Member for Birmingham, Selly Oak (Mr. Beaumont-Dark) should think it necessary to make that point, since it has been made repeatedly throughout the debate and is, I believe, common ground. The Opposition, and I believe the Government, are rightly concerned about the hon. Gentleman's own assessment of the 2 per cent.—if he wants to place that figure so high: that is a very high volume of money and business — which is not acceptable. We should concentrate our attention upon that 2 per cent.

Although the Opposition endorse the general approach, we find that the real problem with the Bill is not what it contains but what it leaves out. The missed opportunities and the omissions mean that the Bill is simply inadequate to carry the heavy burden that it is required to bear.

The first problem in assessing the likely efficacy of what is proposed is that so much of what is proposed is not in the Bill. So much depends on orders yet to be made by the Secretary of State and on rules yet to be made by the SIB and the SROs, five of which do not yet exist. The rules on how conflicts of interest are to be avoided have yet to be established. The Opposition share the anxieties expressed in some quarters about the proposals for rules concerning the licensing of insurance salesmen as expressed by MIBOC. The rules on the disclosure of commissions are not yet available. Of the seven SROs likely to be recognised, only two have been in existence for any length of time and only one, the stock exchange, has any record of capacity to provide effective regulation. We are left in the dark as to how effective the structure will be in regulating the City.

The second problem is the sheer complexity of what is proposed. There will immediately be an unnecessarily complicated structure arising from the fact that the Secretary of State intends to delegate his powers to an SIB. The SIB in turn will supervise SROs which will then regulate their members. Bearing in mind that five of those SROs do not yet exist, one can see straightaway that there is an inbuilt uncertainty and complexity about that point.

Added to the already complex structure is the possibility that many people will seek direct authorisation. The SIB will, in a sense, act as an SRO bypassing other SROs. In addition, many of the new financial conglomerates will have to belong to several SROs which will, in many cases, have overlapping jurisdictions. For example, investment managers may choose to belong either to NASDIM or to the as yet non-existent investment management regulatory organisation.

Added to that, some institutions, such as banks, building societies and insurance companies would also be subject to a different system of regulation. Banks will be regulated by the Bank of England, insurance companies by the Department of Trade and Industry and building societies by provisions in the new Building Societies Bill. That will create awkward problems of competing jurisdictions and the SROs will have difficult demarcation questions to resolve for themselves.

The stock exchange and the new international securities regulatory organisation have yet to resolve who is to take the lead in regulating the hitherto unregulated market in international securities. And all that is to say nothing of the professionals—solicitors, accountants and others—who, because they offer investment advice, will also have to be brought within the provisions of the Bill and will have to become authorised persons, presumably by virtue of their membership of a recognised professional body.

This whole ramshackle, unwieldy structure might just have a chance of working if there were a clear statutory framework, established by the Bill, to provide us with much-needed coherence. But much of the complexity and uncertainty that is inherent in the Bill arises from the fact that there is a gaping hole at the heart of it.

When one asks the simple question, "Who is to be at the apex of the pyramid to control the structure of statutory rules under which the SROs will regulate themselves from day to day?", one sees that the Bill is strangely silent or gives only a partial and coy answer. We have to wait until clause 96 before there is a glancing reference to a body corporate. It is not identified; one imagines that it will be a group of chaps on whom the Secretary of State's eye might happen to alight. In other words, what is missing is the keystone of the arch of regulations: a body with its own statutory identity, its own powers and, above all, independence from the City.

The problem with the SIB is not only its uncertain status but the fact that it will be financed by, and largely staffed from, the City. It is hard to see how it can be relied upon to regulate effectively those on whom it is financially dependent.

Mr. William Cash (Stafford): Will the hon. Gentleman give way?

Mr. Gould: No. I am sorry, but I have very little time.

The failure to put in place a self-standing commission, independent of the City, with its own statutory identity and powers, is in marked contrast to the position in virtually every other capital market in the advanced world. Efforts are made to allude to an SEC on the American model, but we do not necessarily want a lawyer-ridden and bureaucratic institution of that type, although we must admit that the SEC has improved its operations considerably in recent years. There are in other jurisdictions many statutory models working well and with the warm endorsement of the practitioners involved. Ontario is an excellent example which I commend to the Government.

The pity is that, in this respect, the Government have allowed themselves to be overtaken by City opinion. The structure proposed by the Bill — the unsatisfactory compromise contained in it — would probably be rejected by a majority in the City which recognises the desirability, or perhaps only the inevitability, of some form of statutory commission. It is interesting that one of the Secretary of State's predecessors, Sir John Nott, is on record to that effect, and I was much taken by the argument of the hon. Member for Chichester in support of that view.

The problems and uncertainties that will be faced are so great that there must surely be a premium on the simplest, clearest and most direct form of regulation that is available. The Bill is weak-kneed and pussy-footing on that central question. It leaves the whole structure broken-backed and we shall table amendments to remedy that central defect.

Further deficiencies arise out of that central problem surrounding the powers that the SIB is to be granted. The Bill fails to give the SIB the power to enforce changes in the rules of SROs quickly and directly. It also fails to provide the SIB with powers to initiate prosecutions. That is probably explained by the fact that it would be inappropriate to give such powers to a non-statutory body.

Lloyd's is the most startling omission from the Bill. Clause 40 specifically excludes Lloyd's because the Government argue that Lloyd's is primarily an insurance business rather than an investment business. Lloyd's is an insurance business regulated by the DTI, but that should not matter, because it would not be the only body subjected under the Bill to two different systems of regulation. For those who are names in Lloyd's and invest in Lloyd's there can be no doubt that it is an investment business. That investment business has caused all the problems. As an investment business, Lloyd's should be regulated under the Bill.

Clause 40 concedes my point, because it takes the trouble to exclude the investment side of Lloyd's operations. If it were not for clause 40, that investment business would be included in the Bill. We oppose that specific exclusion.

It is difficult to accept the omission of Lloyd's, because Lloyd's has given rise to more anxiety than any other City institution. It almost beggars belief that the main cause of worry has been omitted from a Bill that is designed to regulate the City.

Lloyd's maintains that we have nothing to fear because the scandals occurred before 1982. That may be true, but there is good reason for doubt. There is little in Lloyd's recent history to inspire confidence. There have been the problems with the Inland Revenue that necessitated the huge inquiry, the resignation of the Bank of England appointed chief executive following a row about his independence, the difficulty in prosecuting admitted criminals at Lloyd's and the failure to compensate investors in the PCW and other syndicates for their losses. It could be said that Lloyd's role in that affair was to obstruct rather than to help investors.

Let us consider the case of the then Minister for Trade, the hon. Member for Edinburgh, Central (Mr. Fletcher) who was misled about how many members of the syndicate had passed the insolvency test, which led to the Minister making a misleading statement to the House. As my hon. Friend the Member for Hackney, South and Shoreditch (Mr. Sedgemore) pointed out, to protect a former chairman of Lloyd's there was an attempt to prevent the disclosure of his involvement in some of the recent difficulties. Those factors mean that we cannot allow Lloyd's to be left to its own devices.

Lloyd's is important as a body but also because it is the best illustration of what can go wrong and of what has gone wrong when there is self-regulation and no effective element of outside supervision. What went wrong at Lloyd's was not caused by a few crooks at the margin. Those at the heart of the Lloyd's establishment embraced the baby syndicates and the reinsurance arrangements that were the vehicle for fraud. The regulators at Lloyd's lost sight of the distinction between what was acceptable and what was not. The City cannot afford the luxury of that introspection. We shall do all that we can to prevent the Bill from allowing Lloyd's to continue on that course.

The announcement made last week of an inquiry is a transparent tactic to head off an all-party campaign to ensure that Lloyd's is brought within proper control. If the hon. Member for Chichester wishes statutory provisions to define the role of the chief executive, the Bill will be his best opportunity for a long time.

The problem is not only that some elements in the City are too close to the subject to make proper judgments. The Government have found it difficult to disentangle themselves from the interests of that dwindling minority in the City who continue to oppose effective regulation. The Bill is a product of a Government who have listened too attentively to the siren voices. They have been too cautious, too timid and too reluctant to face down those who would oppose regulation, and they have been too short-sighted to face up to their responsibilities. The Bill is a disappointment. It does not measure up to the problems that the City of the future will face.

If the Bill passes into law in its present form, it will fail to resolve the problems faced by the City, and, what is more, it will guarantee that further and more far-reaching legislation will shortly be required.

9.35 pm

The Parliamentary Under-Secretary of State for Trade and Industry (Mr. Michael Howard): Before I address some of the numerous issues which have been raised in this debate may I, for the benefit of those few right hon. and hon. Members present who were not in the House at 3.16 am on 19 December, when I replied to a debate on the Consolidated Fund Bill, repeat what I said then about my own position in relation to Lloyd's?

I ceased all underwriting at Lloyd's on 2 September, the day on which I was appointed to the Government, in accordance with the conventions applying to Ministers in my position. I accordingly ceased on that day to be a member of any of the syndicates in which I had previously participated.

I remain a non-underwriting member of Lloyd's, but I have no further business there save for that arising out of my pre-existing contracts before they expire.

Mr. Gould: As the Minister said, so few people were present when he last made his statement that it may be desirable to amplify it somewhat. Will he confirm that he remains a member of Lloyd's and is entitled, for example, to go into the room? If he cannot, for any reason, disentangle himself from his involvement with Lloyd's as Peter Cameron-Webb seemed able quickly and successfully to do, does he not regard that as a reason for withdrawing his supervision of the Bill and handing it to another Minister?

[Mr. Gould]

Mr. Howard: The answer to that is no.

When my right hon. and learned Friend opened this debate, he began by referring to the importance and success of the financial services sector of our economy. Those remarks have been echoed by several right hon. and hon. Members on both sides of the House who have contributed to the debate. It is a sector that has proved itself capable of responding to the needs of the marketplace and the challenge of overseas competition. The City of London has become established as an essential leg of the world financial tripod competing effectively with New York and Tokyo.

Mr. Austin Mitchell: On a point of order, Mr. Speaker. I was unable to hear the Minister's declaration of his interest in Lloyd's.

Mr. Speaker: I thought that the Minister made a very fair declaration.

Mr. Howard: The City of London has become established as an essential leg of the world financial tripod competing effectively with New York and Tokyo and taking full advantage of its pivotal position in relation to time zones.

Mr. Mitchell: On a point of order, Mr. Speaker. The Minister has told us that he no longer deals at Lloyd's. He has not told us what is his financial interest in Lloyd's.

Mr. Speaker: Order. The Minister made a statement of his interests at the beginning of the debate.

Mr. Howard: I repeat what I said——

Mr. Campbell-Savours: Will the Minister give way?

Mr. Howard: I remain a non-underwriting member of Lloyd's.

Mr. Austin Mitchell: The Minister did not say that.

Mr. Howard: That is what I said earlier, and the record will show that. I have no continuing interest in Lloyd's save for the pre-existing contracts into which I entered, until they expire. Those are the words which I read at the beginning of my speech.

Mr. Mark Fisher (Stoke-on-Trent, Central): Will the Minister explain when those contracts expire and what they are worth?

Mr. Howard: There is no requirement for me do that. I have no idea what the contracts are worth. It means that I cannot renege on any debts that arise or bring those liabilities to an end in any other way.

I should now like to deal with some of the issues raised in the debate. I should like to express my gratitude to those of my right hon. and hon. Friends who have expressed support for the principles enshrined in the Bill. I will confine myself to singling out for particular mention my hon. Friend the Member for Edinburgh, Central (Mr. Fletcher), who, together with my right hon. Friend the Member for Chingford (Mr. Tebbit), made such an enormously distinguished contribution to the preparation of this legislation. I am happy to have this opportunity to acknowledge that.

I have no doubt that the principle of the concept of self-regulation or regulation by practitioners within a statutory framework is the right basis on which to build. When it comes to the daily regulation of the way business is done in the market place and the application to those who transact investment business of the principles governing the conduct of that business which are set out in the Bill, there is no alternative to regulation in that market place by those who know how it works, who understand the complexities that often arise—

Mr. Campbell-Savours rose—

Mr. Howard —and who are organisationally equipped to take quick and effective action and to make that action stick.

To suggest that in some way this process could be carried out more effectively on the basis of an exclusively statutory system of law, enforced by the courts at the behest of lawyers, reveals a complete failure to understand the nature of the exercise which is necessary and with which we are concerned.

Mr. Campbell-Savours: On a point of order, Mr. Speaker. On a point of order raised by my hon. Friend the Member for Great Grimsby (Mr. Mitchell), the Minister was asked a specific question. He was also asked the question by a number of my hon. Friends. The Minister has not been forthcoming in his declaration. Is it not true that the Minister is in a position to divest himself totally of his interest in Lloyd's? Would he care to deny that that is the case?

Mr. Speaker: The point of order should have been addressed to me and not to the Minister. I cannot answer for him.

Mr. Austin Mitchell: Further to that point of order, Mr. Speaker. In his declaration of interest the Minister told us that he has a continuing income from contracts agreed at Lloyd's before he became a Minister. We need to know whether the continuation of that income depends on the regulation or the non-regulation of Lloyd's under this Bill.

Mrs. Kellett-Bowman: Further to that point of order, Mr. Speaker. Would it not be helpful if Opposition Members understood how Lloyd's liability actually works before they start criticising people who cannot divest themselves of possible losses?

Mr. Speaker: Points of order are a matter for me. I cannot answer for the Minister. What I can say is that the Minister has made a declaration of his interests and has divested himself of that interest, as I understand all Ministers are required to do.

Mr. Foulkes: Further to that point of order, Mr. Speaker. I understood that it was the case that Ministers should divest themselves of all pecuniary interests, all outside interests, that conflict with ministerial responsibility and matters about which they are meant to speak to this House. In your view, Mr. Speaker, would it not be more appropriate for another Minister from this Department who does not have an interest to deal with this Bill?

Mr. Speaker: The hon. Gentleman is now seeking to draw me into the argument. I am not prepared to be drawn into the argument.

Mr. Foulkes: Why not?

Mr. Speaker: It is not a matter for me.

Mr. Jack Straw (Blackburn): Further to that point of order, Mr. Speaker. Page 411 of "Erskine May" says:

"No Member who has a direct pecuniary interest in a question is allowed to vote upon it; but, in order to operate as a disqualification, this interest must be immediate and personal,".

My point of order relates to the vote which is due at Ten o'clock. Will you confirm, Mr. Speaker, that it is within the knowledge of this House that your predecessor, Mr. Speaker Thomas, when he had this point raised by me and many of my hon. Friends on the Second Reading of the Lloyd's Bill some three years ago, advised people in exactly the same position as the Minister who were members of Lloyd's, including all those who declared any kind of interest as members of Lloyd's, and those who declared the kind of interest declared this evening by the Minister, not to vote on the Bill? If Mr. Speaker Thomas so advised, why should this Minister be allowed to vote on this Bill?

Mr. Speaker: Perhaps I could clear up that issue immediately. There is a distinction between a private Bill and a public Bill. In matters of public policy, it has been the long-standing practice of the House — originally formulated as far back as 1811 by Mr. Speaker Abbot— that there is no obligation on an hon. Member to refrain from voting on a matter of public policy.

Mr. Straw: Further to the point of order, Mr. Speaker. Page 411 of "Erskine May" directly quotes Mr. Speaker Abbot. The passage which I read out does not relate solely to private Bills; it relates to all Bills. Mr. Speaker Abbot said:

"This interest must be a direct pecuniary interest, and separately belonging to the persons whose votes were questioned, and not in common with the rest of his Majesty's subjects, or on a matter of state policy."

State policy, not public policy. We are discussing a Bill that directly relates to a society of Lloyd's of which the Minister is a member and in which he has admitted that he has a direct financial and continuing interest. Surely that comes within what is said on page 411 of "Erskine May".

Mr. Speaker: I do not need any help on this matter because I have carried out my research on it, as the House would expect. I am in no doubt that on matters of public policy—this is a matter of public policy—it has always been the practice for hon. Members to be able to vote. There is a clear distinction between matters of public policy and private Bills.

Mr. Straw: On a point of order——

Mr. Nigel Spearing (Newham, South): On a point of order——

Mr. Howard rose——

Mr. Speaker: Order. Points of order are for me.

Mr. Straw: Further to the point of order, Mr. Speaker. If what you are saying is exactly correct, will you explain why there is a separate section in "Erskine May" on page 413 on personal interests and votes on private Bills, while the section I have quoted on page 411 plainly relates to Divisions on public Bills? I have now read the whole section. If this is not a direct pecuniary interest which would disqualify an hon. Member from voting on it, what is?

Mr. Gould: Further to the point of order, Mr. Speaker. It may be helpful if we make it clear that the point that is exercising the minds of Opposition Members is not that the Minister failed to make a declaration. We accept that he has made an accurate declaration. We are prepared to accept also that, for one reason or another, he cannot divest himself of his interest. The point that concerns us is whether, in those circumstances, he should present himself at the Dispatch Box to pilot this measure through the House and vote on it at the end of the debate and throughout the Committee. It is on that point that we seek your ruling.

Mr. Speaker: I give my ruling. On matters of public policy, it is in order for an hon. Member to cast his vote.

Mr. Howard: I was dealing earlier——

Mr. Spearing rose——

Mr. Speaker: I have given my ruling.

Mr. Spearing: On a point of order, Mr. Speaker.

Mr. Howard: I was dealing with the question that my right hon. and learned Friend the Secretary of State raised——

Mr. Spearing: On a point of order, Mr. Speaker. I seek your assistance on the distinction between making a declaration and voting, on which you have ruled, and the question whether a Minister of the Crown who is introducing a Bill may have a direct pecuniary interest in a matter on which he seeks legislation or a potential matter which it can cover. Is not the Minister's interest a separate and different matter from the issue of voting and declaration by an hon. Member on a private Bill?

Mr. Speaker: The Minister, like all Ministers, is subject to the ministerial regulations concerning private interest, and he has so declared.

Mr. Howard: I was dealing with the question some time ago which my right hon. and learned Friend had posed earlier on. He said that it was no use talking about "fully statutory systems" or comparable phrases as if the phrase were a label which could be pinned on a regulatory system as some mark of approval. To discuss the question in that way is to avoid the need to give any real thought to the practicalities of the system and how it would actually work. No one was more guilty of the label-pinning approach to the kind of legislation with which the House is concerned tonight than the right hon. and learned Member for Monklands, East (Mr. J. Smith) who, I am sorry to see, is not in his place at this stage—although there is, no doubt, an excellent reason for that.

The right hon. and learned Gentleman said that he wanted an independent, self-standing commission. He prayed in aid of his case — it was a measure of the weakness of the case — a leading article from the Financial Times of 18 October 1984. In order to bolster his case, the right hon. and learned Gentleman had to go back to an issue of the Financial Times which was published three months before the publication of the White Paper on which this legislation is based and 14 months before the Bill itself was published. If the right hon. and learned Gentleman had been a little more up to date he would have found rather different statements in leading articles of the Financial Times.

No doubt the reason that he did not use the leading article which greeted the White Paper in January of this year was that that article said that, although there were reservations about the structures proposed by the Government, there were no quarrels with the guiding principles. He could have quoted from the leading article published on the day after the Bill itself was published, but no doubt he chose not to quote from that because it said that the framework set out in the Bill deserved the strongest support. Rather inconvenient for his argument as those leading articles were, therefore, he went back to one published in October 1984 in order to summon up some scant support for the proposition that he was advancing.

The fact is that Opposition Members who have sought to put forward differences between what they want and what is set out in the Bill, have totally failed to identify with any clarity whatever, precisely what it is that they see as the advantage in some artificial hypothetical system which they choose not to identify but which they apparently commend to the House.

The hon. Member for Yeovil (Mr. Ashdown), who spoke on behalf of the Liberal party, put forward a number of detailed points, assuring the House that they represented not the first and perhaps not the second reaction of his party to the proposals in the Bill but either the third or the fourth, I was not quite sure which.

Mr. Ashdown: They are well thought out.

Mr. Howard: He says that they are well thought out.

I do not complain about the fact that he and his party were in a state of doubt about the Bill. What is interesting is the way in which they seek to implement that state of doubt. The way in which they do it, as the hon. Gentleman assured us when he came to tell us how his party would vote, is that they will vote against the Bill tonight. He sought refuge in the reflex which always governs the Liberal party's actions in these matters: when in doubt vote with Labour. He and his colleagues are in doubt about this Bill and they propose to manifest that doubt by going into the Lobby with Labour Members when it comes to the vote tonight.

I turn now to Lloyd's and why it is excluded from the Bill. The reason why Lloyd's is not covered by the Bill is simple. The main business of Lloyd's is insurance, insurance that is written purely to provide protection and which is not the kind of long-term investment insurance which is covered by the Bill. [Interruption.]

Mr. Speaker: Order.

Mr. Howard: The way in which Lloyd's is organised means that carrying on that insurance business necessarily implies that some investment business is carried out—for example, the investment management of insurance premiums received by members of Lloyd's before claims are paid — but the essence of Lloyd's is insurance business, which is therefore significantly different from the investment business which is the concern of the Bill.

There are considerable advantages in regulating all Lloyd's activities and protecting fully the policyholders and names in a single piece of legislation and within a single, comprehensive framework. Such a piece of legislation exists. It is the Lloyd's Act 1982, giving the council of Lloyd's very wide-ranging powers. Hon. Members must recognise that it is the protection of the policyholders which is paramount and that Lloyd's has an enviable record of success in this area: no valid claim from a policyholder has ever failed to be met.

We recognise the anxiety that exists in many quarters about the adequacy of the 1982 Act, and the working of the regulatory system set up under it in terms of the protection which is afforded to names. That is why my right hon. and learned Friend set up an inquiry into the matter. That inquiry will be full, vigorous and independent, and I am grateful to right hon. and hon. Gentlemen who have welcomed it.

My right hon. Friend the Member for Wanstead and Woodford (Mr. Jenkin) gave the House in measured tones his doubts about the exclusion of Lloyd's from the Bill, and dealt with those reasons which he had not found persuasive, but recognised that in the light of the inquiry there were advantages in waiting for its recommendations and conclusions before taking any decision. Clearly, some people have not been satisfied by that action, and have called for the inclusion of Lloyd's in the Bill in advance of the outcome of the inquiry. They seek to deny the House the advantage of the inquiry's examination of the problem, and its conclusions and recommendations before deciding what action should be taken.

To bring Lloyd's within the scope of the Bill would involve forfeiting those advantages, introducing the extremely difficult practical problems of marrying two different systems of regulations contained in two different sets of legislation, and imposing substantial and unnecessary burdens on both Lloyd's and the regulation of financial services envisaged by the Bill. None of those who have complained about the omission of Lloyd's from the Bill have dealt adequately with those difficulties.

Some right hon. and hon. Gentlemen have raised questions about the extent to which the Bill provides powers for dealing with enforcement. The Government's position is clear. We have repeatedly made clear our determination to tackle fraud, but it is also important to tackle less serious malpractice which results in investors getting a raw deal. The Bill will help to do both. The requirement to be authorised will help to keep potential fraudsters out of investment businesses. Contravention of the requirement will be a criminal offence, and relatively easy to prove. The Bill will make it easier to detect fraud and malpractice. There will be extensive powers to monitor and investigate authorised businesses. The combined investigation resources of the Department of Trade and Industry, the designated agency and the SROs will make it more difficult for wrongdoers to escape detection. Problems once discovered must be effectively dealt with. We are strengthening the criminal law and increasing the resources devoted to enforcement. Criminal law is only part of the solution. Disciplinary action and remedies to recover investors' losses from misconduct are equally important.

The Bill extends the existing rights of an investor to sue a business. That may be expensive, so the Bill enables the Secretary of State or the agency to go to court on an investor's behalf. It is even better to resolve disputes without having to go to court, and I welcome the proposal of the Securities and Investments Board to set up an ombudsman scheme.

The Bill provides tough powers against offenders. The Secretary of State or the agency can withdraw or suspend authorisation, and can use a wide range of intervention powers to protect investors. Those measures will not only catch misbehaviour, but will deter it, which is even more important. I am confident that the Bill will provide all the powers necessary to investigate and act on all sorts of fraud and malpractice. By harnessing the expertise and resources of the City with those of the Government we should be able to secure better protection for investors.

Shortly after I was appointed, I wrote to many right hon. and hon. Members who had expressed an interest in the subject, including Labour Members, saying that I hoped that we could approach this important legislative measure in a constructive and non-partisan spirit so as to ensure that we ended up with the best possible solutions to the problems with which the Bill seeks to deal. That is my objective, and I am confident that we can achieve it. In that spirit I commend the Bill to the House.

Mr. Speaker: The original Question was, That the Bill be now read a Second time, since when an amendment has been moved——

Mr. Walter Harrison (Wakefield): On a point of order——

Mr. John Cope (Treasurer of Her Majesty's Household) rose in his place and claimed to move, That the Question be now put.

Question, That the Question be now put, put and agreed to.

Question accordingly put, That the amendment be made:—

Motor Vehicle Emissions

10.31 pm

The Minister for Environment, Countryside and Local Government (Mr. William Waldegrave): I beg to move,

That this House takes note of European Community Document No. 7283/85 on motor vehicle emissions; and supports the conclusions reached at the meetings of the Council of Environment Ministers on 28th June and 28th November 1985.

Just over a year ago — on 4 December 1984 — this House debated document 7805/84, published by the European Commission in June of that year. That document contained two draft directives, one on the lead content of petrol, and one on vehicle emissions.

In the second half of 1984, progress on the two directives was made at very different speeds. By the time of the debate in December, we were already close to a substantial agreement on petrol-lead; and as a directive that resulted from a United Kingdom initiative, I am pleased that it was adopted as directive 85/210/EEC by the Council of Ministers last March.

By contrast, it was clear that the draft emissions directive had a long way to go; and, not surprisingly therefore, our debate at the end of 1984 concentrated on petrol-lead. I explained during that debate that we expected to have a further opportunity to debate vehicle emissions once the Commission had brought forward new proposals.

At the beginning of June last year, the Commission brought forward new proposals in the form of a revision of its original draft directive. That revision was contained in document 7283/85, which the House is now considering.

As the House will know, agreement on the framework of a new directive was reached by most environment Ministers later last June, and on various outstanding matters in November. Denmark and Greece maintain general reserves which must be lifted before the directive can be adopted by the Council of Ministers.

Before I describe the main elements of the draft directive as it now stands, in the light of the substantial agreements at the Council it is important for me to put vehicle emissions in some historic perspective. The first legislation on vehicle emissions was directed at carbon monoxide, because of the such possible effects on human health as kerbside concentrations built up under certain conditions. That concern has now much diminished as carbon monoxide levels have fallen in the last 10 to 15 years.

Concern is now focused more on levels of nitrogen oxides and hydrocarbons, which contribute to the formation of secondary atmospheric pollution, such as acid rain and ozone. These pollutants can give rise to environmental damage to buildings and vegetation and to the acidification of freshwaters.

It is estimated that in this country petrol engine vehicles are responsible for about 30 per cent. of national emissions of nitrogen oxides from man-made sources, and about 40 per cent. of the environmentally reactive hydrocarbons.

In approaching the recent negotiations, the Government aimed for a step-by-step approach designed to tighten standards as improving technology allowed us to do so in a cost-effective manner.

Mr. Tony Marlow (Northampton, North): My hon. Friend said that the Greeks and the Danes put a reserve on the directive. Since those debates took place, the Spanish and Portuguese have entered the Community. Do they have a reserve, do they have to agree to the directive, or have they already agreed to it? Will it apply to them at the same rate as it applies to other Community countries?

Mr. Waldegrave: Those countries were not legal participants in the decision-taking; they were not part of the process that led to it. They would have to agree to the directive in due course. I shall check this and write to my hon. Friend to confirm it — I think that they have said that they will conform to the directive according to the time scales laid down in it.

Mr. Simon Hughes (Southwark and Bermondsey): Will the Minister confirm that the Danes put a reserve on the directive because they are concerned that it is not environmentally satisfactory? The Greeks did so for a different reason — they have a fundamental concern about the weakness of the directive.

Mr. Waldegrave: As in some other matters, the Danes are pulled two ways, with their overlapping membership of the Scandinavian bloc and of the European Community. They want to go down the same route as the Scandinavians, towards the full American standards. For reasons that I shall describe more fully, we think that that is unnecessary and would be a mistake in industrial and energy conservation terms. They have yet to persuade themselves to join in. I think that it would be fair to say that the leading country in tightening up the standards is Germany, which has accepted the directive.

An important development in the step-by-step, balanced approach was the new fuel-efficient lean burn technology, which various manufacturers, including those in the United Kingdom, had been developing. That technology produces marked reductions in emissions of NO_x and CO, and because those reductions result from the intrinsic design of the engine, they will continue throughout the life of the car.

Some member states — and the Scandinavians, as the hon. Member for Southwark and Bermondsey (Mr. Hughes) said — preferred the technology developed in the United States over the 1970s to meet the, in fact, rather different, environmental problems faced, in particular, in urban California. That is the three-way catalytic converter technology, which can achieve, through a combination of engine combustion control and catalyst technology, substantial reductions in emissions of all three primary pollutants — NO_x, HC and CO — in test conditions. It was a technology that might make some sense in America, certainly at that time, where cars are larger and fuel is cheaper than in Europe, particularly at a time when there appeared to be no feasible alternative. I pay tribute to Johnson Matthey Chemicals, a British company that has won a substantial share of the world market in those products.

Sir Anthony Grant (Cambridgeshire, South-West): I am grateful to my hon. Friend for mentioning Johnson Matthey Chemicals, which is in my constituency. It is a market leader in the production and technology of those catalyst converters, as my hon. Friend will be aware. Is he further aware that it has submitted a document on the subject to the Select Committee on European Legislation?

If my hon. Friend has not seen it, he should take the opportunity to do so, because it is a contribution to the debate. It believes that if the directive is not adopted, cars sold in the United Kingdom will cause more pollution than cars sold in Germany or other European countries.

Mr. Waldegrave: I shall refer to the timescale and the arguments about implementation. Like all such directives, this directive is permissive. It says what countries are allowed to insist on it. It is crucial for what this country and others will do. I shall mention that at the end of my speech. Although we believe, particularly for medium and small cars, that the lean burn route is right, I do not want to belittle the achievement of that company in winning a major share of world markets where the other route has been taken. It is even more difficult for the company as it does not have a home market in the product.

We have always questioned whether three-way catalysts are the best available technology for Europe in the mid-1980s. There are various reasons for that. The first is that our cars tend to be smaller and more economical than in America, so that additional manufacturing and running costs are a more significant part of the total cost for the consumer. The second is that fuel is more expensive.

The third is that bench test results on a new car do not necessarily give a fair reflection of emissions over the total life of a car. Indeed, experience in the United States suggests that the emissions performance of cars with three way catalysts can in practice deteriorate considerably over their life. Fourthly, we now have, in the new lean burn engine, an alternative technology which can, over the life of a car, reduce NO_x probably as well as a three way catalyst, even though it may not do quite so well on the test bench.

Mr. Kenneth Carlisle (Lincoln): I think that everybody accepts that the lean burn engine is a tremendous advance, in that it reduces bad emissions from cars, but does my hon. Friend accept that it does not get rid of hydrocarbons which contribute greatly to ozone in the atmosphere and lead to acid rain? Does he therefore believe that it will be necessary to add to an oxidation catalyst to the lean burn engine in order to deal with hydrocarbons?

Mr. Waldegrave: My hon. Friend is absolutely right. The lean burn engine will reduce NO_x, but if further big gains are to be made in relation to hydrocarbons the oxidation catalyst, with the lean burn, is one of the options that we shall have to consider. The oxidation catalyst is much cheaper than the full three-way catalyst.

I turn now to the agreement that was reached in the council last June, which was further amplified in November. This concerns gaseous emissions from all petrol engined vehicles and diesel engined vehicles up to 3·5 tonnes. As I have said, the agreement is not yet complete, because it is still subject to the two general reserves to which reference has already been made.

Like all the directives governing standards, this directive, if adopted, will be a permissive directive enabling member states to apply standards to various categories of vehicles from specified dates in the future, but leaving them free to apply less strict standards if they so choose.

We expect the directive to contain the following specific provisions. For cars above two litres, member states will be allowed to require emission levels of equivalent severity to those applied in the United States of America by the "federal 1983" standard. The earliest date of any such requirement in Europe will be 1 October 1988 for new type approvals and 1 October 1989 for newly-registered vehicles. Manufacturers will have three options for certifying compliance with these standards. The first is to present results from tests conducted to satisfy United States vehicle test authorities — the straight American test. The second is to meet a replication of the United States test in a European test house. The third is to meet European standards, on the European test cycle, which are estimated to be equivalent to the United States limits on the, different, United States test cycle. The European limit values for this third option would be 25g per test for CO; 6·5g per test for the combined masses of HC and NO_x; and 3·5g per test for NO_x separately. It seems that at least three member states — Germany, Luxembourg and Denmark — will take advantage of these provisions immediately or in the near future. The cars likely to be sold in those markets will be models based on ones that have been developed for export to the United States of America which are already fitted with the three-way catalyst system. The cost of this system is estimated to be about £500 to £800. There would also be fuel economy penalties of about £250 per annum.

For medium sized cars—1·4 to 2 litres—we expect that a technologically more satisfactory route should be possible in most cases. The standards for these medium sized cars should be achieved by lean burn techniques combined with oxidation catalysts, as my hon. Friend the Member for Lincoln (Mr. Carlisle) said, or by comparable cost-effective techniques. In some cases, however, it may be necessary to use the three way catalyst system. This would mean that costs would be similar to those for large cars. Otherwise we expect the additional costs to be of the order of £125 per car, compared with £500 for the three way catalyst system. The fuel economy savings of the lean burn technology will be largely preserved, as opposed to the penalty under the three way catalyst system.

Mr. Iain Mills (Meriden): Has my hon. Friend made any allowance for the effect that this would have on the Austin Rover group compared with European manufacturers in the 1·4 to 2 litre category?

Mr. Waldegrave: As my hon. Friend can imagine, we have had very close consultations, through the Department of Trade and Industry, with Austin Rover, whose interest in the medium category has been in the forefront of our minds. Our view is that we have to decide how far we can push Austin Rover perhaps more quickly than it would like to go at a time when it is re-establishing itself in markets and when it is on its way back to success without running the risk of fragmenting the European market into several bits. That would have greatly damaged the European Community and the sales of cars throughout the Community, and in the long run that would have affected Austin Rover. I will not disguise the fact from my hon. Friend that I can think that, if Austin Rover had been writing the directive, it would not have been so tight. I believe that the group's future development plans and considerable and growing new technological capacities will be able to meet that need and we have preserved a united European market in which it can compete.

Mr. Teddy Taylor (Southend, East): Is it not the case that, since the directive was drawn up, there has been the problem of many European states imposing sanctions against the Republic of South Africa? Does not the catalytic converter depend on the use of rodium which can be obtained only from the Republic of South Africa? Is the Minister willing to consult his Community partners to find out how on earth governments are to introduce these converters depending on rodium when, under the law, they are not allowed to obtain rodium from South Africa?

Mr. Waldegrave: Platinum and rodium are indeed two of the important metals involved in the catalytic converter, but I believe that there are alternatives. We have always maintained that we will not impose three-way catalytic converter technology. That is not a problem for us in the immediate future, but my hon. Friend has made a fair point, although it is not perhaps of immediate relevance to the debate. It is true that the supply of these rare minerals that come from the southern part of Africa rely on the stability of that region and that applies to other goods.

Mr. Taylor: In view of that, will the Minister assure the House that he will consult his Community partners to ascertain whether, within their laws, they are still able to implement the directive?

Mr. Waldegrave: With respect to my hon. Friend, if a Community member chose to implement a directive which was not compulsory but permissive, and found that it could not obtain the materials to implement that directive, that would be a problem for the Community member and not for me. There are some other sources of rodium, but my hon. Friend's point is interesting and important and it might help my hon. Friend if I looked into the sources of rodium and wrote to him about that.

Mr. Tam Dalyell (Linlithgow): There are other sources of rodium—in Zaire, Brazil and Peru.

Mr. Waldegrave: The hon. Member for Linlithgow (Mr. Dalyell) is likely to be well informed on these matters, and I am grateful for his information.

I was discussing medium-sized cars. There is some penalty in the capital cost of the car with the lean burn route. Engine development is slightly more expensive. It will, however, retain fuel economy.

The limits for medium cars would be 30 g/test for CO; and 8 g/test for $HC+NO_x$ combined. There will be no separate limit for NO_x. The earliest application dates for this standard would be 1 October 1991 for new type approvals and 1 October 1993 for all new registrations. Generally, a single path of engine development should serve both for countries which decide fully to apply the standards and for those which do not.

Mr. Marlow: My hon. Friend mentioned the possible position of Austin Rover and said that this is permissive legislation. In other words, countries can apply it as and when they feel that it is appropriate to do so. If it were to help Austin Rover for the Government to be slightly more permissive than other Community Governments, would my hon. Friend consider that course?

Mr. Waldegrave: There are two or more items to balance in coming to that decision. There is the interest of the United Kingdom's environment and the motor industry as a whole. It is noticeable, for example, that Ford has recently made a large investment in this country in lean burn engine technology, aimed at the large market in the European Community as well as the British market. When we come to decide when we should implement these proposals, we will have to balance these matters. Of course, as in the past, the interests of the British motor industry will be close to our hearts when we come to make that decision.

For small cars of up to 1·4 litres, the agreement would provide for the Commission's stage I limits to be applied to new type approvals from October 1990 and for new registrations from October 1991. These limits are 45 g test for CO, 15 g/test for HC plus NO_x and 6 g/test for NO_x. That standard would be tightened two years later—the tighter standard to be worked out over the next two years for an amendment to the directive to be made in 1987. No particular technology or other conditions are specified as regards this tighter standard.

Although not part of the Commission's proposals, the June agreement also confirmed that member states that so wished could offer fiscal incentives for purchasers of cars that achieve lower emissions than those prescribed in the present directive. However, in doing so, the Council laid down a set of conditions for the incentives which limit their value.

At its meeting on 28 November, the last meeting, the Council considered a number of important outstanding questions. First, there was the question of dates from which member states might require new cars to be capable of running on unleaded petrol. That is a necessary counterpart to the directive to which I referred earlier about the supply of unleaded petrol. The Government wanted as early a date as possible for this facility, but some other member states and the Commission preferred a more relaxed timetable. Because of its composition, that would have meant 1993 for most of the United Kingdom car fleet. In the end, the dates were settled as 1 October 1988 for new models above 2000 cc; 1 October 1989 for the type approval of new models below 2 litres; and 1 October 1990 for the registration of all new cars, unless the manufacturer can certify that major re-engineering would be involved. That was a good outcome for the United Kingdom.

Mr. Dalyell: The hon. Gentleman mentioned fiscal incentives. What do the Government have in mind? Will they be significant or token incentives?

Mr. Waldegrave: The fiscal incentives to which I referred, which were delineated and limited in the June agreement, were the incentives offered primarily by the Germans against the capital costs of low-polluting cars.

As regards the introduction of lead-free petrol, which is perhaps what the hon. Gentleman has in mind, we recently issued a discussion paper that included the option of different tax treatments for different types of petrol. We are assessing the various comments made on that document, but I cannot yet give the hon. Gentleman our decision. The American experience was that incentives had to be large to be worthwhile, because of fluctuations in the price of petrol.

Mr. Iain Mills: Has my hon. Friend made an estimate of the effect on Austin Rover of a fiscal incentive to use lead-free petrol in the A-series engine, compared with other models, particularly imported models which do not have the same problems in the combustion of the engine?

Mr. Waldegrave: I understand that the principal problem with lead-free petrol is not so much combustion as whether valve seats are hardened, because lead is the lubricant of the valves as well as an octane booster. Before reaching a decision on whether to use fiscal incentives —we have traditionally been wary of that; we have not had fiscal incentives for the use of diesel—all these matters will have to be considered.

As I said, the agreement on dates was a good outcome for the United Kingdom. We wanted a single, early date and we got a spread, but that is three or four years earlier than France, the Commission and others asked for.

A second question resolved in November was the treatment of cars equipped with direct-injection diesel engines. That is a new, fuel-efficient technology being developed principally, I say with some pride, in Britain by two British companies, Austin Rover and Perkins, which are well in advance of their continental competitors.

Although the June agreement recognised the special characteristics of large diesels by allowing them to meet the limit values for medium-sized cars, the question of the new direct-injection diesels had been left unresolved. It was agreed in November that such engines would not have to meet the new limits until October 1994 for new type approvals and October 1996 for new registrations. This represents a generally satisfactory outcome with regard to the direct injection diesel being developed by Austin Rover and Perkins.

The Council meeting in November also agreed correction factors to ensure that a car with an automatic or continuously variable transmission system should not be penalised in comparison with the equivalent manual transmission version with the same pollution control equipment. It also agreed application dates for new standards for utility vehicles of 1 October 1989 for new type approvals and 1 October 1990 for new registrations. These standards will be less stringent than those for passenger vehicles. The definition of off-road vehicles, which comes within this category, was agreed to include all Land-Rover models, obviously a point of particular importance to us. Finally, the Council settled various outstanding technical criteria for assessing the European equivalent of the United States test for large and medium cars.

That is the basic content of the directive as it now stands. If it is adopted, it will be, as I have said, a permissive directive. That brings me to the question of implementation. I have already explained how emission controls in this country have gradually developed as technology advances have pushed forward the definition of what is cost-effective. These have now brought us to the lean burn engine which, as I have said, promises both emission reductions and fuel savings. The Government wish to encourage this development, and therefore have no intention to impose standards in this country that would require manufacturers to use expensive three-way catalyst technology instead. We shall, of course, keep the situation under review.

It is worth remembering the progress that has been made. As recently as 1970, which is not all that long ago, the first European Community directive review allowed 134 grammes per cycle of carbon monoxide. We are now down to 30. In 1978 controls in Britain produced for medium cars something of the order of 12 grammes per test for NOx. This directive would halve that, divide that by two again. Therefore, progress has been steady. That has to be related to what can be reasonably cost effectively done by technology. That is why we keep the situation under review and proceed in what we hope is a fairly steady way forward.

Our understanding of the environmental effects of atmospheric pollution, and the contribution of vehicle emissions, is increasing all the time. We will have the opportunity to see just how manufacturers succeed in developing more cost-effective technology. I have no doubt that it will be possible in due course to introduce substantially improved standards in the United Kingdom for vehicle emissions without incurring the severe economic penalties and market distortions involved in the policies being followed by some other countries.

In the meantime, work is continuing on other fronts. The Commission is shortly to bring forward proposals for a standard for particulate emissions, particularly from heavy lorries, as far as possible consistent with cost effectiveness, and I hope that we can make progress on this in the Community in the coming months. The Commission is also expected shortly to bring forward proposals for gaseous emission controls on vehicles over 3·5 tonnes. By the end of 1987 we should have proposals for a revised European test cycle; and for the second stage limits for small cars.

The draft directive we are considering tonight will not, therefore, be the last word on vehicle emissions control. There will be further important measures in the next few years. In the meantime the directive, if adopted, will mark an important advance in Community legislation in this field. It would maintain the integrity of the internal market while acknowledging that, because the environmental effects of vehicle emissions vary from country to country, there may be some differences in requirements between member states. I commend the document to the House.

Dr. David Clark (South Shields): We are discussing an issue which is highly technical and complicated, but important for the public health of the country, for the environment and for our motor car industry. On a number of key issues, the Minister was not as forthcoming as he usually is when he tries to explain rather complicated issues to the House. I felt he kept us on a string. He kept saying, "I will say a word about implementation and I will come to that at the end." When he came back to it, all he said was that the Government were not going to go along the route of the three-way catalytic converter. We knew that when we started: that was about the only thing we did know. A lot of questioning must be done this evening, because we want some assurances and some clarification from the Government.

As the Minister has said, these directives do not directly relate to lead. The elimination of lead in petrol is a prerequisite for the directives. Unless we get lead-free petrol, we cannot pursue the other courses.

I ask the Minister to be more forthcoming. He said that he had consulted widely. The environmental and other groups have appreciated the consultation on the implementation of the lead-free petrol regime. The hon. Gentleman has said that he is not yet ready. When will he be ready? In what form does he intend to respond to the questionnaires that he sent out?

It is worth re-emphasising that these proposals for emission standards are part of three inter-related directives. The first is that lead-free petrol should be available in 1989, and we all approve of that. Secondly, all new models at that time must be able to run on lead-free petrol. However, it is one thing to say that cars will be required to be able to run on lead-free petrol, but will they be required to run on lead-free petrol? Unless there is sufficient demand, the oil industry will be reluctant to install capital equipment to maintain the supply of lead-free petrol. That is a crucial point. Thirdly, there are emission controls.

It is worth while shouting loudly and clearly that, whereas the first directive—the introduction of lead-free petrol by 1989 — is mandatory, the other two are permissive. If this or any other EEC Government wish to do nothing about emission controls, they have the licence to do so under these directives. The directives merely lay down the maximum standards that any country can apply.

A number of fundamental questions arise. The first one is a $64,000 question which the Minister must answer tonight. Will the Government adopt these permissive directives? If they will not, we are wasting our time discussing them. How will the Government adopt them? The two questions are connected. If the methods of implementing the directives are not correct, it is irrelevant even to talk about implementation.

As I am not in any way suspicious, I naturally assume that the Government entered into the negotiations with our EEC partners in good will and honest intent. The Minister has pleaded his case for lower standards with great sincerity. Such was the line of argument that he successfully deployed at the negotiating table that he persuaded most of our allies — excluding in particular the Danes—to follow. Our neighbours agreed to reduce the standards. We should remember that these were maximum standards. Our neighbours, which face much more environmental tree damage than we do — especially Germany — agreed to make the sacrifice because they believed that they would get Britain's co-operation and compliance. I believe that many of them are beginning to mutter the words "Perfidious Albion", because it is clear that the British Government have no intention of implementing these directives. In essence, the Minister blatantly conned his ministerial colleagues when he persuaded them to accept lower standards.

Mr. Waldegrave: The hon. Gentleman uses strong words about negotiating in bad faith. I believe that no one in the negotiating chamber is under the slightest doubt that this is a permissive directive. That is a misunderstanding thought up by some outside commentators who do not understand that the directives now, as under the Labour Government, have been permissive. They have always been carried out in the same way. I wholly reject the hon. Gentleman's serious accusation.

Dr. Clark: I am not questioning the rights or wrongs of European legislation, as to whether it should be mandatory or permissive. There are two types of regulations and directives, and I accept the tradition, the convention and the law. The point that I am making is that these directives are permissive. If they are permissive, therefore, we on the Opposition Benches are required to ask if the Government are going to adopt them. That is the whole point that I am making.

One might wonder why the other countries should think in this way. As the Minister has explained, the antecedents of these directives can be traced as far back as 1972, in our own case, but, in particular, the detailed negotiations on the set which we have before us tonight go back, basically, for the past 12 months. They were discussed in great detail last March. If we look at the Government stance on the method of trying to tackle the problem, we see variants.

On 23 March, in a letter to The Guardian, the Minister wrote:

"we would like to see the lean burn technology combined with a simple oxidation catalyst."

That seemed a very sensible approach because here we had the benefit of a new technology, with a lot of British input. Ford UK were very much to the fore in this, introducing a new generation of engines which were much more economical in fuel and much more efficient in the way in which they used it. As the Minister knows, Ford is now slowly going into the third generation of lean burn engine with considerable success. So we all applauded the Minister when he made that statement.

However, of course, things change. I suspect that the Department of Transport had some influence on the Department of the Environment and, of course, the Department of Transport has not got the best environmental record in this Government. We then find that in a statement in the other place the Government Minister, Lord Brabazon, said:

"the Government do not intend to impose standards on vehicles sold or used in this country which would require manufacturers to use catalyst technology." — [Official Report, House of Lords, 22 April 1985; Vol. 462, c. 972.]

So here we have the Minister in the Lords saying, "We are just going down the lean burn route and we are not going to have any catalysts involved." That is a step back because there are great dangers in following that particular route.

Mr. Roger King (Birmingham, Northfield): I note the point that the hon. Gentleman has just made, but does he not appreciate that companies which manufacture cars in this country — Austin Rover principally — in fact sell their cars to mainland Europe—Germany, France, Italy and elsewhere — and whatever the standard is in that country their product, manufactured here, has to meet the highest standards in the European market?

Dr. Clark: That is the very point that the Europeans are now making. We have lower standards in their countries, at a sacrifice to their environment and their public health, in the hope that we can make minor adaptations—one can easily add the oxidation catalyst, and it would cost only about £100, to any standard lean burn engine, and it would meet the lower standards which we persuaded our colleagues to accept. The point that the hon. Gentleman makes is very akin to the point made by our neighbours in the EEC.

If I might just develop this thesis of the Government going backwards a stage further, in a letter dated 12 July to Dr. Russell Jones of the Clear the Minister does one of his graceful shuffles again.

"We have at present no intention to set a standard which would require the use of oxidation catalysts."

That was the Government's position in July. It was a case of will-she won't-she. We have the right to know what the Government will do. Are they in favour of the lean-burn engine plus the oxidation catalyst? If so, we shall support them. If they opt for the lean-burn engine without the oxidation catalyst, we must take issue with them.

As the hon. Member for Lincoln (Mr. Carlisle) has already pointed out to the Minister, there are great dangers involved in having the lean-burn engine without the oxidation catalyst. Unless the Minister changes the Government's approach as he has described it, he will cause greater damage to our environment and public health than if we did not change course. The lean-burn engine reduces oxides in nitrogen, and carbon monoxide, but the Atomic Energy Authority at Harwell has shown that a constant ratio of hydrocarbons with reduced nitrous oxide and reduced carbon monoxide increases the level of ozone, which has largely been causing the damage to vegetation in Europe. Hydrocarbons contain elements which are counter inducive, and many people in public health are greatly worried about the Government's apparent choice.

Mr. Iain Mills: Is the hon. Gentleman aware of the effect on jobs at Austin Rover of the policy that he suggests? Is he suggesting that the oxidation catalyst is the answer? Is he prepared to sacrifice jobs at the altar of the environment?

Dr. Clark: It is clear that the hon. Gentleman has not understood what his Minister has proposed. Austin Rover will have to retool and introduce lean-burn engines. When it introduced lead-free petrol the cost of an oxidation catalyst was minimal.

Mr. Mills: £100?

Dr. Clark: Thereabouts, and on mass production the cost would be even less. Let us not quibble about that. The Minister has already acknowledged that those catalysts can be and are made efficiently in the United Kingdom by Johnson Matthey Chemicals, which is a progressive company. One of its disadvantages is that it has no home market. If it had, it could be more effective in the export market. There will be changes and they must be negotiated. Discussions must be held with Ford and Austin Rover. Those companies must change their engines because of the requirement to have lead-free petrol, and at the same time they must introduce a form of lean-burn engine. Indeed, they are working towards it now. The job implications of that are not on the scale that the hon. Gentleman suggests.

The Government have been and are acting irresponsibly. They should consider our neighbours, and if they are not prepared to do that, they should consider our people. Unless they are prepared to make the directives operative, we shall damage our environment, the British motor car industry, and the health of the British people. We expect answers from the Minister later this evening.

Mr. Peter Griffiths (Portsmouth, North): I welcome this debate. I say that to start with because there is little else favourable to say about my hon. Friend the Minister's speech or the Government's approach to the problem.

The Government demonstrated an evident lack of enthusiasm in their approach to atmospheric pollution caused by motor vehicles. Whether pollution has been caused by lead in petrol, hydrocarbons or nitrogen compounds, they have always had to delay and find a more cost-effective solution and to reject immediately available solutions. The hon. Member for South Shields (Dr. Clark) was asked whether jobs should be sacrificed to environmental considerations. I would be prepared to accept such job losses in inefficient industries if the result was clean air.

I was one of the few hon. Members who criticised last night's proposals concerning seat belts. I objected to motorists being nannied into doing something that was said to be for their own good. I said that I strongly believe that anyone who has the privilege of motoring should recognise that he is having an effect on the environment. I see every reason why the Government should grasp the nettle of environmental protection. If that means that some firms are unable to meet such considerations, they, not the environmental needs of the people, are to blame.

Mr. Iain Mills: The real conflict is not between the environment and the motor car but arises from the fact that these directives would disadvantage our manufacturers. Others have engines that are more well developed along the proposed lines. The oxidisation catalyst will disadvantage our manufacturers. Jobs will be lost, not because of any conflict between cars and the environment but because Europeans have better developed engines.

Mr. Griffiths: My hon. Friend shows that we agree about the circumstances and disagree about the solution. I lived in Los Angeles some years ago, before attempts were made to reduce environmental pollution there. I have been back occasionally and seen the amazing results of their efforts. Regulations in California are far more rigid than in the rest of the United States and than those that we can hope to enjoy. The average motor car lasts rather more than 11 years, so it will be many years before we enjoy fresh air.

We did not fail to develop the catalytic converter, but we failed to use it. That is a tragedy. The technology was available at the beginning of the 1970s. It could and should have been used to prevent the untold damage to the environment that has taken place since.

I think it is unfair of the Minister to say that there is a problem in this country when one of his arguments is that the cost of petrol in this country is greater than it is in the United States. In fact, it is not to do with the cost of petrol but with the amount of taxation levied on petrol. Given that the motorist is so heavily taxed, it would surely be possible for us to look for the kind of fiscal incentives to which my hon. Friend referred. There will not be a movement towards the use of modern technology, be it catalytic converters or lean burn engines, unless there is some clear and obvious advantage to the motorist purchasing a new vehicle. We should be considering ways in which to persuade people to use lead-free petrol and to exchange their current types of vehicles for vehicles that have more efficient engines or are fitted with protective devices. These are essentials for the future. The Government should be addressing these problems urgently with a view to ascertaining the solutions.

I have indicated that I am not very happy with what is happening. I believe that we have an opportunity now to bring together the interests of the motorist, the motor manufacturers and the public at large. We have to make use of the technology of today without delay.

If I may return to the California example, to which I have referred, it was suggested that very few foreign manufacturers would be able to sell motor cars in California if the Californian regulations were introduced. Although certain models have been withdrawn, one notes that a large number of vehicles across the range of motor manufacturers have joined the American models on the streets.

[Mr. Griffiths]

Whatever regulations we have in this country will be applied not only to British motor manufacturers but to anybody who wishes to sell in this country. In this country there should be the highest levels of requirement in the protection of the enrivonment and of the air that we all breathe. If that implies costs for the motorist—and I yield to nobody in my support for motoring and the motorist—I would be prepared to pay. I believe we owe that to the people who are not motorists. They have a perfect right to say to those of us who are motorists that we have no right to poison the environment.

It is the job of Government to give an active, positive and a direct lead. We have not had that tonight or, indeed, for many years. It is about time this country set a lead in Europe by demanding higher standards rather than dragging its feet and hoping that other countries will set the pace while we grudgingly accept something less than that which we know is achievable and which could be achieved in a short period of time if we had the will and the determination.

Mr. Simon Hughes (Southwark and Bermondsey): The hon. Member for Portsmouth, North (Mr. Griffiths) has hit the nail on the head. Despite the Minister's long technological introduction, we shall be seen as being incapable of doing anything about our own backyard and as the dirty men and women of Europe. The truth is that the Minister knows that, on the matter of emissions from vehicles, his right hon. and hon. Friends from the Department of Transport have won the day and the green image of the Government is absent on this issue. The environmental consequence of what has been said tonight is that we have spent years negotiating something that we have no intention of implementing. We are going to do nothing about it—that is what the Minister said.

This is a permissive directive which we have made as harmless as possible by the process of negotiation, and we shall not implement it, anyway. It is bad news if British industry and British motor manufacturers believe that they are helping themselves by defending polluting vehicles and claiming that they are satisfactory. If we had been sufficiently far-sighted 10 years ago——

Mr. Iain Mills: Will the hon. Gentleman give way?

Mr. Hughes: I shall give way in a moment. It is clear that in this debate the hon. Gentleman speaks for Austin-Rover. He has made his point. He speaks for the motor industry, his constituency, jobs in his constituency and votes. I understand his position.

Mr. Mills: What does the hon. Gentleman speak for?

Mr. Hughes: I speak for the environment on this issue. I speak also for those in inner cities who are polluted day after day by vehicle emissions. If we had had the foresight 10 years ago——

Mr. David Lightbown (Staffordshire, South-East): Will the hon. Gentleman give way?

Mr. Hughes: I shall not give way for a moment. If we had had the foresight 10 years ago to anticipate the technology that we would need to ensure pollution-free motoring, we could have made greater advances towards it. I am not the only one to say that——

Mr. Mills rose——

Mr. Hughes: For example, the Select Committee in another place, which considered these issues in February 1985, said much the same thing, as the Minister well knows. It said in paragraphs 72, 73, 74, 75, 76 and 77 that it was not satisfactory to wait for lean burn technology to make the necessary progress. We must introduce deadlines and we must abide by them. If we do not, the motor industry will drag its feet. It will say that what we want cannot be achieved.

Mr. Mills: Will the hon. Gentleman give way for a short intervention?

Mr. Hughes: I shall give way in a moment, but I remind the hon. Gentleman that he has intervened on several occasions already. The Minister took 25 minutes to describe the directive and only one minute to say that it would not be implemented. There should be an opportunity for those who are concerned about the environment to say that we have been presented with a somthing-and-nothing document. The Government have made a something-and-nothing decision and it would be deceptive if the Minister were to pretend that progress had been made.

The hon. Member for South Shields (Dr. Clark) was correct when he said in answer to a question about the export of motor cars that we shall not have any motor cars to export if the Germans for example, apply the directive and we do not. Our motor manufacturers will not have anything to export that complies with the directive if it is implemented abroad. Alternatively, they will have to manufacture vehicles for the mainland market——

Mr. Lightbown: Will the hon. Gentleman give way?

Mr. Hughes I ask the hon. Gentleman to listen for a moment. They will have to make vehicles for abroad that are unlike those that pollute our own streets. In other words, better vehicles will be exported than those that are sold on the home market.

I have told the the hon. Member for Meriden (Mr. Mills) that I would allow him to intervene, and I shall let him do so once during my speech. I have a few more critical comments to make before I conclude my remarks.

Mr. Mills: At Gaydon in the west midlands, Austin Rover has spent millions of pounds over the past few years on computer facilities to try to analyse and understand exhaust emissions and to enable its cars to cope well with exhaust emission regulations. It has spent millions of pounds trying to understand how to make its cars more clean in terms in emission, more acceptable and better for the environment. That money has not been spent on customers or promotion.

Mr. Hughes: I do not doubt that for a moment. However, if the hon. Gentleman thinks that it is not worth charging the consumer another £50, £60 or £100 to have a pollution-free environment, he is wrong. If we continue to pollute the environment, the countryside into which people now drive for enjoyment will not be there to be seen. That is in addition to the damage that we are doing abroad. I have much in mind the acid rain that we are adding to by failing to control vehicle emissions.

Mr. Lightbown rose——

Mr. Hughes: No, I shall not give way. The pollution that we are creating will result in a legacy of environmental destruction, and those who ride in cars want to enjoy the environment as much as anyone else. The polluter should pay. If I, as a motorist, the hon. Member for Meriden or any other Member who is a motorist, pollute the environment when the necessary technology is available in the form of converters and the development of lean-burn engines we should pay for the damage that ensues. We should pay all that we need to ensure that that damage does not ensue. If that increases the prices of vehicles by another £50, it is pretty good value. I do not mind paying that increase and I hope that Conservative Members do not either. I do not think that the majority of people in Britain would object to paying that increased price. Indeed, I recollect that opinion poll evidence tells us that the public are prepared to pay more for their vehicles if the increased price meant reduced pollution.

Mr. Waldegrave: Is it the policy of the hon. Gentleman's party to insist on full United States standards with three-way catalysts for all cars?

Mr. Hughes: We would implement the directive and make sure that it was effective here. As for small vehicles, the Government have given no undertaking. We would make sure that stage two was implemented and the timetable agreed in two years. As yet there is no evidence to show that the Government are likely to abide by that. We also believe that it is appropriate to combine a lean burn engine development with a converter for medium-sized engines. That is the way to proceed. We should not wait for the lean burn engine technology to develop to deal wth the problem alone.

Mr. Waldegrave: The hon. Gentleman has been helpful. After all the sound and fury, what he is saying is that he also would have negotiated against the Germans for the standards that I brought back. I am most grateful to him.

Mr. Hughes: The Minister misrepresents the position. That is not what I said. We are used to misrepresentation from the Government Front Bench. [Interruption.] Conservative Members should not laugh; they should treat the matter more seriously. We would have negotiated a directive that we would have been prepared to implement rather than argue about. We would have made sure that we complied with a timetable that meant that by the end of the decade there was no pollution that could not be controlled either by converters or by lean burn engines.

Mr. Lightbown rose——

Mr. Hughes: I will not give to the hon. Gentleman. He has made sedentary interventions.

We know the position. The Department of Transport has forecast an enormous increase in vehicles by the end of the century; I think the forecast is 25 to 50 per cent., of which the majority will be small vehicles. It is important that implementation of emission controls for small vehicles is carried through urgently so that it is not just medium-sized vehicles that are the beneficiaries of any action that the Government assist them to take. I challenge the Minister to tell us also in his reply whether the Government intend to implement the directive for vehicles over 2 litres. Will he say clearly whether he is in favour of using converters, if necessary, in medium-sized vehicles so that a combination of the two technologies may mitigate pollution?

The Minister came to the House with one good point and one lousy point. I compliment him on negotiating a satisfactory timetable for the provision of lead-free petrol in Britain. I do not want to detract from that announcement. The timetable is good. No one could be substantially critical, although we might argue that it could have been done a couple of years earlier. My party believes it could have been done by 1987 but the negotiated agreement is acceptable.

Surely, however, the Minister cannot take pride in pretending that the agreement on vehicle emissions is satisfactory. I ask him to go back to his colleagues in the Department and try again to win the argument for the environment and not for the polluters. When he spends so long negotiating with our colleagues in Europe he should do so with the intention of implementing the results of the negotiations.

Mr. Roger King (Birmingham, Northfield): The motor industry as represented in this country by elements which can still be described as British is capable of meeting the European requirements on exhaust emissions. The question we have to ask ourselves is whether those requirements as met by known technology will fulfil what we seek — a cleaner environment. If an enormous amount of time and money is spent on research to develop lean burn engines, the fitting of catalysts of any kind is like putting a belt on one's trouasers when one is wearing braces.

Experience shows that catalysts are not efficient. In America, tests were recently carried out in Los Angeles on cars fitted with catalytic converters, which showed that in well over half the cars that were examined, they did not operate. The problem with such exhaust controls is that, when they do not work, the car pollutes far more than it would have done had such a system not been installed in the first place. Whether these are three-way systems or single systems, their life expectancy is no more than three to four years. Quite apart from that, there is the cost of the raw materials and the fact that the sole supplier of it is South Africa. The alliance would not trade a bean with South Africa, but it is conceding a business worth billions of pounds a year to that country by demanding the fitting of these converters. They are also open to tampering and polluting by the user.

More to the point is to look at the way that the catalyst operates. It works properly only at a temperature of about 600 to 800 deg C. The European test cycle was designed to test the catalysts at a temperature of between 350 and 400 deg C. Therefore, they are not working properly. Even worse, when traffic is being used in a city environment, the catalyst hardly works at all because the engine temperature does not get to the temperature required to trigger the catalytic operation. The end result is that the atmosphere is poisoned even worse than it would have been if the darn thing had not been fitted in the first place.

Lean burn must be the only realistic answer for Europe's travel. If, during the course of the negotiations, we had been able to achieve a level of hydrocarbons plus nitrous oxide levels of 9·5g instead of the 8g at which we eventually arrived, it would be possible for Europe to have concentrated its efforts on pure, lean burn engine technology, and, because of the improvements in fuel efficiency—about 30 per cent. over the cars of just a few years ago—the amount of energy that we would be consuming would go a great deal further. That must concern every environmentalist because energy is a finite resource.

There is no point in developing expensive lean burn if one still has to use a catalyst. That is a deterrent to manufacturers because, to pass European requirements, they have only to stuff the car's exhaust system with filters — never mind how the engine performs. That is the cheap, easy way out, and a fuel inefficient way to do it.

I have one complimentary remark for my hon. Friend the Minister. Thanks to his negotiating staff and that of his colleagues, he has been able to get an extended life for the direct-injection diesel before it has to reach certain emission standards. I am sure that the British manufacturers, and certainly Austin-Rover and Perkins, are grateful for that. However, one thing which that engine does not enjoy which the rival German product does is a fiscal incentive. This is a disadvantage for our engine, and one hopes that this matter can be looked at.

We all want to see a more clean and tidy environment, but not at any cost — not at the cost of dredging up yesteryear's ideas on how to clean up exhaust emissions, which have been proved to be useless, or partly useless in America, where the technology has been found to be badly wanting. We should use the latest engineering technology, the latest advances by scientists and engineers in engine management systems, the design of engines and the way that they are constructed to tackle the real problem of pollution. At the same time, we must tackle the efficiency of the engine in terms of reduction in fuel consumption, which is another concern to which Europe must address itself in its fight to protect the planet's resources. If at some stage we have to compromise, let us compromise on workable technological answers and not on developments that have proved to be wanting.

Eventually, in order for us to have a universal European category or series of requirements, what my hon. Friend the Minister has told us will probably stand. I am sure that the British manufacturers will be able to meet the requirement. But they will meet it at a cost to the individual. It has been estimated that the measure will cost Britain £1 billion a year, and in Europe as a whole the cost will be huge. That cost will be passed on to the motorist. It is all very well to say that we should be prepared to pay a price to clean up the environment. If the system works, all well and good, but people will object to paying £1 billion a year for a system over which hangs many question marks.

Hon. Members with cars in the underground car park may care to reflect that they may shortly have to spend perhaps £500 to replace the exhaust systems on their vehicles. We are speaking tonight of a cost that should not be lightly dismissed.

Mr. Iain Mills (Meriden): The hon. Member for Southwark and Bermondsey (Mr. Hughes) said that I might have been a spokesman for the Austin-Rover group. My only interest in that group is that it supplies jobs for my constituents, as it does to the constituents of some of my hon. Friends. Having worked in the car components industry for about 20 years, I can claim to have quite an interest in the subject.

I congratulate the Minister on taking a bold stance, one that has taken his Department and this party a long way to achieving what many people thought the Conservative party would never achieve in terms of the greens, the ecology groups, and all concerned with looking after the environment. The Minister has gone a long way towards recognising that the people of Europe, and particularly of Britain, want the environment to protected from, among other things, lead in the air and in water.

This important matter should not be dismissed lightly. Nor should the technicalities of how we achieve it be dismissed without much consideration, especially as there is a balance between jobs and the environment. Our car industry has social responsibilities. It recognises that in providing jobs and building motor cars, it must accommodate into those vehicles the technical facilities that will allow the cars to operate without polluting the atmosphere.

For that reason, the motives of the industry are not to be denied. Simply from the point of view of marketing, the industry is keen to make its cars less environmentally polluting. It wants to make our cars better than those of the Germans, the French and the Italians so that they will appeal to people who want cars that do not pollute the atmosphere.

How is that to be achieved? Those with some engineering knowledge appreciate that this is a complex matter. While I approve of what the Minister has achieved, I have some reservations and questions. In particular I have reservations about the category of 1·4 to 2 litre cars. It has been agreed that smaller cars can function on lean burn.

As an engineer — I used to make my living on the drawing board, so I understand the way in which pam, computers and technology can design engines, tyres and other components — I assure the Minister that it is strongly felt in the industry that vehicles of 1·4 to 2 litres could have achieved the right levels by lean burn. But the levels that have been agreed for certain contents of some substances will not allow lean burn to be the solution for engines in the 1·4 to 2 litre category.

In that category, we shall face at least single point fuel injection, electronic ignition and secondary air. Some models may need no catalyst, but, in the extreme, a three-way catalyst may be needed. I agree that, in terms of those who make the catalysts, some jobs may be created, but a serious problem will exist for higher-volume new cars.

I refer to the Minister's brief, sent to the all-party motor industry group. Some of us saw my hon. Friend. The incremental costs for 1·4 to 2 litre cars are associated with the oxidation catalyst and additional controls, and could be in the range of £100 to £150. We have discussed that tonight. If a three-way catalyst is required for that category of cars, the costs could be as much as £800 to £1,000. If that could have been done by lean burn technology, it should have been. Jobs and the environment would have been protected. That would have been a far better solution for British and European car manufacturers. I should be grateful for the Minister's response to that. There will be an effect on the Austin-Rover group and on Ford, which I do not speak for, as I do not represent Dagenham. I represent the midlands, and many of my constituents work for Austin-Rover, so I had to make that point.

I should be grateful for my hon. Friend's comments on whether the Chancellor can be persuaded, in view of the 1·4 to 2 litre categories, which are assuming such great importance in the debate, to allow the tax benefits and tax costs that accrue from the benefit of having a company car to be brought in line. That would be of great benefit to our domestic car manufacturers. Many would benefit if the tax bracket was lifted to 1·4 and 2 litre cars, in line with the 1·3 litre category. I notice that at least one significant newspaper today has mentioned speculation about this. If my hon. Friend cannot give an answer tonight, I ask him to bear that in mind.

A period is needed for adjustment. However much we might want to see the environmental benefits from the moves that we are making, no less a period than three years will be needed for engineering and the huge and long processes from drawing board to reality. There is speculation that a fiscal advantage of a 16p reduction might be considered for lead-free fuel. The Minister should bear it in mind that some domestic manufacturers may find that a disadvantage. If such a fiscal incentive is offered for the use of lead-free fuel, there should be a time scale allowing domestic manufacturers to accommodate it.

I congratulate my hon. Friend on his stances, not just on the motor car, but on other environmental matters. I urge him forward to greater progress in protecting the environment in a practical way.

Mr. Waldegrave: I am grateful to my hon. Friend the Member for Meriden (Mr. Mills) for his final and opening remarks. They made a fitting end to the debate because they explained the unusual and increasing vigour, to put it politely, that we see from the various Opposition parties when the subject of the environment comes up. Perhaps they feel that they have to begin attacking the Government when, perhaps, we are doing better than they would like.

The worst speech of the evening—I say this with respect to him because he often makes very good speeches and baits me on the Floor of the Chamber—was that of the hon. Member for Southwark and Bermondsey (Mr. Hughes). His attack would have been logical if he had said that he and his party stand for the tighter controls for which some of the Scandinavian countries, the Californians and the Germans are pressing. But he did not say that. He said that we should have the lean burn engine and the oxidation catalyst. That has now been negotiated. However, we in this country now have to balance the industrial and environmental advantages that were advocated so vigorously by my hon. Friend the Member for Portsmouth, North (Mr. Griffiths) and decide when we shall implement the directive. The hon. Member for South Shields (Dr. Clark) pressed me to get on with it and to write to him by next Tuesday and tell him when we shall implement it. I cannot yet do so, but that is the next decision for us to make.

These directives are aimed at delineating what can be done without breaking up the European market. There was a real risk that the European motor car market would be broken up, and that would have been very costly for the consumer. My hon. Friend the Member for Portsmouth, North would rightly have been very cross with us, because he has vigorously pursued the case for the consumer. However, he has paid scant attention to the realities of the industrial structure. Viscount Davignon, the former Industry Commissioner, made a formidable remark before he retired. Of the German proposals to provide fiscal incentives for those cars that cause little pollution, he said that it was the first time that a European country had introduced proposals that would directly subsidise Japanese industry. We must take into account such considerations.

My hon. Friends represent hundreds of thousands—indeed, millions—of people who are employed in the steel industry and in the component industries, and their interests must be balanced with those of the environmentalists. My hon. Friend the Member for Portsmouth, North said that untold damage had been caused to the environment of the United Kingdom because the three-way catalyst was not introduced in the early 1970s. That damage is certainly untold because it has not been told to me. I do not believe that the damage to the environment of this country that has been caused by failing to introduce the three-way catalyst in the early 1970s can be measured.

The hon. Member for South Shields quite fairly put the point that several European countries are facing severe air pollution problems. They have the continental atmospheric conditions that produce inversions. Therefore, this is an urgent problem for them. That is why we are trying to establish a market that allows them to do enough without ridiculous costs being imposed upon the rest of us for environmental conditions that we do not share. Those who read Hansard may judge from the conflicting advice that has most helpfully been given to me in this debate that the kind of compromise that we have reached may be on the right lines.

The speech of my hon. Friend the Member for Birmingham, Northfield (Mr. King) was excellent and full of good sense. He asked me specifically about the fiscal incentives for direct injection diesels. Without breaking the confidentiality rule concerning Council meetings, I am able to tell my hon. Friend what happened. I went in and batted for this, but it was a difficult case to argue that the privilege of fiscal incentives designed to produce lower-polluting engines should be extended to engines for which we have successfully negotiated derogation from pollution control. It was a bit of a try on, really, and I thought that it was better not to press those negotiations to the limit. It was more important to get derogation for direct injection diesels. In due course the technology will undoubtedly be developed for lower-polluting engines as well as for other admirable aspects. We must allow it to be developed a little further. We should have been pressing the point too far also to ask that at this stage in the development of that interesting technology engines for which we have negotiated derogation should be granted fiscal incentives.

It was a little unfair of my hon. Friend the Member for Portsmouth, North to say that this country has always dragged its feet. Britain pushed forward the discussions on lead in Europe. The speeches of my hon. Friend before 1983 might well have been fairly made. My right hon. Friend the Member for Bridgwater (Mr. King) listened to such speeches and took the lead. He saw the matter through and the hon. Member for Southwark and Bermondsey was generous enough to acknowledge that. We came back with a much better date than many feared we would get for the introduction of cars that can run on lead-free petrol. Even the hon. Member for Southwark and Bermondsey gave me some credit for that.

We are not debating implementation. That is the next matter for discussion. The hon. Member for South Shields was right to point that out. We are debating the fact that we have now described the regulations for a coherent European market that preserves the lean burn route. As a Government, we are not ruling out the oxidation catalyst and I would not criticise the oxidation catalyst in the same way as I would criticise the three-way catalyst. The oxidation catalyst has simpler and more robust technology, which can work perfectly well with the lean burn engine. As my hon. Friend the Member for Portsmouth, North correctly said, there are costs involved, but we must accept that the great advantage of having maintained the lean burn route is that there are also consumer and energy gains. In the long term I suspect that during the development of the lean burn engine, we may see developments even beyond what can be achieved with the three-way catalyst. That is running a little ahead of present science, but that technology is pregnant with hope for the future and is certainly not limited.

The compromise was agreed by the Community—not just by Britain but by France, Italy and the other car manufacturing countries that were most anxious not to be landed with expensive technologies on small and medium-sized cars that could not be justified. The Community compromise is one that defines sensible pollution controls for that market.

Dr. David Clark: The Minister has come and gone like a yo-yo on lean burn and oxidation catalysts. It would be helpful if he would explain why, in March, he was agreeing to the oxidation catalyst but by July he said that the Government had no intention of setting a standard that would require the use of the oxidation catalyst. The Minister has changed his position on that issue.

I am encouraged by what I thought he said earlier. Is the Minister now prepared to look at the possibility, if necessary, of lean burn plus the oxidation catalyst? The Opposition believe that that would be an important step. We should judge these directives in that context and would like to know when they are to be implemented. I appreciate that the Minister cannot say when they will be implemented, but can he give the House and assurance that the Government intend to implement the directives.

Mr. Waldegrave: The hon. Member for South Shields should judge the directive from two sides. The directive is designed to achieve two purposes. It should maintain the coherence of the common market in cars that is one of the great triumphs of the European community. That aim has been achieved. The other object is, at the same time, to achieve gains for the environment in individual countries.

The Government's position on implementation has not changed. My noble Friend Lord Brabazon spoke in another place about the three-way catalysts. In the conclusion to the debate, it appeared that he was ruling out all catalysts, but he afterwards made it clear that he did not mean that.

The rules are laid out for the market and each country now has to consider what it will do. One or two countries have made their decisions, but we are not yet in a position to make a decision. We have not ruled out oxidation catalysts or implementing the directive, but we have always said that we will not have the three-way catalyst. We do not think that the environmental pressures in this country are of such crisis proportions that that would make sense. That is a decision that we still have to make. I cannot give the hon. Member for South Shields the date by which that decision will be made. Nothing is ruled out except the three-way catalyst and I hope that that position is clear to all hon. Members.

On that basis, I hope that the House will approve this hard-fought directive. Even my hon. Friends who would have liked it to be harder fought have been generous enough to recognise that more has been done for some of the interests of their constituents than they had expected at some times.

We always have to balance the need to push industry a little with the need not to load too many costs on it. I believe that the directive just about strikes a happy medium.

Question put and agreed to.

Resolved,

That this House takes note of European Community Document No. 7283/85 on motor vehicle emissions; and supports the conclusions reached at the meetings of the Council of Environment Ministers on 28th June and 28th November 1985.

Reprocessing Plant, Dounreay (Inquiry)

Motion made, and Question proposed, That this House do now adjourn.—[Mr. Lennox-Boyd.]

12 midnight

Mr. James Wallace (Orkney and Shetland): I welcome the opportunity to raise on the Floor of the House the terms of reference of the public inquiry into the proposed fast reactor reprocessing plant at Dounreay in Caithness.

In the latter part of May last year, the Parliamentary Under-Secretary of State for Energy announced that Britain would seek to play its part in a collaborative European programme on fast reactors by seeking to have a reprocessing plant sited at Dounreay. On 3 June, the then Secretary of State for Scotland called in the joint planning application of British Nuclear Fuels and the United Kingdom Atomic Energy Authority because he believed that the proposed development had implications of greater than regional importance which he wished to see examined at a public inquiry.

The Secretary of State subsequently appointed Mr. Bell as the reporter, and the date for the inquiry was originally set for 17 February. At a pre-inquiry meeting held on 12 December to discuss procedure and general preparations for the inquiry, the reporter allowed a postponement for seven weeks because of the uncertainty of the applicants about what would be the port of entry for spent nuclear fuel that would have to be transported to Dounreay.

I do not think that anyone who has followed the issue would disagree that there has been general discontent in Scotland and further afield about the remit of the reporter. That discontent led a number of bodies and individuals to seek meetings with the former Secretary of State for Scotland, the right hon. Member for Ayr (Mr. Younger).

In July a petition signed by more than 30 organisations and individuals was sent to the right hon. Gentleman. It sought a meeting, but that was refused. A request for a meeting from two Members of the European Assembly was rejected by the Under-Secretary in a letter in September. I twice formally sought a meeting, along with other hon. Members, not only from my party, to try to demonstrate the broad agreement, particularly on the Opposition Benches, over the terms of reference of the inquiry.

In a letter dated 11 November, the Under-Secretary said:

"As the responsibility for the final decision on the application will rest with the Secretary of State, following the inquiry, I do not believe it would be appropriate for George Younger or myself to meet you to discuss issues concerning the case in advance of the eventual decision."

The Secretary of State will act in a quasi-judicial role and to the extent that he might have been addressed on the merits of the proposal, so it would have been proper for him or the junior Minister to refuse to meet delegations to discuss the merits of the case.

There is an important distinction to be drawn between representations on the merits of the proposal and representations relating to the form and the nature of the inquiry. It is on the form and nature of the inquiry that these representations for a meeting were made. The previous Secretary of State for Scotland failed to draw that distinction, as will be evident from the letter I have just quoted, and it is because of that that I have sought to raise the matter in the House.

We have a new incumbent in the Scottish Office who has perhaps the added advantage over the previous Secretary of State in that he is not only a right hon. Member but a right hon. and learned Member. He will note this legal distinction and perhaps be more willing to listen to the representations that have been made about the terms and nature of the inquiry. What is principally proposed by those seeking a wider remit is a joint planning inquiry commission. The basis of statutory authority for referral to a planning inquiry commission, is found in section 45(2) of the Town and Country Planning (Scotland) Act, 1972 which states,

"Any of the matters mentioned in subsection (1) of this section"— that indisputably applies to this application—

"may be referred to any such commission under this section if it appears expedient to the responsible Minister or Ministers that the question whether the proposed development should be permitted to be carried out should be the subject of a special inquiry on either or both of the following grounds—

(a) there are considerations of national or regional importance which are relevant to the determination of that question and require evaluation, but a proper evaluation thereof cannot be made unless there is a special inquiry for the purpose;

(b) the technical or scientific aspects of the proposed development are of so unfamiliar a character as to jeopardise a proper determination of that question unless there is a special inquiry for the purpose."

These provisions in the section are fulfilled in this case. The joint planning inquiry commission is provided for under section 47 of the same Act in circumstances where interests in both Scotland and England are affected. Because of the national policy implications, these are United Kingdom considerations and therefore a joint planning inquiry commission is appropriate.

Mr. Simon Hughes (Southwark and Bermondsey): The particular importance is that a decision taken in a planning inquiry about Dounreay will clearly have an effect as a precedent on the prospective applications for developments of similar sites elsewhere on the coasts not only in Scotland but in England. It is not just in relation to this particular inquiry that there is great concern throughout the United Kingdom, but also because it will clearly be used as a marker and a remit for future public inquiries even under technically English as opposed to Scottish legislation.

Mr. Wallace: My hon. Friend has added yet another argument why the joint planning inquiry planning commission is appropriate. In correspondence to me in response to parliamentary questions the Minister has taken the view that the considerations spelt out in the sections to which I have referred, do not apply in this case. This is an application of national and, indeed, international importance. The proposals form part of a joint European collaboration project, the terms and implications of which have never been debated by this House. Unlike the inquiries over the thermal oxide reprocessing plant at Windscale or the Sizewell inquiry, because of the narrow terms of reference imposed on the proposed local public inquiry, there will be no opportunity for objectors or interested parties to assess or question the policy issues underpinning this development.

It has international importance, because, as I discovered on a visit to Norway last year and from other representations which we received from Denmark, there is fear that any liquid emissions or discharges from a proposed reprocessing plant could, because of tidal currents affect the west coast of Norway and Denmark. It raises issues of proliferation. The Government maintain that there are sufficient safeguards in various international treaties and that there would be no breach of our obligations under the non proliferation treaty.

Writing in the house magazine of the French utilities industry, M. Lammers said that the Superphenix fast reactor in France

"will produce in the mantle of its core enough plutonium of ad-hoc quality to make about 60 bombs each year. Under these conditions, Superphenix becomes of course the technical basis of the French nuclear military force."

I shall not go into the merits of that case — although plutonium from the Superphenix will undoubtedly be reprocessed at any such plant. However, an important issue is involved. The Government say that there are sufficient safeguards, but a man involved in the French energy industry says that the Superphenix is implicated in French military nuclear planning.

What about our commitment to fast reactor technology, of which reprocessing is an important and essential part? There has been general understanding that we would not go down the road towards commercial fast reactors without a full-scale public inquiry. It appears that we are now going a long way down that road with only an inquiry with the narrowest of remits.

In view of the low cost of uranium and the great stockpiles of plutonium in Europe, are we making a worthwhile use of our resources in this plant? Before going down the road towards the fast reactor economy, we should bear in mind the comments of the sixth report of the Royal Commission on environmental pollution, which warned against becoming overdependent on an economy based on plutonium before we properly consider the alternatives. We need a forum to consider the role that could be played by alternative energy sources.

I do not expect the Minister to go into the merits of the arguments on national energy policy, but important issues for this generation and future generations must be discussed and taken into account. A local planning inquiry is not a suitable forum to consider those issues fully.

Environmental considerations are causing considerable concern in my constituency, not least because of what happened at the Windscale plant. The criminal operation of that plant by British Nuclear Fuels lead not only to its successful prosecution but contamination of the Irish sea. Until now, the Dounreay establishment has been operated solely by the United Kingdom Atomic Energy Authority, but the present planning application is a joint one by BNFL and UKAEA.

In a letter sent out before the 12 December meeting, the reporter, Mr. Bell, said:

"I regard my remit as extending to the consideration of all land use, environmental and safety questions which can be regarded as the foreseeable consequence of approving this development, provided these consequences are not too remote."

How far can these environmental considerations be looked at in a public local inquiry? I do not believe that it will go far enough. Is an accident a "foreseeable consequence"? It is important to have a proper risk assessment of all the possible consequences of an accident or, in these days of sabotage and terrorism, deliberate interference with the plant. Do the environmental considerations extend as far as the level of discharges? It has been suggested that that is a matter for the Scottish Office, which already determines the level of discharges having regard to internationally agreed acceptable levels. This would exclude any consideration of whether these international levels are acceptable. There can be no safe dose of radiation. It is a matter of subjective opinion—no doubt based on the highest quality scientific evidence—what constitutes acceptable levels. These matters should be open to public debate and scrutiny. Again, a joint planning inquiry commission would refer to circumstances where the "technical or scientific aspects of a proposed development are of so unfamiliar a character as to jeopardise a proper determination of that question unless there is special inquiry for that purpose."

I do not think that it can be reasonably or honestly said that the reprocessing of spent nuclear fuel as part of the fast reactor fuel cycle is a matter which the Scottish Office or indeed Britain is exactly familiar with. I do not think that this type of application is of a familiar character. It is of a unique character and one which can only properly be scrutinised and challenged if one has a special inquiry for the purpose.

Admittedly, there is a plant already in existence at Dounreay, which reprocesses some spent nuclear fuel, but the volume of fuel which would go through the proposed plant is 10 times as much as that going through the existing plant. Although the authorities at Dounreay maintain that they can keep discharge levels down to the present rate, that again is a matter for consideration; and I very much doubt whether proper and effective scrutiny of that claim can be made by a public local inquiry.

Then there is the whole question of transport. The inquiry was postponed because of doubts as to what the port would eventually be. In a comment in the Glasgow Herald of 8 January of this year, Mr. Peter Davies, head of the European demonstration fuel reprocessing plant inquiry team for the Atomic Energy Authority, said:

"If British Rail decided to abandon the North Highland line, our plans would fail. There is no way that this inquiry can impose a transport inquiry on us."

So there is this whole question of transport and of the port of entry, particularly from the point of view of my constituents who are worried about the transportation of radioactive material through what I am sure the Minister knows can be a rather stormy Pentland Firth to Scrabster or Wick. It is a matter of considerable importance. In the light of that claim by a senior employee of the United Kingdom Atomic Energy Authority, can the Minister indicate the extent to which transport is a relevant consideration? Is it correct to say that a transport inquiry cannot realy be part and parcel of the local public inquiry which is currently to go ahead?

The further advantage of a joint planning inquiry commission is that the commissioner can commission his own evidence, which can to some extent overcome some of the secrecy which unfortunately has been part of the nuclear authority's approach to the present inquiry, and can also help to overcome some of the funding problems.

As I indicated when I quoted from the Act, it is a matter of whether the Secretary of State considers it expedient. He, one fears, wishes to get a quick answer to this because perhaps of other matters — for example, the French desire to site the reprocessing plant in France. Nevertheless, the whole planning procedure which is meant to be there, particularly for local inquiries, to air the fears and the objections of people, not only local people but those further afield who have an interest, comes into disrepute if it is felt that the procedure does not match up to the scale and importance of the issue before it.

If our planning procedures do not have the confidence of the people generally, we could be building up for ourselves a considerable amount of trouble in the future.

It may be said that the Windscale and Sizewell inquiries went on for too long. They were not joint planning commission inquiry commissions, and I would invite the Minister to reconsider the matter and to take what would be a unique step in setting up a joint planning inquiry commission. The issues involved are of sufficient national and international importance, and relate to matters of scientific and technical interest which are unique. They could certainly not be described as familiar. They warrant the major step of having a planning inquiry commission.

The Parliamentary Under-Secretary of State for Scotland (Mr. Michael Ancram): I am glad to have this opportunity to respond to the hon. Member for Orkney and Shetland (Mr. Wallace) on this matter, about which we have corresponded on many occasions during the past months.

I shall deal with as many of the hon. Gentleman's points as possible. I must, however, register an apology in advance. Some of the points raised impinge directly on the subject matter of the public inquiry itself. As the hon. Gentleman will know, it is particularly important for me as a Minister with planning responsibilities to refrain from comment on matters which the reporter is charged with looking into, because it will be my duty subsequently to consider his report and to give my view to the Secretary of State about the planning decision. I hope that the hon. Gentleman will recognise my difficult position, and the need for me to exercise great care in what I say.

I should like to recall the events leading up to the inquiry. On 31 May 1985, the United Kingdom Atomic Energy Authority and British Nuclear Fuels plc submitted a planning application to Highland regional council for permission to site the plant, known as the European Demonstration Reprocessing Plant, at Dounreay. In accordance with the requirements placed on the council, the application was notified to my right hon. Friend the then Secretary of State. Shortly thereafter my right hon. Friend announced that he would in due course call in the application for his own decision, and would arrange for a public local inquiry to be held. He asked the planning authority, the Highland regional council, to proceed in the meantime with the initial statutory publicity and consultations. He also asked the developers to prepare an environmental assessment of their proposals to supplement the information which they had already supplied along with their planning application to the regional council.

In September, my right hon. Friend called in the application, as he had promised to do. He made it clear that he had done so because he considered that the proposal could have planning and environmental implications extending within and beyond the area for which Highland regional council was responsible as planning authority—matters which he wished to be examined at a public local inquiry. I am sure that the hon. Gentleman welcomed that action, and the recognition—which did not in any way prejudge the planning merits of proposed development—that those aspects would be of wider than simply local concern. The hon. Gentleman has reflected that tonight. Following receipt of the applicants' environmental assessment, my right hon. Friend appointed a reporter to hold the public inquiry. He also appointed a technical assessor to assist the reporter in view of the scientific and technical aspects of the proposed development which might need to be considered. The hon. Gentleman has made much of the reporter's terms of reference, which are quite simple. I should like to recall what they are. The reporter was appointed under planning legislation to hold a public local inquiry into the planning application, and to report on the inquiry to the Secretary of State with recommendations, or with his reasons for not making any recommendations. It is clear from the terms of reference that no limitation has been put on the reporter's discretion to examine any matter which he considers relevant to whether planning permission should be granted. That is the question before my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State, and it is for the purpose of helping him to determine that question that the reporter has been appointed to hold the inquiry.

The reporter has subsequently interpreted his remit as covering all land use, environmental and safety questions which are not too remote from Dounreay. He has said that the inquiry will also be concerned with relevant socio-economic issues affecting Highland region and the adjacent islands. At the pre-inquiry meeting held in Thurso on 12 December the reporter also decided to postpone the starting date of the inquiry by seven weeks to 7 April to allow time for the developers to be more specific about their preferred options for the transport arrangements, which, although they are not part of the planning application, are essential to the development. The inquiry will provide an opportunity for all the relevant concerns of the hon. Gentleman's constituents to be considered.

The hon. Gentleman has asked in correspondence, and tonight for the application to be referred to a planning inquiry commission, rather than to be dealt with by normal planning inquiry procedure. Both aspects have been dealt with in correspondence which I have had with him and in replies given to the House, one of which I gave to the hon. Gentleman.

As the hon. Gentleman said, a planning application may be referred to such a commission where it appears to the Secretary of State in considering whether or not to grant planning permission for a proposed development either that a proper evaluation of relevant issues of national or regional importance cannot be made without a special inquiry, or where the technical or scientific aspects of a proposal are of so unfamiliar a character that a proper determination of the case would be jeopardised unless there were a special inquiry. I do not have any evidence that either of these criteria apply in this case. The reporter can consider the technical and scientific aspects of the proposal, and he has a technical assessor to assist him. The hon. Member also mentioned a joint planning inquiry commission. This provision would apply only if there were planning matters involved affecting the responsibilities of planning Ministers in Scotland and England, and in terms of the responsibilities of planning Ministers, it does not apply in this case.

Mr. Wallace: Is the Minister saying that he believes that the technical and scientific aspects of the proposed development are familiar? Does he agree that this is an unique application and that there is no experience in planning terms of a fast reactor reprocessing plant in Scotland?

Mr. Ancram: I have already said that, having considered the matter, I do not have any evidence that the criteria that the hon. Gentleman mentioned, and which I have repeated, apply in this case. It would have to be on that judgment that such a decision would be made.

The hon. Gentleman also said that, regardless of what inquiry procedure is adopted, he would wish the remit of the inquiry to be extended to consider matters of Government policy. Hon. Members may recall that my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State for Energy wrote on 21 May 1985 to the chairman of the United Kingdom Atomic Energy Authority enclosing a statement of the Government's general policies on the United Kingdom's participation in the European fast reactor collaboration and on the regulatory procedures which would apply to the building of a European demonstration reprocessing plant in the United Kingdom. In making that statement available to this House on 24 May, my hon. Friend the Parliamentary Under-Secretary of State for Energy made it clear that the Government see advantage to the nation and to the European collaboration in siting the reprocessing plant in the United Kingdom but that such siting would be subject to the agreement of our European partners in the collaboration and to the necessary planning, safety and environmental consents being granted.

That statement is available to the inquiry, as is a statement of the Government's radioactive waste management policy. Government witnesses will be available at the inquiry to clarify, if need be, these matters of Government policy. It is another matter to suggest that Government policy should be looked into by the reporter as part of his remit. I am afraid that I am not able to agree with the hon. Member's suggestion in that regard. My right hon. Friend the then Secretary of State made it clear that the inquiry will not be extended to an examination of the merits of these matters of Government policy. The purpose of the inquiry is to consider the simple question of whether planning consent should or should not be given for the proposed development. The reporter has indeed made it clear in his letter of 9 January to parties to the inquiry that he will make his recommendation on the basis of planning considerations, including the safety aspects and does not consider that there is any presumption that the national interest would justify automatic approval.

The inquiry will also have before it statements of the regulatory procedures governing radioactive waste management, the licensing of nuclear installations and the transport of radioactive materials prepared respectively by Her Majesty's industrial pollution inspectorate, Her Majesty's nuclear installations inspectorate and the Department of Transport. Witnesses will be available to give evidence at the inquiry on these matters.

The hon. Member mentioned nuclear discharge and safety and asked whether they could be considered. The reporter will be able to consider the safety and environmental aspects of the proposal. The regulatory bodies that I have mentioned have made statements available to the inquiry, and they will provide witnesses.

The reporter has asked the applicants to clarify certain aspects of the transport arrangements, although they do not form part of the planning application. It will be for the reporter to determine how far he needs to examine the proposed transport arrangements. Further information and evidence from these and other parties to the inquiry will no doubt become available in due course. I have every confidence that the inquiry will provide an opportunity for a wide-ranging examination of all of the issues relevant to whether planning permission should in due course be granted.

Question put and agreed to.

Adjourned accordingly at twenty-nine minutes past Twelve o'clock.

Oral Answers to Questions

TRADE AND INDUSTRY

Financial Services

1. Mr. Michie asked the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry when he next proposes to meet the Confederation of British Industry to discuss the regulation of financial services.

The Secretary of State for Trade and Industry and President of the Board of Trade (Mr. Leon Brittan): I am always interested to hear the views of the Confederation of British Industry, but I have no plans for a specific meeting in the near future.

Mr. Michie: Why did the Financial Services Bill not make it clear that we ought to have statutory bodies independent of the people whom they are supposed to be reviewing? That is successfully done in most of the financial markets in the rest of the Western world. Why cannot we have completely independent statutory bodies?

Mr. Brittan: The independence of the Securities and Investments Board or its successor is unquestioned, but there is a real advantage in having regulatory bodies consisting of people who themselves are practitioners close to the market. That will lead to tighter rather than looser regulation.

Sir Anthony Grant: Is my right hon. and learned Friend aware that many of us who are keenly interested in the subject of financial services sought to pose a number of questions to the Government in yesterday's debate, but we could not get an answer from my hon. and learned Friend the Under-Secretary of State because he was subjected to a most disgraceful muckraking campaign by the Opposition, with the result that serious points could not be answered? Will he find an opportunity to answer some of those questions in the near future?

Mr. Brittan: I am sure that I or my hon. and learned Friend the Under-Secretary of State will wish to take the opportunity to put on the record the points that my hon. and learned Friend was unable to deal with yesterday. One is always suspicious of circumstances in which a Minister has answers to give but the Opposition seem reluctant to hear them.

Mr. Ashdown: The Secretary of State might accept that while the personal reputation of the hon. and learned Member for Folkestone and Hythe (Mr. Howard) is beyond question, it nevertheless remains the fact that Lloyd's is a major issue in the Bill, and to have a member of Lloyd's, of whatever status, pilot the Bill through the House of Commons is bound to be misunderstood——

Mr. Speaker: Order. The question is concerned with the CBI.

Mr. Ashdown: Does the Secretary of State recognise that the CBI and others are bound to misunderstand that, and that it is bound to undermine the standing of the Bill and, indeed, the probity of the Government? Will the right hon. and learned Gentleman reconsider the matter and, if the hon. and learned Member for Folkestone and Hythe cannot divest himself of his interest in Lloyd's, will he think of giving another colleague——

Mr. Speaker: Order. That has nothing to do with it.

Mr. Brittan: The CBI has made no representations to that effect.

Mr. Gould: Given that one of the major objects of the Financial Services Bill, with which the CBI and everyone else is concerned, is the avoidance of conflicts of interest in the City, is it not odd that the Minister responsible for the Bill is himself involved in a conflict of interest? Is the Secretary of State aware——

Mr. Speaker: Order. The same principles apply to the Front Bench. The question must concern meetings with the CBI.

Mr. Gould: This is a question relating to the regulation of financial services, which is the subject of the question on the Order Paper. Has the Secretary of State had his attention drawn to the Churchill-Butler statement on these issues, which has been endorsed by a line of successive Prime Ministers, the first paragraph of which reads: "It is a principle"——

Mr. Speaker: Order. That does not relate in any way to discussions with the CBI. The shadow Minister must relate his question to that aspect.

Mr. Gould: Nevertheless, this is a matter with which the CBI and everybody else in the City will be concerned. Will the Secretary of State ensure that if the Minister is unable for any reason to divest himself of the interest which he holds in Lloyd's, he will——

Mr. Speaker: Order. That is quite out of order.

Privatisation

2. Mr. Nellist asked the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry if it is his intention to bring forward measures for the privatisation of all the publicly owned enterprises listed in the answer of 27 November, Official Report, column 870, within the lifetime of the current Parliament; and if he will make a statement.

The Minister of State, Department of Trade and Industry (Mr. Peter Morrison): No. It is not expected that all the businesses mentioned in the previous answer can be wholly returned to the private sector during the current Parliament.

Mr. Nellist: Before the Secretary of State departs the Front Bench, will the hon. Gentleman ask him whether he is aware that privatisation so far has cost working people in Britain over £1·4 billion as a result of the Government under-pricing the assets that they have sold off, has given the mates of the Secretary of State in City institutions £300 million in fees and expenses, and has resulted in worse services and higher prices to working people?

Rather than have further privatisation of publicly owned assets such as Rolls-Royce, which is in my constituency, why does the Minister not ask the Secretary of State to bring forward a one-day Bill, as did the right hon. Member for Old Bexley and Sidcup (Mr. Heath) in respect of that company, to nationalise Westland plc and guarantee the jobs of the workers in Yeovil and the Isle of Wight?

Mr. Morrison rose——

Mr. Speaker: Order. This is Question Time, not an Adjournment debate.

Mr. Morrison: I can assure the hon. Member for Coventry, South-East (Mr. Nellist) that I put all those questions, precisely as he would have wished me to do, to my right hon. and learned Friend the Secretary of State. My right hon. and learned Friend agrees with me that all the hon. Gentleman's propositions are wrong.

Mr. Kenneth Carlisle: Does my hon. Friend agree that denationalisation has been a good policy for this country? Have those businesses concerned not done better and begun to make profits? Above all, do not 90 per cent. of their employees now own shares in their own companies.

Mr. Morrison: I agree with my hon. Friend, and must emphasise that the vast majority of employees now feel the benefits of privatisation.

Mr. James Hamilton: Will the Minister confirm that the Government have given the British Steel Corporation a mandate to accelerate the company towards privatisation, with special emphasis on the tube-producing section? Will he confirm that that is Government policy?

Mr. Morrison: I can certainly confirm that our policy, and that of the BSC, is directed towards a competitive and profitable industry.

EC-USA Steel Arrangement

3. Mr. Hayes asked the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry if he will make a statement on the EEC-USA steel agreement.

Mr. Peter Morrison: The new EC-USA steel arrangement, ratified by the Council of Ministers on 10 December, is generally acceptable to the United Kingdom. The United Kingdom delayed ratification for several weeks, during which assurances were obtained from the United States authorities on adequate access for BSC exports of semi-finished steel to Tuscaloosa Steel of Alabama under an existing long-term contract.

Mr. Hayes: I congratulate my hon. Friend on achieving what appears to be a satisfactory settlement to a very thorny problem. Does he accept that that was done through painstaking negotiation?

Mr. Morrison: I assure my hon. Friend that the negotiations were long, complicated and difficult. However, it was essential for the steel corporation that we hung out for what we obtained.

Dr. Bray: Does the Minister acknowledge that the level of exports of slabs to the United States, permitted by the United States, is nowhere near adequate to maintain Ravenscraig without Gartcosh?

Mr. Morrison: I do not acknowledge that. As the hon. Gentleman is aware, by and large the deal that we obtained, with the exception of that part relating to Tuscaloosa, was based on current exports.

Exporters (Assistance)

4. Mr. Robert Atkins asked the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry if he is satisfied with the financial and other support given to exporters by his Department.

The Minister for Trade (Mr. Paul Channon): I am confident that support given to exporters by my Department is effective, but I am, of course, always looking for ways to improve it.

Mr. Atkins: Is my right hon. Friend aware that many of us are extremely grateful to him for his work concerning exports? However, is he further aware of the criticisms of exporters and companies in various constituencies about the ECGD? They think of it as an umbrella available when the sun is shining, rather than when the need arises.

Is my right hon. Friend aware that with many countries, such as Thailand and Mauritius a policy of soft loans would be beneficial to exporters in seeking to achieve success in those markets?

Mr. Channon: I am grateful to my hon. Friend for his remarks.

The ECGD has two duties, to provide an efficient support to exports and to break even, and that is difficult in view of the present economic conditions throughout the world.

I shall consider my hon. Friend's point about Thailand and Mauritius. As he knows, I am still doing my best to help him and his constituents with the famous Bangkok bus project.

Mr. Jim Spicer: Will my right hon. Friend take note that in this context the opportunities available to our exporters in Turkey are valuable, and will he pay particular attention to those opportunities?

Mr. Channon: Of course I shall. I take note of my hon. Friend's view about opportunities in Turkey.

Mr. Skinner: Does the Minister recall negotiations with a couple of firms which are trying to sell refuse collection vehicles to Ecuador but which are running into some trouble? — [Laughter.] — I know that this is different from normal practice, but that is what the game is about. Is the Minister aware that his Department has been holding up arranging export credit guarantees which would enable workers to build the refuse collection vehicles in the midlands and north-east Derbyshire? Is he further aware that more than 50 jobs are on the line? Why is the Minister causing all these difficulties by stopping the export credit guarantee arrangement? Will he deal with the matter, because if it is not finalised this week the jobs will go and the balance of payments will be the loser?

Mr. Channon: I shall, of course, look at the matter. Ecuador has been a recipient of the DX facility from the ECGD. I do not know about the specific case that the hon.

Gentleman has in mind, but it is likely that it involves a case for which I have just agreed there should be export credits.

Mr. Thurnham: Does my right hon. Friend agree that the purpose of exporting is to make us wealthier, rather than poorer?

Mr. Channon: Yes, Sir.

Mr. Maclennan: Is the Minister prepared to consider whether the financial duties requiring ECGD to break even are too tight and so defeat the purpose of existing exports?

Mr. Channon: I shall certainly look at that, but I should be surprised if any rational man could come to that conclusion. The ECGD's cash flow problems are well known and serious. That is not surprising in a period of great economic difficulties throughout the world.

Cars (UK Content)

5. Mr. Wood asked the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry what steps he is currently taking to seek to persuade car manufacturers based in the United Kingdom to increase the United Kingdom content of their cars sold in the United Kingdom.

Mr. Peter Morrison: My right hon. and learned Friend, I and officials meet senior management of the United Kingdom car manufacturers regularly to discuss this and similar matters, with encouraging results. For example, after a recent meeting with my right hon. and learned Friend, Vauxhall's chairman and managing director announced the company's plan to increase the United Kingdom content of the vehicles that it builds here from about 50 per cent. in the past year to about 60 per cent. by the end of this year.

Mr. Wood: I thank my hon. Friend for that reply. Concern is caused when individuals are encouraged to buy British and some manufacturers, although based in this country, use a large imported content in their vehicles. Does my hon. Friend agree that good component manufacturers operate in Britain and that they should be encouraged by further purchases from firms such as Vauxhall?

Mr. Morrison: I agree with my hon. Friend. As I said in my original answer, my right hon. Friend and I, and others in the Department, do everything that we possibly can to encourage purchases from home-based component manufacturers.

Dr. Marek: Is the Minister aware that one of the steps that he can take is to ensure that we have a continuing supply of competitively priced and efficiently produced engineering steel in Britain? Will the Minister do everything in his power, if the United Engineering Steels company wishes, to ensure that a concast is installed at Brymbo steelworks?

Mr. Morrison: The hon. Gentleman makes a particular and specific point. I agree that the component parts are important. I am happy to take his point on board and to look at the matter carefully. I can say no more than that at this stage.

Mr. Roger King: Does my hon. Friend agree that there is a contrast between our open attitude in ensuring as free a market as possible for the manufacture of cars in Britain and the attitude of other countries, notably Spain, which is conducting a blockade of our components?

Mr. Morrison: Yes, but as my hon. Friend will be aware, negotiations are proceeding. We hope that they will be brought to a successful conclusion.

Mr. Williams: As nearly all the increased import penetration in the car market since the late 1920s has arisen from the tied imports of Ford and Vauxhall—of course, we welcome the recent modest announcement—does the Minister agree that Vauxhall, with its massive trade deficit on vehicles, must make a far more substantial investment in major components, such as engines and transmissions, made in Britain, and possibly restore a design capability? Have not the Government made such investment more difficult with their record of five years of abnormally high interest rates? Interest rates are almost double what firms would have to pay if they went to Germany.

Mr. Morrison: I would not describe the recent announcement as modest. It represents a significant increase. I agree with the hon. Gentleman that the more our domestic component manufacturers sell, the better. His wider question is a matter for my right hon. Friend the Chancellor of the Exchequer.

Mr. Hanley: While recognising my right hon. and hon. Friends' considerable efforts in increasing the United Kingdom content of cars made in the United Kingdom, may I also ask that they recognise the tremendous contribution made by United Kingdom car component manufacturers to the content of cars made abroad? Will they encourage foreign buyers to buy even more components from the United Kingdom?

Mr. Morrison: I entirely agree with my hon. Friend. The more that United Kingdom car manufacturers buy domestically, the more it will encourage foreign manufacturers to buy products made by British component manufacturers.

Multi-fibre Arrangement

6. Mr. Gould asked the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry what progress has been made in preparing for the negotiations for the renewal of the multi-fibre arrangement.

13. Mr. Lawler asked the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry if he will make a statement on the current position regarding negotiations concerned with renewal of the multi-fibre arrangement.

Mr. Channon: The Council of Ministers will be considering the Community's negotiating mandate at its meeting on 27 and 28 January. I announced the policy of the Government in the House on 9 May last year. I am meeting representatives of the industry and other interested parties next week.

Mr. Gould: Is the Minister aware of the anxiety felt in all parts of the industry at the strong and persistent report that, despite his stated commitment to the effective renewal of the multi-fibre arrangement, British officials are in the van of those in Brussels who are pressing for a weakening of the import regime? Does he recognise that a substantial dilution of the MFA will cause immense damage to the British industry, and will he assure the House that henceforth his officials will work religiously towards the achievement of an effective renewal?

Mr. Channon: I assure the hon. Gentleman that the British officials in the negotiations are working under instructions from me and are following the Government's policy. I am surprised that the hon. Gentleman, with his experience in this area, should imagine anything else.

Mr. Lawler: There is some anxiety and confusion in the industry about whether the Government believe that this should be the last such arrangement. Will my right hon. Friend clarify the position?

Mr. Channon: We have never said that this should be the last MFA. A new MFA is likely to last for four or five years. The longer-term future of the MFA should be decided in the context of the proposed new GATT round of international trading talks.

Mr. Torney: Is the Minister aware that the textile industry in Bradford has suffered for many years because of the importation of goods produced by competitors who use cheap labour? Is he further aware that if the multi-fibre arrangement is not renewed, or if it is weakened, it will create chaos in the woollen textile industry in Bradford and bring more unemployment to an area which already has above national average unemployment?

Mr. Channon: The hon. Gentleman knows that it is the Government's policy that the MFA should be renewed. He will be pleased to know that during the first 10 months of 1985 wool textile exports increased by 14 per cent. to a record £518 million.

Mr. Meadowcroft: Is it not true that many companies have coped and will cope with the diminution in the MFA, and that even within companies, some sections — for instance, spinning—will benefit from imports, whereas other sections, such as finished products, will suffer? Will the Minister remember that in any renegotiation we must be aware of that distinction and assist British companies to cope with the genuine free market at which they are aiming rather than protect them artificially?

Mr. Channon: In general I agree with the hon. Gentleman. I am meeting representatives of the industry next week, and no doubt all those points will be considered in great detail.

Mr. Sims: In the discussions, will my right hon. Friend take particular account of the views of the Hong Kong Government? Is he aware that although the present agreement is supposed to benefit underdeveloped countries the benefit has been very small and it has been to the disadvantage of Hong Kong? Will he ensure that the future agreement, if it does not help Hong Kong, at least does not penalise it?

Mr. Channon: It is not for the British Government alone to decide the contents of the agreement, but we certainly take the view that it should give favourable treatment to the poorest developing countries and to developing countries with very low barriers to British exports, which includes Hong Kong.

Mr. James Lamond: Is the right hon. Gentleman aware that import penetration in textiles is six times what it was 10 years ago and that unemployment is again increasing in the north-west, including my constituency, which still depends heavily on the textile industry? Will he check again with his civil servants on the point made by my hon. Friend the Member for Dagenham (Mr. Gould), because authoritative sources on the employers' side suggest that British civil servants are taking a leading part in pressing for a much more liberal multi-fibre arrangement?

Mr. Channon: I assure the hon. Gentleman, as I assured his hon. Friend, that the civil servants negotiating in Brussels do so with my express authority, and I keep a close control on and watch every detail of the negotiations. What the hon. Gentleman said is correct to a certain extent. That is one reason why we are seeking a renewal of the multi-fibre arrangement, which I believe met with the general agreement of the House last May.

Mr. Madden: Is the right hon. Gentleman aware that workers in the textile industry suspect that Ministers at the Department of Trade and Industry are more interested in protecting their own political careers than in protecting the British textile industry? Does he accept that although there is no doubt that the Government are committed to renewal of the MFA, there is considerable doubt as to the extent to which the Government want a major relaxation of the controls? Will he now give a firm undertaking that the British Government do not favour or support any major relaxation of the MFA controls?

Mr. Channon: The first part of the question says more about the hon. Gentleman than about Ministers at the Department. Any renewed MFA is bound to be more liberal than the present arrangement. I think that that is generally understood. As I have said, it should provide favourable treatment for the poorest developing countries and those with low barriers to British exports, and it should also help in relation to children's clothing. I am anxious to see a more liberal MFA, but one which does not damage the textile and clothing industry. The industry understands that very well, and I shall be discussing the matter in great detail with the industry next week.

USSR

7. Mr. Tom Cox asked the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry what was the total amount of trade between the Union of Soviet Socialist Republics and the United Kingdom for the year 1985.

Mr. Channon: The full year's figures are not yet available, but the total amount of trade between the United Kingdom and the Soviet Union in the first 11 months of 1985 was £1,150 million.

Mr. Cox: Is the right hon. Gentleman aware that as relationships between the Soviet Union and the rest of the world improve, so do opportunities for trade? Is he further aware that the United States has already sent major trade delegations to the Soviet Union to try to build up the United States' share of that trade? What help is the Department giving businesses in this country to do likewise? In particular, what special financial help is available to get contracts under way initially?

Mr. Channon: The hon. Gentleman is quite right. Following Mr. Gorbachev's visit to this country, I believe that there are considerable prospects for increasing trade between Britain and the Soviet Union. In the short term that increase has not yet materialised, but at the annual meeting of the British-Russian Joint Trade Commission on 6 and 7 February we shall be making a major effort to increase trade. Very good facilities are available for business men to trade with the Soviet Union, and they receive normal help from the Department. If the hon. Gentleman has any specific case in mind, perhaps he will get in touch with me.

Mr. Terlezki: Is it conceivable that some of our industrial technology is being sold to the Soviet Union and may be used in the further development of Soviet star wars plans, nuclear weapons or, indeed, any type of weapon?

Mr. Channon: I hope that that is not possible. My hon. Friend will be aware that there are controls under the COCOM arrangements to stop such exports.

Mr. Tom Clarke: Is the Minister aware that the Gartcosh plant exports considerable orders to the Soviet Union as well as to other countries? Can he say when his Department will respond to the overwhelming recommendation of the Scottish Select Committee? If not, can he whisper to his right hon. and learned Friend and give the House the information?

Mr. Channon: I admire the hon. Gentleman's ingenuity, but that is not a matter with which I have been dealing. However, my right hon. and learned Friend has heard what the hon. Gentleman has said.

Northern Region

9. Mr. Merchant asked the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry how much in regional grant aid has been made available to the northern region since 1979.

Mr. Peter Morrison: A total of £913 million in regional grant aid has been made available to the northern region during the period 1 May 1979 to 30 November 1985.

Mr. Merchant: Will my hon. Friend take this opportunity to reaffirm his personal commitment to beneficial regional aid? Does he agree that his answer gives the lie to those who claim maliciously that the Government have ignored and not helped the northern region? Will he confirm that the Government have given more than £1 billion to the northern region, including inner city aid?

Mr. Morrison: I entirely agree with my hon. Friend. The northern region benefits more than any other part of the country from our regional policy, and rightly so. Some 97 per cent. of the working population are covered. My hon. Friend's sentiments are correct, whatever anyone else might say.

Mr. Nicholas Brown: Does the Minister agree that, since 1979, 125,000 industrial jobs have been lost in the northern region and that the level of unemployment on Tyneside is among the highest in the country? Can he at least give us the assurance that aid from his Department to the northern region will not be reduced in the next three years?

Mr. Morrison: As I said in reply to my hon. Friend the Member for Newcastle upon Tyne, Central (Mr. Merchant), the difficulties that the northern region is passing through are onerous, burdensome and personally unappetising to many families and people. That is why our regional policy is directed more towards the northern region than to any other part of Great Britain.

Mr. Fallon: Does my hon. Friend agree that in the 1970s the northern region suffered from indiscriminate regional aid? Can he confirm that the new policy is working well and providing more jobs with the money used?

Mr. Morrison: I agree. When my right hon. Friend the previous Secretary of State announced the new regional policy, it was directed towards job creation. That has to be the right way in which to target considerable sums of money.

Mr. Campbell-Savours: Will the Minister confirm that in real terms there has been a reduction in regional assistance to the northern region since 1979, although there has been an explosion in unemployment? Will he answer the question yes or no? We do not want a flannel answer?

Mr. Morrison: I shall answer yes, but I hope that the hon. Gentleman will allow me to qualify my answer to the extent that the money, which is still considerable, is now being targeted much more towards job creation.

Mr. Beith: Did the Minister note the remarks of the retiring regional director of his own Department on unemployment? He expressed disquiet over the point that, in London, it seemed that if there were no riots in an area, there were no problems. Did the Minister agree with the emphasis that the regional director put on the need for public sector spending in the north-east? Does he fear that if something is not done we shall merely store up trouble for the future?

Mr. Morrison: I did not see Mr. Atkinson's remarks, but I do not agree with them precisely, as presented by the hon. Gentleman. The northern region gets more regional aid than other parts of the country, in some of which there have been riots.

Mr. Holt: In view of the failure of the Ministry of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food to locate Cleveland on the map, and in view of the failure of the Department of the Environment to decide how big the county of Cleveland is, and despite the Government's generosity so far in the northern region, will my hon. Friend confirm that, as the question relates to the availability of money, if any schemes from Cleveland are put forward the Government will not be ungenerous but will consider them sympathetically?

Mr. Morrison: Regardless of what my hon. Friend says about Cleveland, he can rest assured that the county of Cleveland is well put on the map, by himself, constantly. The level of money given out depends on the number of applications. I shall be delighted to consider as many applications as I can.

Mr. Ryman: The Minister has not been in the Department for very long, so he may not be fully briefed. Does he not appreciate that the origin of the trouble is that in 1979 the then Conservative Secretary of State for Trade abolished the special development area status of Blyth Valley, which includes Blyth and Cramlington, so wrongly earmarking regional aid? Consequently, unemployment in Blyth Valley has risen astronomically as a direct result of the asinine regional policy of the Conservative Government.

Mr. Morrison: I am well aware that the hon. Gentleman puts forward the case of his constituents assiduously. I know Cramlington, Blyth and Blyth Valley.

Unless I am gravely mistaken—and the hon. Gentleman will correct me immediately if I am—he will be aware that his part of the country gets regional aid to the greatest extent that is still possible.

Mr. Neil Hamilton: Is my hon. Friend aware that in the recent review of regional policy his constituency was included in the map for selective assistance and mine was excluded——

Mr. Speaker: Order. Is the hon. Gentleman's constituency in the north?

Mr. Hamilton: Yes. Can my hon. Friend tell me what advantage might accrue from increasing unemployment in my constituency so as to reduce it in his own?

Mr. Morrison: I am aware of the situation that my hon. Friend mentions because he and I have constituencies at either end of Cheshire. As he will be aware, the decisions were taken quite a substantial time before I became Minister of State.

Mr. O'Neill: Does the Minister agree that the year to year figures for regional aid prove that the real value of regional aid has not just been cut in the northern region since 1979 but has been halved, as it has in every other depressed region? When will the Minister of State bring to the House the review proposals on regional aid that were promised by the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry? When will the Government start increasing regional aid instead of continuing over the next three years their policy of making cuts?

Mr. Morrison: As I have said to other hon. Members, regional aid policy is now directed specifically towards job creation. As to when the review will be brought to the House, the answer is that it will be conducted during the year. The policy has been in existence for only 12 months. I cannot tell the hon. Member precisely when the review results will be ready. I hope that it will be towards the end of the year, but I cannot be held to that at this stage.

Mr. Wrigglesworth: As the figure given by the Minister earlier contains a concealed dramatic decline in support for the northern region during the Government's term of office at a time when there has been an equally dramatic increase in unemployment, and as the number of grants depends upon the number of applications, can the Minister tell us what his Department proposes to do to increase the number of applications from the northern region and to increase the number of new businesses created there?

Mr. Morrison: The hon. Gentleman will be aware that my right hon. and learned Friend the Secretary of State has made a particular issue of regional aid. He has made it abundantly clear to all and sundry that he is keen that there should be as many applications as possible. That is the message that has gone out to all regional offices, including the northern region.

Books (Piracy)

10. Mr. Baldry asked the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry what steps Her Majesty's Government are taking to curtail overseas piracy of books published in Britain; and if he will make a statement.

The Parliamentary Under-Secretary of State for Trade and Industry (Mr. Michael Howard): The Government take every opportunity they can to press upon countries where piracy of British books is permitted to flourish the need for comprehensive and enforceable copyright law. We are in contact with several such countries on this issue at the present time and the European Community is in the process of detailed consideration of the link between intellectual property and trade policy as part of the Community's preparation for a new GATT round.

Mr. Baldry: I thank my hon. and learned Friend for his reply. The Governments of South Korea and Signapore are at present actively considering fresh copyright legislation. What steps are the Government taking to ensure that such legislation adequately protects the interests of British publishers?

Mr. Howard: We have recently written to the Government of Singapore suggesting some modifications to the first draft of the new copyright law that authorities have produced in that country. We are monitoring developments in South Korea and we shall make representations if it seems that that will be useful.

Semi-finished Steel Products

11. Mr. Cash asked the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry what are the prospects for exports of semi-finished steel products; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Peter Morrison: United Kingdom steel producers export semi-finished products to many countries, and prospects in most of them remain broadly unchanged. However, I am pleased to say that exports to the United States should increase substantially under the British Steel Corporation's contract with the Tuscaloosa Steel Corporation of Alabama.

Mr. Cash: Does my hon. Friend accept that, arising out of the minutes that have just been placed in the Library of a meeting with Sir Raymond Lygo, it is a matter of first importance, as my right and learned Friend the Secretary of State is reported as having said, to ensure that in relations with the United States, especially when dealing with semi-finished steel products, we avoid anti-British protection sentiments in the United States of America?

Mr. Morrison: As I said in reply to an earlier question, when I think my hon. Friend was in his place, the negotiations on the deal with the United States Government over the Tuscaloosa Steel Corporation were extremely difficult. As my hon. Friend is aware, there is a protectionist wave that is evident throughout the United States. All such negotiations have to be handled carefully. Anti-American sentiments can endanger them.

Johnson Matthey Bankers

12. Mr. Dalyell asked the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry when the most recent annual return and accounts of Johnson Matthey Bankers Limited were received at Companies House.

Mr. Howard: Accounts for the period ending 30 June 1985 were delivered to the registrar on 20 December 1985, and an annual return for 1985 was delivered on 31 December 1985.

Mr. Dalyell: Following the experience of the Johnson Matthey affair, what have Trade Ministers learnt about the operational efficiency of the supervisory authority?

Mr. Howard: My right hon. Friend the Chancellor has announced a review of banking supervision, which it is hoped will remedy the deficiencies that were revealed by the events at Johnson Matthey.

Mr. Skinner: Is the Minister happy about the developments that are taking place in the Johnson Matthey business that relate to the accounts? What steps are the Government taking to ensure that the accounts are in a much healthier state, by dealing with people such as Mr. Sipra, who is in India and who owes Johnson Matthey about £70 million? Will he be brought back to this country so that he can repay some of that money? What steps are the Government taking? If they took steps to bring Mr. Sipra and others back to Britain, they might recover some of the money.

Mr. Howard: The House will be aware that the Johnson Matthey matters are under investigation by the police. The fraud investigation group has been established. As for compliance with the law on the submission of accounts, there has been a substantial improvement over the position in recent years.

Lloyd's (Regulation)

14. Mr. Fatchett asked the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry if he will make a statement on the regulation of Lloyd's.

Mr. Brittan: My hon. and learned Friend, the Parliamentary Under-Secretary of State with responsibility for corporate and consumer affairs, and I dealt with this matter yesterday during the debate on the Second Reading of the Financial Services Bill. I have nothing to add now.

Mr. Fatchett: In the context of the inquiry that the Secretary of State established last week, will he assure the House that the inquiry will be completed before the Financial Services Bill completes its passage through the House? If any recommendations are made by those who carry out the inquiry, will the Committee that considers the Financial Services Bill, or the House, have sufficient time to act upon them and to implement them if necessary?

Mr. Brittan: I cannot give that assurance. That is a matter for Sir Patrick Neill. He has suggested that he would hope to complete the inquiry in the summer. My hon. and learned Friend has said clearly that we do not think that it is at all likely that the Financial Services Bill would be a proper vehicle for statutory intervention, even if Sir Patrick came to the conclusion that further statutory intervention would be appropriate.

Mr. Gould: As the Minister responsible for the Financial Services Bill and for the decision whether Lloyd's should be included within it — the Under-Secretary of State for Trade and Industry, the hon. and learned Member for Folkestone and Hythe (Mr. Howard) — is involved in a clear conflict of interest in this respect, may I ask whether the Secretary of State's attention has been drawn to the Churchill-Butler statement on these matters—a statement of principle that has been endorsed by a long line of Prime Ministers — which reads as follows:

"It is a principle of public life that Ministers must"—

Mr. Speaker: Order. The hon. Member must paraphrase, not quote.

Mr. Gould: Very well, I will paraphrase the statement of principle, to the effect that where there is a conflict between a Minister's private interests and public responsibilities he must divest himself of those private interests. Given that the Parliamentary Under-Secretary is able to divest himself of his membership of Lloyd's, as I am advised, will the Secretary of State ensure that he either does that or passes the responsibility for the Bill to another Minister?

Mr. Brittan: We have looked into this matter and explained it, and I am perfectly satisfied that my hon. and learned Friend is well able to discharge his responsibilities with complete propriety.

Ravenscraig Steelworks

15. Mr. Wallace asked the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry what representations he has received concerning Ravenscraig steelworks; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Peter Morrison: My right hon. and learned Friend and I have received a number of written and oral representations about Ravenscraig steelworks in the context of BSC's decision to close the Gartcosh works. Earlier today I replied on behalf of the Government, to the recommendations of the Select Committee on Scottish Affairs relating to Gartcosh. In that reply I stated that, having examined closely the recommendations and evidence, I remained of the opinion that the Government should not interfere with BSC's decision to close Gartcosh.

Mr. Wallace: Will the Minister accept, as the overwhelming majority of Scottish opinion accepts, that the future of Ravenscraig is inextricably bound up with that of Gartcosh, and that any long-term guarantee to Ravenscraig would be meaningful and worthwhile only if it were extended to the Gartcosh plant? Notwithstanding the reply that he gave to the Select Committee on Scottish Affairs this morning, may I ask him to look at the figures now produced by the Scottish Trades Union Congress on recent trends and figures for markets for the steel produced there and to reconsider his decision, which is very damaging to Scotland and its industry, in the light of this new evidence?

Mr. Morrison: I can, of course, appreciate what the hon. Gentleman says. There is very significant feeling in Scotland about Gartcosh and Ravenscraig. That is why we looked carefully indeed at all the evidence put to us. Having done so, we came to the conclusion that the decision of the British Steel Corporation on its future strategy, which was endorsed by the Government in August, should not be undermined.

Mr. Ewing: How can the Minister honestly say that he has considered all the evidence and has come to the conclusion that he has reached when the evidence is all against his determination to bring about the closure of Gartcosh? How can the Minister condone a situation where the Government are prepared to spend nearly £10 million a year to keep Scottish workers unemployed when they could be investing that kind of money in the steel industry, not only of Scotland, but of the whole of the United Kingdom?

Mr. Morrison: It is not for me to publish my reply to the Select Committee in which I gave the reasons for the Government's decision not to intervene in this particular matter, although I am sure that the hon. Member will understand them when he sees it. I perfectly understand that there is very strong feeling in Scotland about Gartcosh, but the hon. Member will be aware that there is overcapacity in the kinds of products made by Gartcosh. He will also be aware of the argument which says that Gartcosh and Ravenscraig are not inextricably connected.

Mr. Hickmet: Does my hon. Friend agree that, in its attempts to survive, the British Steel Corporation, for the past three or four years, has had to take very difficult decisions involving the redundancy of many thousands of men? Now, when the corporation is profitable, excess capacity is being removed and, for the first time for many years, the corporation finds itself the most competitive steel producer in Europe, is it fair that the steel workers in Scotland should be exempted from some of the very difficult decisions that have had to be taken throughout the country, including in my own constituency, where 11,000 men have lost their jobs in two years?

Mr. Morrison: I certainly agree that enormous progress has been made by BSC management and the trade unions within the corporation to make it into the most efficient steel corporation in Europe. I differ a little from my hon. Friend. I fully appreciated the fact that, in the short term at least, closure brings a bleak future for the 800 or so employees at Gartcosh and their families. It was in that context that I took my decision. I do not welcome taking such decisions.

Mr. Strang: Is the hon. Gentleman aware that there is a lobby in the House of Commons today, representative of all walks of life in Scotland, to meet representatives from all parties in the House? Is he further aware that that lobby is clearly saying that the future of Gartcosh is crucial to the future of Ravenscraig, and that the future of Ravenscraig is vital to Scotland's future as an industrial nation? Will the hon. Gentleman recognise that Gartcosh is Scotland's industrial El Alamein and that it must stay open, even if that means driving every Tory out of Scotland?

Mr. Morrison: Of course I realise that there is a lobby in the House today. Of course I realise also that there has been a consistent campaign. I am aware also that several representatives of the work force walked the whole way from Gartcosh to London. The hon. Gentleman should be aware that the very same representatives have had an opportunity to see me, which they requested, since the middle of October. That invitation has been extended, further extended and further extended again, and they did not decide to put their case. I wonder why.

Mr. John Smith: Did the hon. Gentleman advise the Prime Minister to see the delegation that had walked all the way from Gartcosh? Why did she snub those representatives by refusing even to meet them when the request was put? Is the hon. Gentleman aware that there have been few issues in recent times on which majority opinion has been rallied more successfully than in the campaign to save Gartcosh? Why do the Government intervene in the Ravenscraig matter on an explicit political basis and claim credit for it, yet seem totally unable to intervene in the Gartcosh matter?

Mr. Morrison: I made it quite clear to my right hon. Friend the Prime Minister that my door was open to see the representatives of the work force, as it had been for more than three months. It seemed unusual, to put it mildly, that they did not take advantage of that. My door remained open. The right hon. and learned Gentleman is well aware of the fundamental difference between Gartcosh and Ravenscraig—[Interruption]—in terms of BSC's strategy.

Mr. Speaker: Order. I fully understand and appreciate that there is an important debate to follow Question Time, but Question Time is important to those hon. Members with questions on the Order Paper.

European Community

16. Mr. Bright asked the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry what further progress has been made in opening up the internal market of the European Community.

The Minister for Information Technology (Mr. Geoffrey Pattie): During the last six months the Council has agreed a number of measures which should facilitate the free movement of goods and services within the Community. The Internal Market Council of 12 December endorsed a detailed programme of action for the Netherlands and United Kingdom Presidencies with the aim of securing the adoption of a large number of further measures in 1986. A copy of this programme is in the Library of the House.

Mr. Bright: In what respects does my hon. Friend think that the most progress will be made to the benefit of the United Kingdom, especially with respect to small businesses, which still find that some of the obstacles put in their way when exporting to Europe are difficult to overcome?

Mr. Pattie: The Council has adopted a directive liberalising the marketing of unit trusts, co-ordinating national customs, computer developments and reducing clearance times at internal frontiers. My right hon. Friend the Prime Minister has taken an initiative that will ensure that all new proposals emanating from the Commission will be scrutinised with respect to the burdens that they will place on small businesses.

Mr. Nellist: Does the opening of the internal market of the European Community include consortiums for the production of helicopters? If so, will the hon. Gentleman advise workers at Westland not to accept job guarantees from the leaders of such a consortium, especially as Lord Weinstock, the leader of GEC, axed 1,000 jobs in Coventry, South-East just before Christmas? Will the hon. Gentleman advise them that they cannot believe the truth of such a spokesman for a European consortium?

Mr. Pattie: The hon. Gentleman should be aware that defence procurement measures, which are largely what are involved in the Westland case, do not come within the purview of the Commission.

Sir Brandon Rhys Williams: Does the Department recognise that for Londoners and the whole British economy the most important aspect of this process is the achievement of a fully integrated European market for capital over the whole range of financial services, with London playing its proper pre-eminent part?

Mr. Pattie: Yes.

W. G. Allen (Tipton) Ltd.

18. Mr. John Mark Taylor asked the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry what representations he has received about the conduct of the liquidator of W. G. Allen (Tipton) Ltd.

Mr. Howard: I understand that my hon. Friend is referring to W. G. Allen & Sons (Tipton) plc, which is in receivership, not in liquidation. My hon. Friend has drawn my attention in the last few days to a number of points. I am considering them to see whether exercise of my Department's investigative powers is warranted.

Mr. Taylor: In thanking my hon. and learned Friend for that reply and noting that he is to look into the matter, may I ask him to pay due attention to shareholder concern about inaccuracies in letters from the stock exchange, and the fact that a statement of affairs is still awaited? This company failed within three months of having a clean auditor's report. There seems to be some conflict of interest. Will my hon. and learned Friend bear those things in mind?

Mr. Howard: I shall take all those matters into account.

China

19. Mr. William Powell asked the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry if he will make a statement on trading prospects with China.

Mr. Channon: There are good prospects for steady growth in our trade with China, which has substantially increased in the last two years.

Mr. Powell: Will my right hon. Friend confirm that China will be able to benefit from the substantial increases in the soft loan facilities which the Secretary of State should be able to announce? When does he expect that such loans will become available for China?

Mr. Channon: We have already told the Chinese Government that in principle we are prepared to offer soft loans for project business. We had preliminary talks with them, and it will not be long before some of them come to fruition.

Services (Trade Liberalisation)

20. Mr. Hanley asked the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry what progress is being make in his talks on liberalising international trade in services.

Mr. Channon: The GATT contracting parties agreed at their meeting in November to set up the preparatory process for a new round in which the British Government think it essential that all relevant topics, including trade in services, should be included. Meanwhile, the United Kingdom continues to press for completion of the Community's internal market in services as in goods.

Mr. Hanley: I had always understood that one of the main objectives of the European Community was freedom of trade by the removal of restrictive trade practices. Will my right hon. Friend give me some idea of when the current dispute over the German insurance market might be resolved and the possible prospects for the British insurance market when that has occurred?

Mr. Channon: It will, of course, depend upon the decision of the court. I hope that the court decision in the German case will be made in the not too distant future, and that it will be in favour of the position that we have adopted. Before long that would lead to substantial progress being made in this area.

South Africa

21. Mr. Flannery asked the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry what volume of trade in cash terms was conducted with South Africa in 1983, 1984 and 1985, respectively (a) in imports and (b) in exports.

Mr. Channon: The value of United Kingdom imports from South Africa were £765 million in 1983, £726 million in 1984 and £914 million in the first 11 months of 1985. The corresponding figures for exports were £1,111 million £1,204 million and £933 million respectively.

Mr. Flannery: Is that not a comment on the political efforts of this Government at a time when apartheid in South Africa is grinding the whole of southern Africa into confusion? People are being shot down daily — [Interruption.]—murdered all over the place, because they are asking for some kind of equality. Why do we not take a leaf out of the American book and exert some pressure on that Government and make it clear to them that we are not willing to flourish while people are held in such miserable subjection in that country?

Mr. Channon: I disagree with the hon. Gentleman's analysis of events. No one dislikes apartheid more than do my hon. Friends and myself. One of the major forces for reform in South Africa has been the activities of industry, and in particular British industry, in improving conditions for black workers in South Africa and protecting jobs both here and there over the past few years.

Mr. Hill: Does my right hon. Friend agree that more publicity should be given to the number of jobs that rely on South African trade—in particular, the work that we do in the port of Southampton—and to the fact that many workers take the realistic view that South African trade provides their livelihood? Is it not the case that any way in which we can expand trade with South Africa would be good for this country's work force?

Mr. Channon: My hon. Friend is right to point that out. There are probably hundreds of thousands of jobs in this country that depend upon trade with South Africa, and many thousands of jobs — including many among the black workers—in South Africa.

Mr. Nellist rose——

Mr. Madden rose——

Mr. Speaker: Order. I shall take points of order arising directly out of questions.

Mr. Madden: On a point of order, Mr. Speaker.

Mr. Speaker: Arising directly out of questions?

Mr. Madden: Indeed, Mr. Speaker. I ask you to reflect on your ruling about question 1 today. It involved the CBI and the regulation of financial services. You will recollect that you asked my hon. Friend the Member for Dagenham (Mr. Gould) and other hon. Members who wanted to ask questions about Lloyd's to desist. If your ruling stands, it would seem that in future you are prepared to accept questions about Lloyd's only if the question refers to Lloyd's, such as question 14. As it is an important matter, I ask whether you would reflect on the matter and give the House your advice.

Mr. Speaker: Order. I can say to the hon. Member straight away that I reflected when the question was first put. I knew perfectly well that question 14 on the Order Paper was the question on which these matters should properly be raised.

Mr. Nellist: On a point of order arising out of Questio Time, Mr. Speaker. Would you consider later toda expressing your sympathy, on behalf of the Opposition with the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry for t fact that, following his loss of his memory yesterday, h has lost his voice this afternoon? He answered only tw questions.

Mr. Speaker: Order. I have lost my voice as well.

Solicitor-General (Letter)

3.32 pm

Mr. Tam Dalyell (Linlithgow): On a point of order, Mr. Speaker. May I ask your help with a matter, about which I gave you notice this morning, relating to documents for the coming debate? It may be within the recollection of the House that on 6 January the Law Officers wrote a letter to the right hon. Member for Henley (Mr. Heseltine). It was partly and selectively leaked. For the purposes of greater accuracy, I went to the Library this morning to ask for the complete letter so that one could look at it in full and not selectively. The Library, with its normal efficiency and courtesy, found that it did not have the letter. The Library then rang the Law Officers' Department, which said that higher authority would have to be consulted before it could give me the letter. When higher authority was consulted, lo and behold, the letter was not forthcoming. The House does not have the full text of that letter. It is extremely unsatisfactory to make decisions or speeches on the basis of selectively leaked letters. I wonder whether there is any way in which you can manage to get before the House the full text of the letter written by the Law Officers and sent to the former Secretary of State for Defence.

Mr. Speaker: Order. I cannot help the hon. Member. Whether the Government choose to put a letter before the House is entirely a matter for them. I believe that the Leader of the House wishes to say something.

The Lord Privy Seal and Leader of the House of Commons (Mr. John Biffen): So that we may keep these matters in perspective, may I say that in no sense do I represent higher authority. The House will appreciate that there are conventions relating to advice from the Law Officers. I can inform the House that the Solicitor-General has authorised publication of his letter of 6 January to the then Secretary of State for Defence, and arrangements are being made for it to be made available to the House later this afternoon.

Cruelty to Animals (Amendment)

3.34 pm

Mr. Harry Cohen (Leyton): I beg to move,

That leave be given to bring in a Bill to prohibit all tests of cosmetics, tobacco and alcohol and similar experiments on animals; to prohibit the draize eye irritancy test and the LD50 poisoning test; to prohibit behavioural and psychological experiments on animals; to prevent use of animals in warfare trials or experiments; to abolish the practices of hare coursing, and fox and stag hunting; to prohibit the use of domestic animals in animal experiments; to increase the penalties for convictions of causing, procuring or assisting at the fighting or baiting of dogs, cats or other domestic animals; to ban the import and sale of bull terriers and the advertising of fighting dogs for sale, including the advertising of qualities related to fighting; to regulate laboratories in which animals are bred; to reconstitute the Advisory Committee on Animal Experiments; and to promote alternatives to animal experiments.

I stress that there is no connection between this matter and the next item of House of Commons business. [Interruption.]

Mr. Speaker: Order. The hon. Member has every right to be heard.

Mr. Cohen: I am pleased, Mr. Speaker, that this large gathering today is concerned with animal rights. The British enjoy a reputation as animal lovers. That reputation, I fear, exists more in the hearts and minds of decent British people than in the practices that are embodied in the law of the land.

The shameful reality is that 110 years have passed without improvements to the Cruelty to Animals Act 1876. My Bill seeks to bring the law closer to public perceptions of our humanitarian protection towards animals, and to distance future legislation as far as possible from the barbaric brutality allowed at present. In so doing, my proposals run counter to the Conservative Government's legislative intentions on this matter, which are to afford less protection to animals while employing a deft legislative "newspeak" to hoodwink and placate public opinion.

The Government are too squeamish to use the word "experiment" and have substituted the word "procedure" to ensure that public sensitivities are not offended while appalling cruelty to animals will actually be allowed to increase. This is a betrayal of the public's heartfelt wish to provide proper rights for animals, to see an end to barbaric blood sports and to end unnecessary animal experiments.

My Bill puts a stop to the obscenity of killing animals in the name of sport by abolishing the practices of hare coursing, fox and stag hunting. This is a Labour party policy which I should like to see enacted immediately. To their shame, the Conservative Government have twice overruled the Northern Ireland Assembly's unanimous votes to outlaw hare coursing. Perhaps this tendency to override public and parliamentary opinion will diminish somewhat when the Government are reminded that a recent poll of Conservative voters showed a majority opposed to all forms of hunting. The measure that I propose not only puts a stop to the rights of sadists to enjoy the fun of the kill while devastating our countryside but also sorts out their less well heeled blood brothers who support dog fighting. In line with RSPCA policy, my Bill would substantially increase penalties for convictions for causing, procuring, assisting or aiding and abetting at the fighting or baiting of dogs, cats and other domestic animals. It would also ban the import and sale of pit bull terriers and the advertising of fighting dogs for sale, including qualities related to fighting.

There should be stiff prison sentences for those indulging in dog fighting. The traffic in domestic animals for animal experiments must be halted. This shady enterprise is such big business in residential areas that pet shop owners in my constituency display notices warning animal owners to keep their pets under constant surveillance. What are we to make of the standing of scientific establishments which apparently fail to notice that their stock of animals for experiments consists of every breed under the sun, obviously tamed for domestic life and pining for human contact? Such establishments should have their licences withdrawn instantaneously and permanently. My Bill ensures that laboratories may obtain animals of specified breeds only from licensed breeders who can produce proper evidence of the legitimate origin of these animals. In addition, breeding establishments will be subject to regular and spot inspection and the export of animals will be banned.

The obscenity of current animal experimentation in which over 67,000 animals are killed every week is tackled in my Bill. My objective is to see animal experiments phased out within a decade. However, the overwhelming majority of tests could be abolished immediately, starting with a ban on all animal tests for cosmetics, tobacco and alcohol. The Bill would also immediately end the Draize eye test where irritants are administered without pain relief until the animal's eye bursts. The LD50 test, whereby animals are painfully poisoned until 50 per cent. of them die, would also go. In line with the Labour parliamentary campaign group for animal rights, there would be a prohibition on the use of animals in warfare trials in which they are deliberately shot at, irradiated and subjected to germ and chemical warfare. Behavioural and psychological tests on animals in which they are deliberately driven to madness for so-called "insights" into human psychosis will also cease.

At present, the Government employ 15 inspectors to check on the 21,000 vivisectionists who cut up three million animals each year. That ludicrous situation will be transformed under my Bill as a result of greater powers for the Home Office advisory committee. At present the committee is packed with either licensed experimenters or pro-vivisectionists, including Dr. Coid, the doctor responsible for designing the primate cages which featured so infamously in the recent prosecution of the Royal College of Surgeons. It is essential that the independence of the committee should be firmly established, with membership consisting of persons with a knowledge of the subject but no vested interest whatsoever by way of monetary gain or job dependency. The primary function of the committee will be the responsibility for securing a continuing and sizeable decrease annually in animal usage in laboratories.

The new independent composition of the advisory committee will also free its decision-making processes from the undue influences of the drug companies. As the Sunday People so accurately observed:

"The name of the game is profit and to hell with animal suffering".

Research into disease prevention has been passed up because drug companies prefer animal experiments for their latest wonder cures. Thus, animals suffer in their millions as drug companies race to develop so-called "new" products, most of which are simple recombinations of other brands, an increasing number dangerous to humans — such as Thalidomide, Eraldin and Opren. Tackling causes and the prevention of illness are not as profitable as "cures", even if the latter means countless unnecessary human and animal deaths in the process. Yet, the Research Defence Committee, a pro-vivisection group funded by the drug and cosmetic multinationals, confidently assesses the Conservative Government's new legislation with the comment:

"I cannot think of a single experiment allowed now that will not be allowed in future."

Medical research which is so bound up with the fortunes of drug companies lacks any incentive to develop alternative research. The Conservative Government, as the political voice of big business, ensure that the purse strings of state research remain controlled by the vivisectionists. They have allocated a derisory £200,000 over three years for the consideration of alternatives to animal experiments. In this scenario, human life is indeed held cheap, while animal protection counts for nothing. In conclusion, my Bill forces the parliamentary, scientific and commercial establishment to face up to the failure of their endless experiments on animals, to take account of the horrendous issue of assessing the pain and suffering endured by animals, while at the same time insisting upon medical research to follow a more civilised and effective path by using non-animal alternatives. My proposals, not the Government's, are more in tune with what the public want.

This Bill, not the Government's, recognises and responds with genuine measures to meet the growing public disquiet about animal experimentation and barbaric sports. My Bill is a Socialist measure aimed to uphold the value of human life, to free sport from a sordid blood lust and provide protection and rights for animals. It is an essential element towards the achievement of a safe and healthy environment for all living creatures in a civilised society. As Labour's programme says:

"We are partners on this planet with animals, not their masters."

Question put and agreed to.

Bill ordered to be brought in by Mr. Harry Cohen, Mr. Tony Banks, Mr. Jeremy Corbyn, Mr. Brian Sedgemore, Mr. Roland Boyes, Ms. Jo Richardson, Mr. Doug Hoyle, Mr. Allan Rogers, Mr. James Lamond, Miss Joan Maynard, Mr. Martin Flannery and Mr. Robert N. Wareing.

CRUELTY TO ANIMALS (AMENDMENT)

Mr. Harry Cohen accordingly presented a Bill to prohibit all tests of cosmetics, tobacco and alcohol and similar experiments on animals; to prohibit the draize eye irritancy test and the LD50 poisoning test; to prohibit behavioural and psychological experiments on animals; to prevent use of animals in warfare trials or experiments; to abolish the practices of hare coursing, and fox and stag hunting; to prohibit the use of domestic animals in animal experiments; to increase the penalties for convictions of causing, procuring or assisting at the fighting or baiting of dogs, cats or other domestic animals; to ban the import and sale of bull terriers and the advertising of fighting dogs for sale, including the advertising of qualities related to fighting; to regulate laboratories in which animals are bred; to reconstitute the Advisory Committee on Animal Experiments; and to promote alternatives to animal experiments: And the same was read the First time; and ordered to be read a Second time upon Friday 7 February and to be printed. [Bill 58.]

Opposition Day

[3RD ALLOTTED DAY]

Westland plc

Mr. Speaker: Before we embark upon this important debate I must announce to the House that I have selected the amendment in the name of the Prime Minister.

3.45 pm

Mr. Neil Kinnock (Islwyn): I beg to move,

That this House, noting the serious allegations made in public by the former Secretary of State for Defence, the Right honourable Member for Henley, about the conduct of the Government in respect of Westland plc, and aware of the major implications for defence procurement, manufacturing industry, technology and employment, calls on Her Majesty's Government to make arrangements to set up a Committee of the House to consider the issues raised by the matter, ensuring that such a Committee would be provided with all the relevant documents and letters, many of which have been publicly referred to but not yet published, in order to establish for the nation a truthful record of the events relating to the present and future position of Westland plc.

This debate is about helicopter manufacture and the industries related to it. It is about technology and certainly about employment. It is a debate about defence procurement policies and about European co-operation. Indeed, it has now apparently become an issue which affects the stability of interest rates.

The debate on Westland plc is about all those things, but most of all it is about something even more elementary, even more basic in our political life. For I consider that the debate most of all is about the truth; that is why, despite her reluctance to come to the House to make a statement, it was essential that we secured the presence of the Prime Minister to speak in the debate today. It is not just because of the complete collision of testimony about Government conduct in relation to the affairs of Westland plc, nor indeed because the right hon. Lady has ultimate responsibility for all the activities of Government; it is mainly because of the right hon. Lady's particular system of rule and her particular involvement in the issue of Westland plc.

That the Prime Minister is domineering is not a matter of contention or doubt. The whole country knows that. Indeed, there is a growing entertainment industry based entirely upon that fact. What is less obvious and much more serious is that that domineering attitude in a system of Cabinet government in a democratic country has enormous effects on the whole course and style of the way in which our country is governed.

In such a system of Cabinet government it is simply not possible to dominate absolutely and continually on the merits of argument because there are always other good arguments in fair contention. Nor is it possible to dominate always by patronage or even by petulance. To dominate absolutely it is necessary for the domineering to employ other techniques, and plainly they include tactics which go well beyond the bounds of clever politics and become systematic connivance against Cabinet colleagues for the purpose of achieving a particular end.

When those people who will not concede to domination or bullying or will not back down, really make up their minds they must be undermined, isolated or bypassed. The right hon. Lady has had some success with the system of rule by overrule because she has taken the precaution, generally speaking, of surrounding herself with some jelloid Ministers. But sooner or later someone was bound to resist, even to the point of resignation, and that day arrived last Thursday.

In the course of that resignation the right hon. Member for Henley (Mr. Heseltine) made some serious charges about the conduct and course of the Government. His charges relate mainly to the events on 4 and 18 October; 4, 5, and 9 December; 11 and 12 December; 30 and 31 December; 6 January, when the Solicitor-General entered the fray; and the 8 January meeting between the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry and Sir Raymond Lygo, chief executive of British Aerospace.

Those charges made by the right hon. Gentleman must be answered in detail by the Prime Minister today. Some of them should be easy to deal with if they are false or at all misleading. For instance, the right hon. Lady can determine the veracity of the right hon. Gentleman about the minutes of meetings on 4 and 18 October, to which she has continually referred, by publishing those minutes, including all the details of the meetings that took place and the consideration that took place. It would not be a great leap out of security or secrecy for her to do so.

Before Christmas, sections of the minutes of the 4 October meeting were freely discussed and quoted in the press. Last Monday night, on "Panorama", the minutes of the 18 October meeting were quoted in part. Indeed, The Times on 14 January reported that the Government

"took the unprecedented step of quoting from the minutes of two ad hoc meetings of ministers held on December 4 and 5 in an attempt to undermine Mr. Heseltine's resignation statement."

Therefore, it cannot be too much to ask that the same treatment is given to the minutes of other ad hoc meetings in October.

In his resignation statement, the right hon. Member for Henley alleged that, after his efforts in November—undertaken at least with the acquiesence of the Government—to secure a recommendation from the European national armament directors to extend the 1978 declaration on helicopter procurement, he encountered unexpected and strong opposition to his views at an ad hoc ministerial meeting on 4 December, and then at another on 5 December. He encountered further strong resistance at the Economic Committee meeting on 9 December, so he tells us, and that opposition came not from the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry but from the Prime Minister. It appears that that opposition was based on the right hon. Lady's efforts to set aside the recommendation of the national armaments directors that the right hon. Gentleman had painstakingly accumulated in the days at the end of November.

I must ask the Prime Minister why she took that course at those meetings and why she has pursued that course so avidly. I must ask her the question that The Times put yesterday, about

"why, and in what circumstances, the decision of the national armaments directors in favour of European helicopter procurement was set aside."

"Was it merely not endorsed, as Downing Street would have us believe, or deliberately shelved, as Mr. Heseltine argues? If it was shelved why was it shelved? Mrs. Thatcher has to give the House the clearest possible answer on this point. It is naive to think that there is something as simple as non-intervention in matters of this kind, particularly where the Government is so important a customer of the company concerned. But it is even-handedness that is the Government's claim in the Westland affair. Mrs. Thatcher needs to explain exactly how her administration's practice matched its rhetoric."

There are three crucial questions. First, why was the policy adopted? Was it through the persuasiveness of Sir John Cuckney, with all the great weight of his experience and expertise? Was it, as has been alleged, to do with the strategic defence initiative, or with an anti-European sentiment or for some other reason? We need to know that, and this House and the country deserve to know that.

Secondly, how was the policy adopted without the benefit of collective decision by the Cabinet, which plainly was the case?

Thirdly, how does practice in the privacy of Government match the public declarations to this House and to the country about the Government's policy? The right hon. Member for Henley says that there is no match; he says that there is no connection between private machinations and public declarations. Someone, he plainly implies, has been telling the truth; someone has not been telling the truth.

The right hon. Gentleman says that there was an even-handed policy for public display and a private policy of favouritism for actual use. That is a very grave allegation, but like so many others it could be easily disproved if it were false or even inaccurate. It would be supreme folly for the right hon. Gentleman to make such charges if they could not be substantiated. So I ask the Prime Minister whether the circumstances of 4 and 18 October and of 4, 5 and 9 December were as the right hon. Gentleman has alleged. She can tell us. She can prove or disprove what he said and she must do one or the other.

Much the same applies to the E Committee meeting of 9 December. There are two versions of events. From the right hon. Member for Henley we hear that it was an inconclusive meeting that did not resolve policy and which decided that there should be a further meeting on 13 December. From the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry we hear, in answer to my colleagues, my hon. Friends the Members for Monklands, West (Mr. Clarke) and for Birmingham, Perry Barr (Mr. Rooker), that the 9 December meeting was a conclusive meeting which resolved policy and set a deadline of 13 December for the European submission.

These are the two versions. They are in stark conflict and collision, one with another. All that we have to rely on to make up our minds at this stage is the circumstantial evidence as to which version is correct. The circumstantial evidence is that, some time before the Cabinet meeting of 12 December—probably on 11 December—the relevant Departments were notified by the Cabinet Office that the meeting on Friday was cancelled. One can cancel a meeting only if it has been proposed.

Another meeting was fixed for 13 December. We want to know the truth about that, because that is a fulcrum date. This is a crucial set of circumstances. There is essential testimony in public by both right hon. Gentlemen, and the House must decide, because by that decision we shall be deciding what course the Government really have been undertaking and whether there was one course for private use and another for public consumption.

The Prime Minister can prove or disprove these sets of circumstances and she must do one or the other. We have the word of two right hon. Members. This is an honourable House which accepts honourable words. What are we to do when there is such an exact conflict in the description of the circumstances, the status and even the existence of the meeting—the alleged meeting—of 13 December?

The choice is invidious for us. The conclusions can be reached only by the calling of witnesses. The witnesses are not all hon. Members elected to the House. Fortunately, however, the House has, over the years and in its wisdom, developed a procedure which permits witnesses to give evidence. That is why we consider that it is sensible for all the parties concerned—in the Government, in the public service and elsewhere—who have been witnesses to the various events to appear before a Committee of the House so that a proper assessment can be make and so that they can develop and demonstrate their version and the veracity of their version of events.

Mr. Eric Forth (Mid-Worcestershire): I am grateful to the right hon. Gentleman. He has been seeking to lecture the House on the workings of Cabinet government. Can the right hon. Gentleman explain the basis of his insight into the workings of Cabinet government? Can he tell us to whom among his colleagues he has spoken about the workings of Cabinet government or what his other sources of information or authority are?

Mr. Kinnock: The issue at stake is much more basic. I can tell the difference between a truth and an untruth. I know a stink when I smell one.

The Committee that we seek, which could be convened and which would be of such utility to all involved, would not just consider the veracity of two right hon. Members. The Committee would inevitably consider why a policy change was favoured and why that policy was so rigorously followed by the Prime Minister from 3 December—so enthusiastically as to inspire the grave allegations that she was ill-tempered and, more seriously, that a meeting was cancelled. There were even implications that a Cabinet minute did not carry an account that had been insisted upon by a member of that Cabinet.

Following the E Committee meeting of 9 December, events marched on. On 13 December, without benefit of further Government consideration of the options, the Westland board met and dismissed the European consortium proposals. In the wake of that, on 16 December, the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry was able to provide the House with what he must have considered to be a fait accompli that would quieten the issue. He was unsuccessful and the conflict continued. The rival camps exchanged propaganda barrages, to such an extent that, when the Cabinet met on 19 December, we are told that it was decided, presumably collectively, that the lobbying had to stop. However, it did not stop and the contest continued. The allegation is that, far from allowing collective decision-taking to work through the Cabinet and through departmental responsibility, the Prime Minister became even more deeply involved. It is said that she did not direct Sir John Cuckney's letter of 30 December to the appropriate defence procurement department, but to the Department of Trade and Industry, and that she accompanied that directed missile—[Interruption.] I should have said missive, but missile will do. She accompanied it with guidance that the then Secretary of State for Defence considered to be materially misleading.

The Prime Minister then set the Law Officers on the right hon. Member for Henley when he decided to communicate directly with Lloyds merchant bank. someone made sure that the Solicitor-General's letter became public knowledge by leaking extracts.

The activities following 16 December ranged from the extremely unconventional in Government to the highly disreputable in Government. In the Sunday Telegraph this week Mr. Ian Waller, on behalf of many others, stated:

"This Government has been ruthless in persecuting journalists and civil servants for trivial breaches of the Official Secrets Act, yet Whitehall has been like a sieve in recent weeks—including Heseltine's ministry, which unsuccessfully prosecuted Ponting and had a clerk, Miss Tisdall, jailed. The most flagrant breach of all was the leak of a letter from the Solicitor-General damaging to Heseltine's case. Again it stretches credulity to believe this was an accident and not authorised at a high level."

Mr. Waller asked the question that we all ask:

"Will Mrs. Thatcher act against the culprit—or does she have one rule for top people and another rule for clerks?"

We seek an explanation of why a Government who were so sensitive on Monday of this week about the British Aerospace letter were apparently so insecure on Monday 6 January. Did the leak of the Solicitor-General's letter come about by misfortune—as Oscar Wilde might put it—by carelessness, or as a result of something much more devious than either of those possibilities? The Prime Minister is in a position to tell us the answer, and she must tell us. Was that occurrence inadvertent or was it simply a further episode in the efforts to ensure that the arguments for one option were muted so as to elevate the attractiveness of the other option that faces Westland?

On the matter of muting, we come to last Wednesday's meeting between Sir Raymond Lygo and the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry. On Monday, my right hon. and learned Friend the Member for Monklands, East asked the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry why the Secretary of State had decided to speak to Sir Raymond Lygo at all on 8 December. The Secretary of State for Trade and Industry quaintly replied that since Sir Raymond happened to be in the Department of Industry building,

"it would have been wholly artificial if I did not see Sir Raymond."

What was wholly artificial was the version of events provided by the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry.

We have the private and confidential letter in our possession and the records of the House to demonstrate that point more than adequately. The Secretary of State for Trade and Industry said:

"Let me make it clear that it is untrue to say that in the course of the meeting I made any suggestion that British Aerospace should withdraw from the European consortium or that its participation was contrary to the national interest."—[Official Report, 13 January 1986; Vol. 89, c. 781.]

He said that it was untrue. The Prime Minister's letter to British Aerospace, which was published this morning, backs what she describes as his recollection, shared by others present at the meeting that took place at about 5 o'clock last Thursday evening.

Let us examine Sir Austin Pearce's letter. He states:

"Sir Raymond returned directly to a special Board Meeting of British Aerospace which was in progress and made a full report of his conversation to the Board. He also wrote down all the salient points that had been made to him. His report stated that the following points were specifically covered by the Secretary of State."

For brevity I shall move on to point 6:

"that what we were doing was not in the National Interest

7. That we should withdraw."

[Mr. Kinnock]

Can anyone imagine a plausible reason why Admiral Sir Raymond Lygo should fabricate those details of the conversation?

Sir Paul Bryan (Boothferry): Read No. 4.

Mr. Kinnock: The hon. Gentleman calls for No. 4. The letter is now a matter of public record. I invite the whole country to read all the points in the letter. But that does not move one inch from the fact that the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry said on Monday that it was untrue that he had said during the meeting that British Aerospace was acting against the national interest and that it should withdraw. That point is not negatived, offset, reduced or diluted.

Sir Paul Bryan: Read No. 4.

Mr. Kinnock: Can anyone imagine that a man of Sir Raymond's character — a chief executive of a corporation that sells 80 per cent. of its products to the Government—would leave the Department of Trade and Industry and minutes later, half a mile away in Pall Mall, bear false witness to the assembled board of British Aerospace? Can anyone seriously believe that? The Secretary of State for Trade and Industry said that it was untrue. The implications for Sir Raymond Lygo are obvious, and extremely serious.

There is perhaps only one inaccuracy in the proceedings described by Sir Austin Pearce in his letter and by Sir Raymond Lygo in his report. The views of Sir Raymond Lygo and Sir Austin Pearce acknowlege the fact that they are not men given to exaggeration or over-reaction. The letter that we have all now read probably understates the atmosphere and the nature of the pressure of the Department of Trade and Industry meeting.

The House can hear directly from the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry, but it cannot hear from Sir Raymond Lygo, despite the gravity of the problems that he faces as a consequence of the Secretary of State's statements. The House owes Sir Raymond Lygo the opportunity to present his full testimony and full record to a Committee of the House. Far be it for me to save the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry by calling for his resignation, but I cannot see how he can bring himself to stay in his present position.

Only one question remains in my mind about the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry: is he a culprit, or a victim, in this matter? The Prime Minister sits next to him today, as she did on Monday. Is he her agent, or has he been acting on his own? That is the question which the Prime Minister must answer. She must answer it, clearly and honestly, now.

4.10 pm

Mr. Tam Dalyell (Linlithgow): On a point of order, Mr. Speaker. It is in the recollection of the House that, very courteously, the Leader of the House said that the Law Officer's letter had been made available. I went to the Library where, equally courteously, I was told that the letter is embargoed, "until the Prime Minister has sat down".

Mr. Speaker: That is not a matter for the Chair.

4.11 pm

The Prime Minister (Mrs. Margaret Thatcher): I beg to move, to leave out from "House" to the end of the Question, and to add instead thereof:

"endorses the Government's consistent objective of supporting Westland plc in its efforts to achieve a financial reconstruction, of supporting United Kingdom participation in collaboration with North Atlantic Treaty Organisation allies and of safeguarding the interests of the company, its employees and its shareholders, recognises the efforts of the Government to ensure that the Westland board had more than one option to secure that objective; affirms that it will be for the company to determine its future course of action; and further recognises the competence of departmental Select Committees of the House of Commons to consider the issues raised by these developments.".

I do not think that there is a great deal to answer in what the right hon. Member for Islwyn (Mr. Kinnock) said. He seems to have made certain conclusions long before the debate started. In so far as he asked me questions, I will try to answer them during the course of my comments.

At the outset, I wish to refer to the correspondence between Sir Austin Pearce and me, which has been published today, to which the right hon. Gentleman referred, dealing with the meeting on 8 January between my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry and Sir Raymond Lygo. My right hon. Friend the Secretary of State has given the House his account of that meeting, and the record of the meeting taken by the Department of Trade and Industry has been published today in full—every single word has been published today in full. I fully accept that the record taken by the Department of Trade and Industry is an accurate and fair account of what was said. I very much regret that there is a different recollection in some respects of what was said, but I believe that when the House has had an opportunity to study the record of the meeting right hon. and hon. Members will see that the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry said that he had no view on the merits of the two offers, that it was for the shareholders of Westland to make a decision, and that it was not in the national interest for the present uncertainty to drag on. There are many in the House who will agree with that sentiment.

I have today received a further letter from Sir Austin Pearce, which has also been published. In it he expresses the hope that we shall now be able to concentrate on the important issues concerning the future of Westland. I agree. It seemed to me that the right hon. Member for Islwyn did very little of that.

This afternoon, therefore, I shall first set out the approach taken by the Government towards Westland during its period of difficulty. I shall then deal with the charges——

Mr. John Gorst (Hendon, North): Before my right hon. Friend leaves the Civil Service minute, may I ask whether she believes, considering the important matters that were discussed on that occasion, and the fact that the civil servants' record was dated two days later, that that record is remarkably skimpy and short? Is she certain that it was not a belated and hindsighted record?

The Prime Minister: No. Ministers and civil servants will have occasion deeply to resent what my hon. Friend has said. The record was taken contemporaneously and was dictated two days later. There were several people present who confirmed that the record is accurate. I do not find it sparse. It is a full account of what happened, and is very much fuller than the alternative which is available in the other letter.

Mr. David Steel (Tweeddale, Ettrick and Lauderdale): The official record of that matter need not be in doubt, because what is important is the sentence near the bottom of page 3 of Sir Austin's letter, where he says:

"Whatever the words used were meant to convey, the message was perfectly clear."

The Prime Minister: That is why it was absolutely vital to get out the full record of the meeting at the Department of Trade and Industry, unusual though it was. The meeting was attended by several people who confirmed that that is a correct record of the meeting.

I shall set out the approach taken by the Government towards Westland during its period of difficulty and then deal with the charges that have been made against the Government and against me personally. My right hon. Friend the Member for Henley (Mr. Heseltine), who served in the Cabinet for more than six and a half years, has now made accusations about what he considers to be the breakdown of constitutional government. The House will therefore expect me to answer that charge.

It may help the House if I begin by setting out the developments in relation to the Westland company during the past 18 months. I do this to demonstrate to the House: first, that the company and the Government's approach to it have been the subject of the most thorough collective consideration by Ministers; secondly, that during this period the Government have been aware of the company's precarious financial position and of the particular legal obligations that that imposes on the board of directors; thirdly, that the Government wished the board of Westland to explore fully all possibilities for minority shareholdings in the company, including what has become known as the European option. It is important that the company should take the course which it judges to be the best safeguard for the future of the work force and the shareholders. Fourthly, I shall show that the defence implications of the company's future were given full weight in our discussion, which took account of the need to ensure that our armed services are given the best equipment to meet their operational requirements. I will then come to the circumstances surrounding the resignation of my right hon. Friend the Member for Henley on 9 January.

Mr. Dave Nellist (Coventry, South-East): Given the large-scale movements in shares of Westland during the past four to five days, and the possibility—some would say likelihood — of Friday's meeting blocking both offers to Westland, and since the Prime Minister's fourth item said that defence was the highest priority for the Government, have the Government considered following the example of the right hon. Member for Old Bexley and Sidcup (Mr. Heath) in 1971, and pushing an Act through the House in one sitting to secure the public ownership of Westland so that the jobs of the workers in Yeovil and the Isle of Wight can be properly guaranteed? Any surplus capacity could go to civilian use, such as making helicopters for air-sea rescue and food transport in Africa.

The Prime Minister: I shall deal with that point later. Clearly the Opposition line is that the whole lot should be nationalised at the taxpayers' expense.

The fact that Westland faced a difficult situation was first brought to the Government's attention late in 1984. We were told that the company's problems stemmed partly from a decline in the market for civil helicopters, including delays on the prospective Indian order for 21 W30, helicopters and partly from the lack, in the short term, of large orders from the British armed services.

The Government remained in close contact with the firm in the latter part of 1984 and early in 1985. Westland's difficulties were the subject of discussion at both ministerial and official levels between the Department of Trade and Industry and the Ministry of Defence. Careful consideration was given to what action might be open to the Government to help Westland—in particular, whether the services' helicopter requirements could be met by the purchase of the Westland W30. The Government concluded that we could not justify giving Westland orders for helicopters for which our armed forces had no operational requirement. It was judged that there was no defence interest that called for a rescue operation by the public sector. Instead, Westland should be encouraged to seek a market solution to its difficulties that would involve an injection of private sector capital. That was and remains the Government's position.

It was against that background that the Bristow Rotorcraft company announced an offer for Westland in April 1985. As the scale of Westland's problems became apparent to him, Mr. Bristow asked the Government a number of questions, including whether we would procure the W30 helicopter. I took the chair at meetings of Ministers on 18 and 19 June to settle the Government's response, which was in accordance with what I have already said. We also agreed that, if Bristow Rotorcraft withdrew its offer, the Bank of England should be encouraged to bring together the main creditors to develop a recovery strategy. Bristow Rotorcraft did withdraw its bid and on 26 June Sir John Cuckney became chairman of Westland. At the beginning of July, Defence Ministers were told that the United Technologies Corporation, the parent company of Sikorsky, were interested in the possiblity of some form of participation in Westland. On 8 July 1985, as hon. Members will recall, the future of Westland was raised on the Adjournment of the House. My hon. Friend the Minister for Information Technology made clear in replying to that debate that it was not for the Government to seek to intervene in the management of the company or to seek to influence the form the company's future should take.

Throughout the summer, Ministers and officials at both the Departments of Trade and Industry and the Ministry of Defence kept in close touch with Sir John Cuckney. On 24 September, Sir John showed the Government reports on the company's financial position that had been prepared by Price Waterhouse. He told us his plans for the financial reconstruction of Westland, involving the introduction of a new industrial partner. He revealed that he was having discussions with a number of companies of which those with Sikorsky of America, a part of United Technologies —with whom Westland had a longstanding relationship dating back to 1947 — were the most promising. The company had also been in touch with MBB of Germany, Aerospatiale of France and Agusta of Italy. Sir John also stressed the urgency of reaching a solution before Westland had to finalise their accounts later in the year.

At a meeting of Ministers on 16 October, it was decided to encourage Westland to explore further the possibilities of co-operation with the European companies which were partners or potential partners of Westland in a number of collaborative projects. That view was communicated to Sir John Cuckney by the Secretary of State for Trade and

[The Prime Minister]

Industry on 17 October. Sir John said that he had made it clear to the European companies that he would consider any reasonable proposition. He again emphasised Westland's need for a rapid conclusion to its plans for a financial reconstruction.

It was apparent that, unless such a reconstruction was clearly in prospect before the 1984-85 results were announced, the company could be legally obliged to go into receivership. A number of contacts subsequently took place with European companies and Governments and it became known that Fiat of Italy was associated with United Technologies' proposals. But as late as the last week of November, by which time negotiations between Westland and United Technologies-Fiat were in their final stages, no formal proposals had appeared from European helicopter companies for participation in a reconstruction.

It was at this stage, on 29 November, that the national armaments directors, who are senior defence officials, of the United Kingdom, France, West Germany and Italy met in London at the request of their respective defence Ministers. The national armaments directors recommended that the four Governments should cover their main helicopter needs in future solely by helicopters designed and built in Europe. This would have represented an exclusive commitment to buy only helicopters which qualified as European in this special sense, that they were not only built but designed in Europe. That would have gone far beyond the 1978 declaration of principles to which we still adhere.

On 2 December Sir John Cuckney wrote to the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry to urge that the recommendation should not be accepted by the Government. He stressed that, if the recommendation was approved, the board felt that it would not be able to recommend to the company's shareholders any reconstruction proposals involving Sikorsky and Fiat. He added that, while Westland had received indications of interest from the European companies, they did not mark any commercial advance over earlier proposals which had been rejected as inadequate. In consequence there was a serious risk that there would be no effective reconstruction proposals in place within the urgent timescale to which the company had to adhere.

In the light of these developments Ministers met under my chairmanship on 5 and again on 6 December to consider their response. In doing so they were very conscious of the approaching deadline for publishing the Westland accounts—with losses publicly predicted to be of the order of £100 million—in fact they were about £98 million attributable to shareholders—and the need therefore for the company to have a financial reconstruction package clearly in prospect by then if it was to avoid going into receivership.

The issues before us were, first, whether to agree to write off the launch aid of nearly £40 million for the W30 project if it were subsequently terminated. It was evident that that was now a condition for any successful financial reconstruction which would allow the company to continue in business. The second issue was how to respond to the recommendation of the national armaments directors. The groups of Ministers to which I have referred considered those two issues at the meetings I have mentioned.

Mr. Jeff Rooker (Birmingham, Perry Barr): Will the right hon. Lady give way?

The Prime Minister: I shall not give way as I should like to complete these very tightly argued points.

At the end of the second meeting on 6 December it was clear that a majority of the Ministers present were ready to decide that the Government should reject the recommendation from the national armaments directors, thus leaving Westland free to reach its own decision. But because a minority of Ministers—including my right hon. Friend the Member for Henley—felt very strongly about the matter, I decided that a further discussion must be held in Cabinet Committee, namely in the Economic Sub-Committee, for which a full paper should be prepared.

The Economic Sub-Committee of the Cabinet therefore met on Monday, 9 December. Sir John Cuckney and his advisers were invited to attend for part of the time to report on their company's position and to answer questions. After considerable discussion, it was concluded, first, that repayment of launch aid for the W30 would be waived if that project were terminated, and, secondly, that, unless a viable European package which the board of Westland could recommend to its shareholders was in place by 4 pm on 13 December—Friday of that week—the Government would make clear that the country would not be bound by the recommendation of the national armaments directors. That deadline was set in order to allow reasonable time for more specific European proposals to be put together without running up against the deadline imposed by Westland's need to have a financial reconstruction package in place by the time its accounts were published. At the end of the meeting, Sir John Cuckney was informed in confidence of the conclusions so that he knew where the company stood. I repeat that if the national armaments directors' recommendation had remained he could not have brought forward the Sikorsky-Fiat bid. The fact that the Government were not bound by that recommendation enabled there to be a choice of two options eventually—Sikorsky-Fiat and the alternative European option which developed.

The conclusions of the meeting of the Economic Sub-Committee of the Cabinet on 9 December laid down a clear line of policy and made it unnecessary to hold a further meeting. It was recognised in discussion that the timetable would allow for another meeting of Ministers before 4 pm on 13 December if unforeseen developments required one, but no decision to hold such a meeting was taken or recorded. The conclusion was clear, the events happened and the decision took effect. No meeting was agreed, so there was no meeting to cancel.

A firm proposal from the European consortium, which by that stage included British Aerospace, was received by the board on 13 December. The proposal took into account a provisional agreement reached between defence Ministers of the four countries based on the recommendation of the national armaments directors.

The European consortium's proposal was not acceptable to the board. Accordingly, as decided at the meeting on 9 December, the Government were not bound by the NADs' recommendation. In the light of the decisions taken on 9 December, there was no further issue to discuss, though the matter was raised in Cabinet on 12 December.

The position was fully reported to the House in a statement by my right hon. and learned Friend the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry on 16 December, including the decision about the national armaments directors' recommendation and the Government not being bound by it. I answered questions on 17 December. On 19 December, as I told the House the same afternoon, Cabinet reaffirmed the Government's view that it was for Westland to decide what was the best course to follow in the interests of the company and its employees.

Westland subsequently put proposals to its shareholders on 21 December to effect a capital reconstruction involving United Technologies and Fiat. Those proposals, and those of the European consortium, which in this period was joined by GEC, were subsequently improved in various respects, but that did not affect our fundamental policy that it was for the company and not for the Government to decide between them.

On 30 December, Sir John Cuckney asked me to confirm that Westland would still be considered a European company by the Government if the UTC-Fiat consortium took a minority shareholding. In replying on 1 January I told him that, as long as Westland continued to carry on business in the United Kingdom, the Government would continue to regard it as a British and therefore a European company and that we would support it in pursuing British interests in Europe. I also said that, whichever of the two proposals currently under consideration the company chose to accept, the Government would continue to support Westland's wish to participate in European collaborative projects and would resist to the best of their ability attempts by others to discriminate against Westland.

Cabinet on 9 January confirmed unanimously the Government's conclusions of 19 December and agreed that to avoid any possible prejudice to the sensitive commercial negotiations then in train all statements by Ministers should be cleared interdepartmentally through the Cabinet Office to ensure that all answers given by the Government were consistent with Government policy. Every member of Cabinet agreed except my right hon. Friend the Member for Henley. He then left the Cabinet. I shall return to that point in a moment.

I have given the House this full account because I think it is important to set the developments of the past month in the wider context of the Government's clear policy and the company's difficulties over a period of a year and a half, the attempts made to find a solution to them and the urgency in the closing weeks of last year of finding a solution which would allow the company to continue trading.

Mr. Jack Straw (Blackburn): The Prime Minister has now passed 6 January in her account, but she has omitted all reference to the leak of the Solicitor-General's letter which I believe took place on that date. Is she satisfied that neither the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry nor any of his officials had anything whatever to do with that leak?

The Prime Minister: I answered written questions either yesterday or this morning making it quite clear that an internal inquiry had been instituted. The hon. Gentleman asks me about a particular leak, but if I had to answer every question raised in the newspapers we should have a very long task.

The Government's approach throughout has been guided by a number of important considerations.

First, the Government concluded that no national interest considerations required the mounting of a public sector rescue bid. It followed that we could not dictate a solution to the company's problems. Responsibility for its future had to remain in the hands of its directors and shareholders — where it ought to be. Had the Government pressed the board of Westland to favour or adopt a particular solution it might have been taken to imply that we were ready to use public funds to underwrite the company's finances. We were not and are not prepared to accept any such liability.

Secondly, and in line with our active support for greater co-operation in European defence procurement, we were ready throughout to encourage the possibility of a European solution, while affirming that it was for the board and the shareholders to decide what was best for the company.

Thirdly, we wished to ensure that our armed forces would have and would continue to have access to the most cost-effective equipment which fully meets our military needs.

I believe that the House will agree that the record shows that the Government have acted consistently with those principles throughout.

There have been suggestions that the Government did not discuss the issues in sufficient depth or in a timely way. The account that I have given shows that such an allegation is absurd. There have been innumerable discussions of Westland's affairs between Departments and with the company over a period of 15 months. The company's future was the subject of collective discussion between Ministers on 18 June, 19 June, 16 October, 5 December, 6 December, 9 December, 12 December, 19 December and 9 January.

There can be no doubt that the problems have been considered properly and responsibly. Colleagues in the Government, particularly those most closely concerned, were given ample opportunity to express their views, and did so, and ample opportunity to seek to persuade other colleagues before the policy was decided.

I have dealt in considerable detail with the points concerning the Government's approach to Westland. I should like to emphasise one particular point in that account. Unanimous agreement was reached at the full Cabinet on 19 December. I repeat—unanimous. On 9 January Cabinet confirmed the identical policy and once again the policy was agreed unanimously. It was vital from that day forward that we should give strict practical effect to the policy as the crucial time for the company's decision was approaching. This was not a technicality. It was essential for the effective discharge of collective responsibility.

The whole of the rest of the Cabinet agreed the procedure that we should adopt — with the sole exception of my right hon. Friend the Member for Henley. He was prepared to acknowledge the advantages of collective responsibility without being prepared to accept the disciplines that it requires. That the rest of the Cabinet could not accept. It would be a denial of the collective responsibility on which our system of constitutional government depends. Cabinet heard his decision with great regret. They recognised his services to Government over six and a half years in office. But the decision was his, and his alone.

[The Prime Minister]

It follows from what I have said that the Government have conducted themselves properly and responsibly throughout and that there is no cause for an inquiry. The amendment in my name and those of my right hon. and right hon. and learned Friends recognises the important role of the departmental Select Committees in matters such as this. The Government's concern is to see a financial reconstruction of Westland as soon as possible which maintains a British helicopter design, development and manufacturing capability, supports United Kingdom participation in collaboration with NATO allies, and safeguards the interests of the company, its employees and its shareholders.

I believe both sets of proposals put to the company could achieve these objectives; I hope that the shareholders will be able to take their final decision very shortly.

I commend to the House the amendment which endorses the Government's consistent policy.

4.41 pm

Mr. David Steel (Tweeddale, Ettrick and Lauderdale): The most brazen part of the amendment moved by the Prime Minister is that which asks the House to endorse

"the Government's consistent objective of supporting Westland . . . and of safeguarding the interests of the company, its employees and its shareholders".

My basic disagreement with the Government is that, as the Prime Minister has just shown adequately, the Government's consistent attitude has been to say that it is nothing to do with them, that it is entirely up to the company.

My hon. Friends the Member for Yeovil (Mr. Ashdown) and for Isle of Wight (Mr. Ross), who, between them, represent the bulk of the work force of the company, had a total of six meetings last year with Ministers in the Ministry of Defence and the Department of Trade and Industry. All were designed to stir the interest of the Government to try to secure the stability of Westland and the continued employment of its work force in its helicopter, hovercraft and other divisions. No doubt the records of those meetings could be added to the plethora of paper that we already have.

In each case, the Government steadfastly and consistently refused to assist. They said that these matters were for normal commercial consideration. The Prime Minister quoted to the House a section of the speech made by the Minister for Information Technology on 8 July. He said:

"It is not for the Government . . . to seek to influence the form its future should take."—[Official Report, 8 July 1985; Vol. 82, c. 881.]

There, of course, lies the basic division across the Floor of the House. Most of us on the Opposition side of the House believe that it should be possible for any Government, especially where defence interests are at stake, to have at hand some means of securing the interests of companies that get into temporary difficulties. If the Government still had the National Enterprise Board it would have been perfectly possible to have public participation for a necessary temporary period in which the company could get back on its feet and not necessary to have a nationalisation solution. We believe that, given the state of the company last summer, the proper course would have been for the Government to consider taking a 21 per cent. shareholding and thus actively put together some kind of European consortium under the 1978 helicopter agreement. The right hon. Member for Henley (Mr. Heseltine) subsequently did this in the last two months of 1985.

The truth is that the Prime Minister and the whole Government continued, throughout most of last year, to operate a free-market theory in a world where the free market no longer exists. Every other country, whether it be the United States or our European partners, give far more support and active assistance in various forms, including public participation, to their defence industries than this Government are prepared to do. That is our basic quarrel with the Government's attitude to Westland throughout last year.

Later in the summer, the new chairman and the new board took their places. At this point Members of Parliament, the Sikorsky company, Sir John Cuckney and British Aerospace were all told that the Government would not get involved. The strong impression among Westland personnel was that the Government would not be surprised if, although they did not necessarily hope that, the company went into receivership. Various other companies would then pick up the pieces. This is where the Government are consistent in their non-industrial strategy. It does not matter if we do not have a helicopter manufacturing capacity, it does not matter if we do not have a pulp-making mill capacity or a steel rolling mill —such has been the Government's strategy all along. The result of this strategy since the Government came to office has been a reduction by about one fifth in the manufacturing capacity of this country. The result has been that 1983 was the first year when, excluding oil, our imports exceeded exports. This is the record, and into it the Westland saga fits with total consistency. We cannot support such an attitude, partly because if Westland had gone into receivership I am told that about 90 other supply companies could also have gone into receivership. But the Government allowed that threat to continue throughout last summer.

Mrs. Edwina Currie (Derbyshire, South): The right hon. Gentleman says that the Liberal party does not support the Government's attitude. Recently the right hon. Gentleman was reported in the press as saying that the European possibility should be pursued. However, in recent days, other Liberal Members have backed Sikorsky. Does the Liberal party have an attitude at all or is it sitting on the fence?

Mr. Steel: If the hon. Lady will be kind enough to let me make my speech she will know my attitude. I shall make it perfectly clear. I have already said what should have been done last summer. I am taking the matter in sequence and I shall now move on to what happened last autumn.

The Cabinet, including the former Secretary of State for Defence, must accept responsibility for the united attitude that it took towards the Westland company throughout the summer of last year. It was not an attitude that we supported.

The Government have also lacked a defence procurement strategy. I am one of those who stand firmly behind the twin-pillar concept of the NATO Alliance. That concept cannot operate if one of the pillars gradually acquires the bulk of the technology and manufacturing capacity for our defence equipment. Surely that was the reason behind the 1978 helicopter agreement. It was also behind a number of other collaborative ventures that Britain has entered with our European partners.

It is not anti-American to say that there ought to be greater common manufacturing efforts among NATO's European partners. That is why the Government should have followed this concept in the middle of 1985 when Westland was in trouble, but they did not. In September, the new Westland board, as the Prime Minister described accurately, had to put into effect a rescue package by mid-December — a short time — to avoid going into receivership after the accounts were published in mid-December.

Mr. Nicholas Baker (Dorset, North) rose——

Mr. Steel: The Prime Minister rightly says that the Sikorsky-Fiat deal was built on a long record of collaboration between Westland and Sikorsky. Therefore, in the tail end of last year, the board recommended to its shareholders a bird in the hand rather than any number of birds in the bush. It is not surprising that the bid has been supported by the shareholders, the employees and the board. They have supported it because it is the only available deal to come forward of its own accord and therefore it deserves support. The company has been perfectly right to be irritated at the manipulation by Government throughout November and December, having been told earlier that it was all up to the company.

Mr. Tony Marlow (Northampton, North): The right hon. Gentleman knows that both his hon. Friends the Members for Yeovil (Mr. Ashdown) and for Isle of Wight (Mr. Ross) now support the Sikorsky deal. Does he agree? Is that now Liberal party policy?

Mr. Steel: I thought that I had just made that point clear.

One of the more interesting points in the correspondence to which much attention has been given lies in a comparison between the official record of the minute and Sir Austin Pearce's letter. According to Sir Austin Pearce, Sir Raymond Lygo

"found reference to the national interest confusing".

In the official minute, however, Sir Raymond

"questioned what was the national interest".

It is no wonder that industrialists found the national interest confusing. It appeared to be whatever the latest Cabinet Minister said it was when they met. There has been no clear direction of national interest in this matter. The Prime Minister more or less glories in the fact that the Government saw no national interest in this issue at any time last year. On both manufacturing and defence grounds, we dissent from that view.

As for the constitutional issues raised by the resignation of the Secretary of State for Defence, when last did a Government have so many ex-Cabinet colleagues out on their ears, not through old age or incompetence but for deviation from the given line? A Cabinet room which increasingly becomes converted to an echo chamber for one person's views is a danger to democratic government. The long-term lessons of this affair are that the Government have been industrially incompetent and that the morale of government has been undermined by a failure to conduct the processes of government on the basis of collective decision-making.

I agree with the leader of the Labour party — the Prime Minister did not answer one point yesterday. The relationship between the Prime Minister's reaction to leaks by Ministers and ex-Ministers as compared to the alleged offences of civil servants under section 2 of the Official Secrets Act 1911 is obscure. Can there be one law for the rulers and ex-rulers and another for the ruled? The Prime Minister must now declare that section 2 is formally dead and buried unless she intends to mount prosecutions.

The Prime Minister has manipulated the processes of government unacceptably. Most serious of all, she has been cavalier with Britain's long-term manufacturing interests. It has been a discreditable episode in the life of an increasingly discredited Government.

4.52 pm

Mr. Michael Heseltine (Henley): May I begin with an apology to the House? Much of what I have to say I would have preferred to say to the House first, but circumstances did not make that possible and I apologise for that.

Much of what has been said so far shows that there are two issues at the heart of the matter—the relationship of Britain with its European and American allies in the Atlantic Alliance and the role, if any, that the Government should play in their relationship with industrial companies in seeking to enhance and protect the defence industrial base of the country.

I hope that I do not need to say to the House, and certainly not to my party, that I am as committed to the concept of the NATO Alliance as anyone in our party. I hope that I have played a role in selling the advantages of the NATO Alliance. I am wholly dedicated to the concepts and advantages that have come from it. I know of no other credible way in which to protect and defend the freedoms that we cherish. The issue, however, is the relationship and whether it should be one of partnership.

The political processes would be uncontrollable if, on either side of the Atlantic, tensions developed so that either side felt unfairly disadvantaged by the processes of the Alliance. We have one great thing in common—a common enemy—but the scale of the resources presents great problems. The United States of America spends some $280 billion a year on its defence requirements. That undoubtedly gives it and us enormous defence and deterrence, but it also provides an enormous industrial dilemma. That vast resource flows into the technology frontiers and creates huge production runs. It is spent largely within one market, which is perhaps the most protected market in the Alliance, by technology transfer regulations, by "buy American" protection laws and by extra-territorial controls.

This scale of taxpayers' resource is irresistible and it is co-ordinated through the vast buying machinery of the Pentagon. It is also protected by the immensely zealous interest of Congress. It is channelled into the largest and richest companies on earth. It is irresistible and if unchecked it will, in the legitimate pursuit of American corporate ambitions, buy its way through sector after sector of the world's advanced technologies.

Two consequences flow from that. The bigger and richer the companies become, the more they centralise their design and high technology facilities, and the more the flow of brains and talent is drawn to the western sun belts and the more the resentment will grow in Europe. The slower we are to react, the less effective we become as industrial partners to the United States. The more

[Mr. Michael Heseltine]

Europe is criticised for failing to play its part in sharing the burden of the defence of the free world, the more the resentments will grow in the United States.

So, for the strength of the Alliance and to preserve the conviction of partnership upon which it must politically depend, the more we in Europe must recognise that it is in our interests—and in America's—to strengthen and co-ordinate our industrial base.

Should we try to influence our companies? Are there any arguments about our defence interests, about our aspirations as a European partner or about our commitment to the preservation of the high technology base in Britain? At the end of the road, are there even any arguments about the maintenance of jobs in Britain when large sums of taxpayers' money are being paid out? Since Government is far and away the largest customer, should it not expect to play some role in influencing the destiny of our defence contractors?

Mr. Paddy Ashdown (Yeovil): Will the right hon. Gentleman give way?

Mr. Heseltine: Forgive me.

I have absolutely no doubt that the answer to all those questions has to be yes. In the starkest case, our companies, with few exceptions, are too small to survive individually as genuine partners with American companies. There is no point at which the process of acquisition would stop if Government believed that a market place flickering at the margin of the taxpayers' resource would lead anywhere except American domination, company by company, sector by sector.

My position has been consistent ever since I had the privilege to help establish the European Space Agency in 1973. The background is for me clear. So is Government policy on this critical matter. The Government White Paper of 1985 made clear that we were committed to a major drive forward in the co-ordination of the defence industrial base in Europe. The helicopter agreement of 1978 made it clear that we were committed to seeking the co-ordination of the European helicopter requirements. So could there be—should there be—an exception in the case of Westland? Should Britain dine a la carte in Europe, going for the airbus, supporting Tornado and the European fighter aircraft, but opting out of helicopters? Such a theory has its attractions. Often one gets a better choice a la carte, but it is usually more expensive and one's companions tend to copy one's example.

The longer that we in Britain go on preserving an uncoordinated, fragmented European industrial base, cowering behind our frustrations every time somebody else wins, or tries harder than we do, or gets up just that little bit earlier than we do, the longer our relative decline compared with the United States of America will continue.

Let us come to that small helicopter company in the west of England. My position has always been that if in the end there was only one way to save Westland on reasonable terms I would back Sikorsky. My own belief is that at the critical moment the Government had a clear preference for Europe and that, for reasons that I fail to understand, Sir John Cuckney set his face against any reasonable exposure of that European preference to his shareholders. I fail to understand his statement yesterday that, come what may, he will not put the firm, financially better, technologically more advanced, British-European offer to his shareholders.

I do not believe that even the most laissez-faire of my colleagues would have intended that leaving the choice to the Westland company would result in unidentified and unidentifiable financial groups slogging it out behind the closed doors of City institutions, as is witnessed, as though we were selling one of Britain's defence contractors in job lots to the highest bidder.

Mr. John Wilkinson (Ruislip-Northwood): I am most grateful to my right hon. Friend. We have all been listening with rapt attention to his grandiloquent statement and we are impressed with the idealism behind his observations about European collaboration. But is it not simplistic to paint a picture of an entirely one-way street, seeing that British industry has most successfully, to our advantage, collaborated with the Americans on the Harrier 2 and on the Hawk for the United States navy? We are also providing the Rapier to defend United States air bases in this country. Europe has provided the spacelab to go in the shuttle and is to collaborate with the National Aeronautics and Space Administration on a space station for the 1990s. Is my right hon. Friend not being simplistic about these matters?

Mr. Heseltine: There are examples on both sides of export successes to the continent of Europe, to the Third world and to the United States. We are not talking about co-operative success; we are talking about the simple question whether the United States would allow a significant defence contractor to be owned or effectively controlled by an overseas country. The answer is a categorical no. I do not understand why we should have a different answer in this country. It is well known—I have made no secret of it and never will—that I hope the shareholders of Westland will recover some sense of national pride when they meet on Friday.

I must elaborate on the two specific points that I have just made. First, at the critical moment the Government had a clear preference for Europe in the rescue of Westland. Throughout 1985, as the Prime Minister has fairly said, every option was canvassed. There are virtually no opinions that are not represented on the files on the matter, but my preference clearly follows the European co-operative sentiment in the White Paper which my Department was responsible for publishing last year.

Of course, throughout the early months, when the Prime Minister rightly said that there were considerable interdepartmental discussions and even meetings, the scale of the Westland crisis was hardly perceived. The first serious solution was the Bristow takeover bid. So none of the anxieties about effective foreign control were on the agenda in a practical sense at that time. It was only with the withdrawal of that bid—I remind the House that that took place only in June of last year—that we had the disclosure of the financial crisis which many of the existing board who were there then seem hardly to have perceived. It was only when that crisis broke in June that Sir John Cuckney took over.

It often appeared as though there was no way through for the company. The only way through might have been an extremely expensive public rescue. Every option, including a Sikorsky rescue, had to be preserved and encouraged. Every one of us would have been guilty if we had blocked off such options. The Department of Trade and Industry and the Ministry of Defence worked through the options. As events unfolded I had no cause originally for concern that my European preference would not receive consideration. Of course, the DTI was the sponsoring Department but at that time it was faithfully maintaining the European option.

By October — this is the point at which the difficulties which have led to my resignation from the Government began to develop—the preservation of that choice had become a clear preference. I must say to the Prime Minister that her description of the account in the two letters of 4 and 18 October does not tally with my reading of those letters. I have a very full understanding of what is in them. If the Government can publish Sir Austin Pearce's letter and now the Law Officer's letters, I cannot understand why they cannot make available the letters of 4 and 18 October.

Those letters would show that Sir John Cuckney recognised a European preference and that the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry declared a European preference. I have to say that about that time Sir John Cuckney was beginning to advise the Government that there was no realistic European option. It was only then that my anxiety began to grow. It was at that time that the willingness that I had had until that moment to support the sponsoring Department turned to an anxiety that the preference for Europe was being choked off.

During August, as the House knows, I had concluded on behalf of this country the European fighter aircraft agreement. If I dare say so, perhaps more than any other Minister I have deep experience of how Europe works. I told my colleagues privately in mid-October that Sir John Cuckney had the wrong experience to give him an insight into how European collaboration works. It is not his fault. It is an unusual experience to have, but nevertheless it remains a fact. Collaboration in Europe, where companies —even in this country—are in practice close to their Governments, is actually led by Governments and not by companies.

I obtained, therefore, my colleagues' agreement to see whether I could help to counter the increasingly certain view of Sir John that there was no European option. I met Sir John—as the House knows, I was abroad in early November — on 26 November. He said that he welcomed help. He explained that he had not the staff to process the work himself because he was so involved with the Sikorsky negotiations and that it would be good for the company to have a choice. So I began my negotiations with the full support of my right hon. and learned Friend the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry and with that of Sir John.

It has been suggested that I was indifferent to Westland's future. I shall say something about that, because nothing could be further from the truth. My Department's responsibility for Westland was to ensure that the industrial capability, which is a critical defence interest, was maintained. I always made it clear that I would insist on the maintenance of that defence capability. Secondly, it was its responsibility to secure the best, or at least reasonable, value for money for the defence budget. It was not the responsibility of the Ministry of Defence to take over the sponsoring role of the Department of Trade and Industry or to use defence money for company rescue plans, unless the cost of so doing could be extremely limited. It is for the Department of Trade and Industry to propose in such matters, and it made it clear on 4 October that it would not use DTI money for rescue purposes.

I stated clearly that receivership would be the best solution in certain circumstances. I said that most clearly on 25 September when I became so concerned about what was happening that I instructed officials in my Department that no options other than receivership were to be discussed further without my express authority. Why did I react so strongly? I did so because, on that day, I received a submission from my Department which said that, although no costed options for Westland yet existed, there was a plan. The Government were to fund £120 million for underwriting sales of 45 W30-160s, a civil helicopter, write off £40 million of launch aid on civil projects and provide perhaps another £25 million of further cash for redundancy. As my officials said at the time, to maintain the supply of spares and other Ministry of Defence requirements would cost Her Majesty's Government, on current information from the company, about £120 million to £165 million in cash and £40 million in written-off launch aid. It might have seemed just a small helicopter company in the west country, but my perspective had changed dramatically.

The military advice to me on the value to the Ministry of Defence of the helicopter order was that it would not be justified on military procurement grounds even as a gift. It will be seen clearly that by 3 October I am recorded as saying that I was not in favour of a receivership option.

Mr. Bill Walker (Tayside, North): My right hon. Friend will be aware that on 21 September I had a meeting with him in his office with principal officials from Sikorsky. Would he care to tell the House what he told them at the meeting?

Mr. Heseltine: Yes. I told them exactly what I have already told the House. I told them that we had to preserve all options. It would have been unthinkable, not knowing whether there was a European option, to reject one option that was sitting in my office at that time. I should add that my hon. Friend behaved properly on all occasions and that I believe that I have answered his question as honestly as I can.

It has been suggested that I withheld £6 million from the company. It was my accounting officer who withheld £6 million on what he believed to be grounds of commercial prudence. I instructed that I was to be kept in touch immediately, even when out of the country, with the attitudes of Westland's bankers on this matter.

In June, I put forward a limited form of Ministry of Defence guarantee to help with the uncertainties over the Indian order. My colleagues felt unable to accept it and I think that their reasons for refusing to do so were perfectly proper. I formally directed my accounting officer to pay the £6 million to Westland in October and, therefore, I took upon my own personal political shoulders the responsibility for making a payment of that large sum of taxpayers' money, which my accounting officer would not make. I remind the House that I was the Minister who was deputed to talk to Mr. Gandhi about the W30 order from India when he was in Britain.

In the end, whatever else I may have done, the Westland shareholders have a choice, and substantially better terms than those negotiated by the Westland board. The original Sikorsky offer, which the board firmly supported, argued that the only practical offer was for up to 40 per cent. of the shares in the company and 30 per cent. to 40 per cent. of the work to go the United States of America. Sikorsky is saying now that it will perhaps accept the transfer of only half that shareholding and only half that amount of work to the United States of America. So much for the company that, as we were told on 5, 6 and 9 December, might go away if we did not sign up without more ado. No one knows now who is buying what shares from whom in the stampede by an American multinational company to break into the European markets.

I wholly reject the suggestion that I have been indifferent to Westland's interests, but I plead guilty to the charge that I have intervened in what I believe to the legitimate interests of Britain's industrial defence base. I delivered a deal from the British and European sources to rescue Westland. On Friday 13 December, the bid, deal or offer was rejected by the Westland board in what I calculate to have been about 40 minutes. There was not a phone call and there were no meetings. There was a simple no.

I had been empowered by my colleagues in the British Cabinet to pursue the possibility of a British-European rescue for Westland, but I was given no chance to report back my proposals to the Cabinet Committee which authorised me, or to the full Cabinet I was required instead to report them to the board of a private company. Virtually every Fleet street commentator said that the proposals were better. Even Sir John Cuckney's remarks indicated something of the same flavour. It was so much better as a deal that Sikorsky had to improve its offer in every material respect. Of course, no meeting took place in Government after my deal had been made available. There were meetings before but no meeting took place after the British-European deal had taken a form in which it could be discussed sensibly.

On Friday 20 December a full, as I am advised, legal offer was submitted to the Westland board by the European consortium. On Saturday 21 December, Westland proceeded to circulate to its shareholders the Sikorsky-Fiat proposals, which offered the company less money, less work and less technology and involved scrapping an existing agreement to produce Black Hawk helicopters, which is still in existence, to the best of my knowledge, with Short Brothers of Belfast.

Much of what has happened since is in the public domain. In the absence of any collective judgment, which I continued to ask for as late as 23 December, I continued publicly to answer quetions, as I was, I think, properly entitled to do as the Secretary of State for Defence. I felt that I owed that at least to those who had responded so quickly and generously to the approaches which my colleagues in government had authorised me to make.

I must now come to the closing chapter of this extraordinary affair. I have explained that Sir John Cuckney, in discussions with me on 26 November, said that he would welcome a choice but had not the staff to process it. I fixed a meeting, after consulting the Defence Minister of the Federal Republic of Germany, for 29 November, consisting of four national armaments directors and representatives of three companies. I met the national armaments directors and the companies and explained the urgency of the matter. I then left to speak for my hon. Friend the Member for Rochford (Dr. M. Clark). By the time I returned, agreement had been reached.

Even before the meeting had taken place, Sir John Cuckney telephoned the permanent secretary of my Department, saying that he had learned of its existence in the Financial Times. He said that he was expecting a telex in hours from Sikorsky and that as soon as it came he would convene a board meeting which would confirm the Westland-Sikorsky deal. So much for the man who, only a few days earlier, had said that he would welcome a choice. I am at a loss to understand how Sir John could on 26 November encourage a Minister of the Crown in the belief that choice would be welcome and three days later threaten to stifle it at birth.

Mr. Gerald Howarth (Cannock and Burntwood) rose——

Mr. Heseltine: I have a limited knowledge of company law. That is a matter for the Department of Trade and Industry. [Laughter.] I am, however, under the impression that it is the duty of a board of directors to seek the best deal for its shareholders. The only excuse could be that even the knowledge of such an alternative deal would frighten Sikorsky off. That would have to be a miscalculation of historic proportions.

The House knows the background to the deal that I was trying to negotiate. In 1978, the four countries had signed an agreement to use their best endeavours to produce helicopters in Europe. The four, including the United Kingdom, had continued with that policy. At the meeting that I called, the national armaments directors agreed on the rationalisation of European requirements for helicopters for the rest of this century—the EH101, the NH90 and a merged version of the PAH2 and A129. That was the culmination of what had been embarked upon in 1978, the opportunity for Europe to keep within Europe all the design, all the technology, all the jobs, and to standardise, with no competition from any of the countries concerned, on three helicopter requirements.

At that meeting, therefore, the national armaments directors took the 1978 agreement a stage further. They said that they would in future not simply try to co-ordinate but would purchase helicopters designed and developed solely in Europe. They had decided on helicopter requirements for the rest of the century.

I must make it clear that I took no part in that decision. I was in Southend. The proposals were awaiting my return from Rochford. They were contingent on the European offer being accepted for Westland. With the national armaments directors' constraint, of course, Sikorsky would be ruled out in terms of its Black Hawk helicopter, and Sir John Cuckney asked the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry to lift this proviso of the national armaments directors at once. I refused to agree until a proper choice was presented between Sikorsky and the European offers.

The purpose of the meetings on 5, 6 and 9 December was to persuade colleagues to support the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry in his request to lift this provision. I have to say to the Prime Minister that I do not agree with her sense of urgency about this matter. There was no need to lift the national armaments directors' directive to allow the negotiations with Sikorsky to continue. It would have been necessary to lift the directive only if the agreement with Sikorsky was to be signed. Sikorsky could have been told about it and that the directive would not be implemented if its preference was exercised. During the negotiation of that preference, there was no need for it to be lifted.

Mr. Wilkinson: My right hon. Friend the former Secretary of State has throughout his tenure of office taken great pride in the fact that, under his stewardship, competition has been maximised and, with the help of Mr. Levene, the Chief of Defence Procurement, alias the national armaments director, great savings in cost have accrued to our taxpayers. How come that my right hon. Friend was so pleased that his national armaments director should announce to him a provisional agreement which would specifically preclude competition in the very important area of armaments where over the years a great deal of public money has been expended?

Mr. Heseltine: I wonder whether my hon. Friend has really thought through where the competition options would be in Westland if it were effectively owned by an American company which had already designed the helicopters for the United States forces, which were then to be available under licence to this country on work-sharing agreements. The House must understand that in all the procurement policies of the advanced world Governments actually buy the helicopters that suit the countries in which those companies are situated. If there is an effective American control of one of our major defence suppliers, I do not believe that there would ever be a really competitive choice to buy from Europe.

I accept, therefore, that there are limitations on the concept of competition. I have discussed it very fully with my colleague, the Federal German Minister. The way in which we will do it, if we see the Europeans advance in this way, is to ensure that the competitive pressures are arranged within Europe precisely as the Ministry of Defence is making arrangements now for competitive pressures to be exercised within Britain. It is no accident, because I share my hon. Friend's view that the percentage of new contracts to the Ministry of Defence subject to competition has risen in the past 18 months from 45 per cent. to 70 per cent.

Mr. Ashdown rose——

Mr. Heseltine: No. [Interruption.]

Mr. Speaker: Order.

Mr. Heseltine: I come to the two meetings of 5 and 6 December. I do not think that any of my colleagues would dispute that they are not of constitutional significance because they were ad hoc meetings. It is a perfectly legitimate way of conducting the business of government to gather together the immediately interested Ministers to dispatch uncontroversial or relatively uncontroversial business. There were, however, sufficient numbers—not a majority, but sufficient numbers—of Ministers at those meetings on 5 and 6 December to ensure that a properly constituted Cabinet Committee should meet to resolve the matter. That meeting took place on 9 December. It was, of course, a meeting of the Economic Committee of the Cabinet. Sir John Cuckney was invited —I think helpfully—to put his views about the urgency of the Sikorsky situation and about the European option to all my colleagues on that Committee. He stressed, of course, how essential it was to lift the national armaments directors' directive. A significant number of my colleagues came new to the arguments.

At that meeting I put forward a totally different proposal. I asked for just five days, until Friday 13 December, to ensure that the European proposals, which now included British Aerospace, were proved or not. I made it absolutely clear that if I failed I would back Sikorsky. After hearing all the arguments and after listening to Sir John Cuckney, a clear majority of my colleagues supported my proposals. The meeting ended with a clear statement that we would meet again on Friday at 3 pm, when the Stock Exchange closed. The officials of the Cabinet Office recorded the words. They are not in the minutes but I believe them to be in the notebooks from which the minutes are prepared. [HON. MEMBERS: "Oh!"]

It was no surprise to me when, therefore, the Cabinet Office arranged the meeting for Friday at 3 o'clock. It was a devastating surprise when it subsequently cancelled the meeting. I was content with the outcome of that meeting on 9 December because my colleagues had given me time, and I had another meeting at which colleagues could take whatever steps they felt then appropriate if they wished to give advice to Westland's board. That was the very least that the Government could do in common courtesy to the Ministers of other allied countries who had already made and still had to make such efforts to consolidate the offers for the rescue of Westland.

It is now well known that that meeting on Friday never took place. The board of Westland threw out the British Aerospace-European proposals as though they were a mere public relations handout. Collective judgment had been frustrated. I had no doubt where my duties lay. I had been entrusted by my Cabinet colleagues to seek a European deal. I had been entrusted by my European colleagues with the advocacy of their case. I therefore circulated details to my colleagues in Cabinet and sought a collective decision. That was denied me. I was told not to raise the matter in Cabinet. I refused to be silent. I protested about the cancelled meeting in Cabinet on 12 December. The Cabinet minutes did not record my protest.

At the next Cabinet meeting, on Thursday 19 December, it was stated that we should show no preference. I explained that events would shortly unfold that would cause us to rethink that position. The next day, British Aerospace, the General Electric Co. and the Europeans put forward a full proposal. I again asked for collective judgment. It was again denied me.

I explained that I would have to answer questions on defence procurement policies or the resulting uncertainty about the European proposals would be fatally damaging. This was not challenged in Cabinet; but otherwise the public controversy was to be cooled and there were to be no ministerial public statements. That night, the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry implied that I was holding a pistol to Sikorsky's head. I did not respond to those words. On Sunday, he spoke on radio and recorded a broadcast for "The World This Weekend". The BBC informed me, and I agreed to respond only if I was convinced that he had broadcast. I heard the broadcast by the Secretary of State and agreed to go ahead. Efforts were made to stop the programme—[HON. MEMBERS: "Oh."] —but I was told that, whatever the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry did, I was not to appear. I could not accept such one-sided treatment.

[Mr. Heseltine]

I withdraw not one word of my account of the Prime Minister's reply to Sir John Cuckney on new year's eve. Sir John wrote to the Prime Minister, in my view, to get answers that were perhaps different from those he had got from the Secretary of State for Defence. There was a draft of an indicated reply. It was sent to the Department of Trade and Industry and not the Ministry of Defence. There was an intervention by the Law Officers which materially changed the sense of the proposed reply.

I do not think that there is any point in delaying the House with more details of the events as they unfolded. I say at once that I would not support the form of inquiry suggested by the official Opposition, because I believe that there is ample precedent in the instruments of the House, which I did all in within my power to support when they were brought into existence to make any full exploration of the circumstances that the House may consider necessary, but, if there is to be an inquiry, I would expect to be called to account for everything that I have said and my role to be fully and carefully examined in detail.

Suffice it to say that the culmination of events came in the Cabinet on 9 January. We were supposed to be even-handed, leaving the matter to the shareholders, standing back. At that late stage, there was perhaps, realistically, nothing else to do once the board had made its final, and in my view ill-judged, recommendation. There were then selective leaks from the Law Officers' letters, which were used, wrongly, to damage my credibility. The Foreign Office instructed the British ambassador in Rome to ask the Italian Government to send no more messages of support for the European consortium. [HON. MEMBERS: "It is a scandal."]

The Secretary of State for Trade and Industry urged the managing director of the leading company in the British consortium to withdraw in the national interest. I reported that incident at once on Wednesday night to No. 10 Downing street. The next morning, in Cabinet, it was suggested that all answers to questions on Westland should be submitted to the Cabinet Office before release.

Mr. Hugh Dykes (Harrow): Will my right hon. Friend give way?

Mr. Heseltine: No.

This included answers to questions which already publicly carried my name. I had no confidence, in the light of what had already happened, that such a constraint would be used fairly or without prejudice to the interests of the British-European offer. What I had said with confidence one week would be at the mercy of the most trivial form of interdepartmental squabbling over words. The board of Westland could have been forgiven for seeking to exploit those uncertainties.

I was with great pride Secretary of State for Defence in Her Majesty's Government. There are special responsibilities in that job, and one of them is a conviction in one's capacity to do whatever one believes to be right and against all pressures. With great regret, but no doubt, I left the Government.

5.38 pm

Mr. James Callaghan (Cardiff, South and Penarth): I have listened over a long period to many great speeches. I do not think that I have ever heard a resignation speech in which the position of the resigner has been so firmly founded as the one we have heard today. It is inconceivable that the Prime Minister and the Government should refuse some form of inquiry into the allegations of the right hon. Member for Henley (Mr. Heseltine). He has made statements that directly contradict points made by the Prime Minister and others of her Ministers. There can be no confidence in the Government until this matter is cleared up. I say to the right hon. Lady that in the interests of good government she has a responsibility to see that the right hon. Gentleman's points are fully examined independently and that the truth is asserted and delivered to the House.

The decision to resign is not an easy one to make. It means parting with friends and colleagues. It means that whispers and slanders and untruths will be told about the person who has resigned. When a person resigns he will be told that he has weakened the party, and it will undoubtedly be said that he is fulfilling some long-range ambition. I am sure that it is an agonising decision. Sometimes resignations do not take place on great issues. They are sometimes the culmination of a long series of frustrations which eventually explode and boil over.

I listened to the right hon. Gentleman outlining the framework, the philosophy, against which he was taking these decisions and carrying out, up to a certain point, what he believed to be Government policy, and I contrasted his speech with the turbid recital of dates that we had from the Prime Minister. I have no doubt who has so far had the better of this argument. I salute the right hon. Gentleman for his courage in resigning. He will have a difficult path ahead of him. I do not believe he planned it, nor do I believe the Prime Minister wanted to push him out. It is one of those inevitable consequences of two stubborn people meeting and neither being willing to give way. When stubborn temperaments clash, we may well ask what the rest of the Cabinet was doing to try to prevent —[Interruption.] If my hon. Friends are interested I will return to this point a little later.

We are not dealing just with a clash of two strong personalities, as has been brought out by the right hon. Gentleman, because there are important public issues at stake that the House should address. The first issue is the future of this insolvent company. Can it be given a prosperous future? As we have been told by the Prime Minister and the right hon. Gentleman, the background is fairly straightforward. When it first fell into trouble both the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry and the right hon. Gentleman were in favour of and ready to adopt a European solution, taking along with them, perhaps, a rather unenthusiastic Prime Minister.

Before such a European solution could be adopted, it was necessary for the Government to put some work into Westland and, as has been made clear to us, they were not ready or able at that stage to do so. The future for the company was grim, and I have no doubt that it was with thankfulness that the Prime Minister and the other Ministers involved learnt that Sikorsky was ready in July to offer both finance and work so that the company could carry on. In its weak position the company eagerly grasped that, as there seemed to be no other future. Much later this prompted the European Governments and companies to come forward with a proposal for collaboration.

Criticism may be made of the European consortium in that it did not come forward earlier in view of the 1978 agreement for which my Government were responsible. But it did come forward, and the Government have not yet explained to my satisfaction and to the satisfaction of many others why they did not examine the European option as fully as they should have done. It is at this stage that the first criticism of the Government must be made, and so far the right hon. Gentleman has made the case that there was inadequate consideration.

The Prime Minister's defence this afternoon was that the company had to produce its accounts by the end of the year and would have shown a loss of £100 million, and that without any financial reconstruction in sight it would have had to go into receivership. There was a great deal to be said for that solution and I understand that at certain stages the right hon. Gentleman put forward that solution.

What is the position of this company today? We are told that the shareholders will take a decision. But that decision will not be in the hands of the shareholders if the banks choose to exercise their powers. If the National Westminster bank and Barclays bank were to say tomorrow that they refused to cover the borrowings of this company any further, the company would immediately go into receivership. The shares that are now changing hands at £1·25 each are worthless—pretty well worthless; I exaggerated slightly but not by much. On Friday the shareholders will take decisions on shares which have little value and those decisions will be on matters of supreme national interest. I want to demonstrate why this is so.

Westland is not a unique company, especially in the defence field. As the right hon. Gentleman said, to some extent the company depends on collaboration with others and on foreign technology in its work. That illustrates the important and central issue with which he started his speech, that for many years Britain, like other medium-sized countries, has not been capable of meeting its arms requirements from its own arsenals. The question of what policy we should adopt in purchasing arms from other countries or in co-operating with other manufacturers in joint production is not a new issue.

The House is aware that there is much history and there are many precedents on policy decisions to assist a Government confronted with a problem such as Westland. The Government were faced with the two options and the Prime Minister seems to have conducted the discussions, especially in the last two or three weeks, with all the restraint and rationality of a Saturday late night pub dispute after the pub has closed and people emerge with black eyes. The Secretary of State walks out of the Cabinet and the Leader of the House has an uncomfortable half hour on television. The Solicitor-General has his letter leaked without his knowledge, the poor pathetic Secretary of State for Trade and Industry has to weave his way around half truths and evasions and then has to come back and confess. It has been a miserable week for the lot of them on the Government side. [Interruption.] The hon. Gentleman is not yet on the Front Bench but I am sure he will be one day if this lot go on as they are.

The work force has spoken out strongly in favour of Sikorsky and the opinion of the work force should be respected — [Interruption.] I will not give way — [Interruption.] I am told that the hon. Gentleman has Barbara Castle's diaries. I have not read them, so I shall not give way as I would not be able to answer his question. If the House will allow me I would like to make a serious speech. The work force has said strongly that it wants the Sikorsky solution and we must respect its opinion. It believes that the Sikorsky solution will give it the best chance of retaining its skills. None of us can give the workers a clear assurance that if the Sikorsky solution is adopted it will give them a future, and that is by virtue of some of the reasons given by the right hon. Member for Henley.

Mr. Ashdown: Or from the other solution either.

Mr. Callaghan: There is, for example, one company that would certainly have a future. I am sure many people will echo what the right hon. Gentleman had to say about the disgraceful way in which huge blocks of shares are being bought and sold by faceless individuals who will then throw the shares into the scales on Friday. This kind of predatory company acquisition has nothing to do with the efficiency of the market place about which Conservative Members are always regaling us. It has nothing to do with the productivity of the work force, and the defenders of unbridled capitalism will be hard put to it to argue that what is happening in the City of London this week is the best way to safeguard the future of one of our defence industries.

He would be a bold man who would reassure Westland that its future was secure. After all, Sikorsky, as has been pointed out this afternoon, is not the principal in the matter. It is one of the divisions of United Technologies, a vast American corporation, to whom the investment of a few million pounds in Westland is no more than the office petty cash.

I shall forecast one likely pattern of development. Sikorsky, despite its 10 per cent., will dominate the future of Westland and its policy. It will use Westland as a useful tool to attack the rest of the European helicopter industry. In which case, Aerospatiale will survive because France will determine that it survives, unlike this Government's attitude. Fiat, already linked with Sikorsky, will make a bid for Agusta and the Americans will secure a dominant position in Italy. That is not the way to conduct American-European defence procurement — in their interests or ours.

We need a basis of equality in our relationships, and the helicopter agreement, to which the right hon. Member for Henley referred in his statement of resignation, was intended to secure that basis of equality between Europe and America. That is not anti-Americanism. It springs from the understanding that a true partnership requires equality between the partners. If one partner can do without the other, there is no real partnership.

I speak today because there is history to guide us on these matters which the Government have neglected. Eight years ago—the House will have noted the date 1978—the Boeing aircraft company was on the prowl in Europe, dangling offers of joint production in front of British aircraft firms as well as those in Italy and France.

At that time, British Aerospace was a nationalised company and the Labour Government were brought into discussions with Boeing at an early stage. I had become Prime Minister and I made it my business to meet the leaders of Boeing and the other American aircraft companies in Washington. After a long series of discussions, my advisers and I came to the conclusion that, despite the offer that Boeing was making of an apparently equal partnership with British Aerospace, the consequences, whatever its intentions at the time, would have been different. Boeing's long-term aim was to choke the infant Airbus, to suck the technology out of British Aerospace and to reduce its role to that of a sub-contractor.

[Mr. Callaghan]

The principal officials of British Aerospace were of the same mind as my colleagues in the Cabinet. We authorised fresh vigour to be imparted into our negotiations with France and Germany with a view to a joint European production of the Airbus. It was a difficult negotiation. At one stage it involved President Giscard and Chancellor Schmidt before the three countries could reach an agreement. But we did, and the results today — this surely has a moral for helicopter production — is that Europe has an independent aircraft industry; that British Aerospace is renowed as one of the foremost manufacturers of wings in the world; and even American airlines are buying the European Airbus.

If only the Government had shown the same enthusiasm, had overruled some of Sir John Cuckney's proposals and had secured his enthusiastic co-operation, and if the right hon. Gentleman had been allowed to pursue the line that he was following, the result might have been different.

We had other problems in 1978 with the Americans over the financing of Rolls-Royce engines. We got the Export Credits Guarantee Department, on what I believe was a good piece of financing, to support the sale of Rolls-Royce engines to American companies. The Americans accused us of unfair competition. They went to Congress. The matter was taken up by President Carter. I was in Washington again. We had a talk about the matter with the American Secretary to the Treasury, and I say in fairness to the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry that he would have been on a fair point if he had limited his conversation with Sir Raymond Lygo to pointing out the dangers that British Aerospace was running, and of anti-American sentiment. I must say, however, in view of the present position of the Airbus and its American relationship, that it would have been rather like teaching his grandfather to suck eggs.

Our experience was that, although we had a rough passage with the Carter Administration for several months, which needed a great deal of smoothing over, in the end, the President and I recognised that the Americans were fighting their corner and that we were fighting ours. We both made a calculation of where our national interests lay. Surely the moral is that the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry should not have been so timorous as to pressurise British Aerospace to withdraw because he was afraid of American displeasure. [Interruption.] I am not sure what the right hon. and learned Gentleman is saying, but if he wishes to interrupt I shall gladly give way.

The Secretary of State for Trade and Industry and President of the Board of Trade (Mr. Leon Brittan): I am simply repeating what I said to the House and what is confirmed by the official record, which is corroborated by three senior officials who worked, I imagine, for the right hon. Gentleman's Government and whose integrity was not questioned, and by my hon. Friend the Minister of State. At no stage did I ask British Aerospace to withdraw.

Mr. Callaghan: It is extraordinary, is it not, that when there is a difference of opinion between the Prime Minister and the right hon. Member for Henley, it is the Prime Minister who is correct. When there is a difference between the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry and Sir Raymond Lygo, it is the Secretary of State who is correct. The Secretary of State is still muttering. Despite his vehemence, I cannot say which version is the truth. I say to the right hon. and learned Gentleman and to the Prime Minister, how does she think that the Government can keep any respect when there is a direct contradiction between the letters that we hold in our hands and what the Secretary of State has just said?

The European Nations—the Secretary of State is not worth wasting time over — decided on the helicopter declaration agreement for three reasons. First, we were fearful that the United States in its vigour, appetite and size would swallow us one by one. Secondly, in those technologically advanced sectors, the need to invest huge resources in research and development forces even market leaders into collaborative deals with their competitors, leading to common sourcing of components and much else. The third consideration was the failure of the two-way street, an arrangement under which America undertook to purchase part of its defence requirements from Europe to offset the huge flow of American equipment purchased by Europe. Both sides were to purchase from each other.

I heard what the right hon. Member for Henley said about some of the traffic that had gone the other way. If the right hon. Gentleman were to draw up a balance sheet of the two—if I may continue my metaphor of the two-way street — all the American vehicles were pouring down the track towards us, but we had nothing but a rather broken down cycle for the return journey.

Those important policy considerations do not seem to have been taken fully into account. I have mentioned three factors—the fact that we were going to be demolished by the Americans, one by one, the need for technological collaboration and the failure of the two-way street—which do not seem to have been given the consideration that they should have been given.

I come to the Prime Minister's conduct. The right hon. Member for Henley claims that it amounts to a constitutional outrage. With respect, I believe that that is overegging the pudding. Every Prime Minister has his or her style of conducting Government. It is up to the Cabinet whether it puts up with it or not. That lot will put up with almost anything. There is the well-known example of Attlee's strong rebuke to Churchill over conduct of the wartime Cabinet. We have since been told that Mrs. Churchill apparently agreed with Attlee. She told Winston so, and then he tried to mend his ways. I wonder whether there is a role here for some other sensible spouse? The right hon. Gentleman let the cat out of the bag by publicly blowing the gaff on what his less courageous colleagues have long whispered behind their hands: that they find the Prime Minister's method of conducting business objectionable. I think that the House can understand what they are getting at.

But what were Ministers doing during this period of growing controversy between the Secretary of State for Defence and the Prime Minister? Was the Chancellor of the Exchequer doing his best to calm things down? I suppose that the Foreign Secretary was off on one of his foreign travels and that he was not available to help. But what about the ebullient tones of the Leader of the House? Where was the Chief Whip? What were all these Ministers doing while this issue was boiling up? I can only say to them all that if they behave like mice they must expect to be chased and that if they act like doormats they must expect the Prime Minister to trample all over them. I am bound to say to the Ministers who are sitting on the Treasury Bench today that, with one or two exceptions, the present Cabinet has less spirit and contains fewer men of talent than any Conservative Government since the war. Most of them are sitting outside it. I wonder whether the Prime Minister ever considers whether the fault is that the tallest tree in the forest will not allow any substantial growth in her shade?

However, all is not lost. If the Ministers play their cards properly, the resignation of the right hon. Member for Henley has given them another chance. He is the sacrificial lamb, although he will be a pretty tough lamb to digest. They can now, if they choose, re-establish Cabinet authority, because the Prime Minister dare not risk another resignation on the same grounds. If the Ministers care to do so, they can now rein in these authoritarian instincts that they tell us they find so objectionable.—[HON. MEMBERS: "They would not dare."] If they do not dare to do so, then it is a job for the Back Benchers. And if the Back Benchers do not, in due course the electorate will.

The right hon. Member for Henley told us that just before he left the Cabinet meeting there was not a single member of the Cabinet who supported him. He should not worry overmuch about that. There is a precedent. When Anthony Eden left the Conservative Government in 1938 in disgust at Neville Chamberlain's willingness to treat with Mussolini behind Eden's back he could not find a single supporter to speak for him in the Cabinet, but two years later Eden was back and Chamberlain was out. In case the thought has ever crossed the right hon. Gentleman's mind—although I do not suppose that it has—let me remind him that Eden went on to become Prime Minister.

As for the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry, I have been screwing myself up to try to find something favourable to say about him and to try to show some understanding for his position. I fear that the trouble is that the decent instincts that I am sure he possesses have, somewhere, become atrophied behind that lawyer's mask. I say to him in all seriousness that on Monday he failed to understand or to weigh properly his responsibilities to the House on the one hand and to British Aerospace on the other. The House is aware that commercial matters have always been given special confidentiality by the Department of Trade and by Government generally in the conduct of Government business, for obvious reasons. The fact that a letter was marked "Private and Strictly Confidential" should certainly have led him to refuse to divulge its contents but never to deny its existence.

Last Monday the Secretary of State should have let his instincts guide him. Then he would not have had to weave and shuffle as he did and eventually be forced to come back to the House and confess. He has had an awful lesson, but by his demeanour since I wonder whether he has learnt that lesson and whether he really understands the House of Commons. If he does not, the sooner he goes back to the Bar and makes his reputation there the better.

My right hon. Friend the Leader of the Opposition has called for an inquiry. I repeat to the Prime Minister that, whether or not she accepts this form of inquiry, it is now absolutely imperative that these matters should be inquired into if confidence is to be restored in the Government's position and integrity. The inquiry should, I suggest, go a little wider. It should also review some of the policy questions raised by the right hon. Member for Henley—and I hope by me, too—about how to carry further European defence procurement co-operation and how to integrate this with the Atlantic Alliance.

The Prime Minister cannot be very proud of the way that she and her colleagues have handled the future of Westland. If the Sikorsky offer is accepted, it will be the wrong decision: wrong for this country, wrong for European co-operation and wrong for European-American relations. What has happened shows, I regret, a readiness to ignore the lessons of the past, a refusal to examine seriously the European option, an attempt to deceive by saying one thing in public and doing another thing in private. Most dangerous of all, it shows a lack of understanding by the Prime Minister of the way to handle her colleagues in order to get them to work as a team. For her, the verdict must be that it is getting very late.

Mr. Jim Spicer (Dorset, West): I have an almost impossible task in following the right hon. Member for Cardiff, South and Penarth (Mr. Callaghan), the Father of the House. I shall not attempt to follow the broad-brush approach that he has used during the last half hour. However, at one point he said that he intended to speak about the workers at Westland. I hope that at this point, as I speak about the workers at Westland, the right hon. Gentleman will pay some slight attention. Three or four hon. Members have a constituency interest in Westland. We form a strange alliance. I refer to the hon. Members for Yeovil (Mr. Ashdown) and for Isle of Wight (Mr. Ross), my hon. Friend the Member for Weston-super-Mare (Mr. Wiggin) myself and one or two other hon. Members. Over the years we have followed Westland's fortunes and we speak from experience of that company. When the tumult and the shouting has died away and when all the politicans have departed, having had their say about the dates of various meetings and their outcome, the problems of Westland and companies like it will not have disappeared. Therefore, we should address ourselves briefly this afternoon to Westland's problems and I will not go very far away from that main point.

All hon. Members who fall into this category knew quite well that in the spring of 1985 Westland was in deep and dire trouble. There was the possibility of a cancellation of the Indian order and there was a lack of orders for the W30. My right hon. Friend the Prime Minister mentioned that a year or 18 months ago the storm clouds began to grow over Westland. We were made well aware of that fact by management and also by the trade unions and workers at Westland. It was against the background of a worsening situation that Sir John Cuckney took up the incredibly difficult task of chairmanship of the company. When he was appointed I did not hear one word of criticism from the Government or the House of his appointment or of the board. He had an almost impossible task to perform and he set about it with vigour.

In the interests of the board, the shareholders and the workers of Westland, there are three simple questions that I believe must be answered during this debate. As is often the case during some debates, the answer is known before the question is put but I ask my right hon. Friend the Member for Henley (Mr. Heseltine) when Sir John Cuckney first went to the Ministry of Defence to ask for help, to explain the problems facing the company and to point out the obvious future if that help did not arrive.

Mr. Heseltine: Sir John Cuckney rightly went to the Ministry of Defence very early on. I had to refer him to the Department of Trade and Industry, which is responsible for taking decisions about how rescue operations should be handled.

Mr. Spicer: I accept that. This first meeting took place on 17 July. I fully accept that the Ministry of Defence was not the sponsoring Department. However, my right hon. Friend the Member for Henley has made it clear during the debate how vital that Department's interests are and how important it was for there to be continuity of supplies from Westland to the Ministry of Defence.

My understanding is that when Sir John Cuckney went to the Ministry of Defence on 17 July he did not receive any promise of direct support from the Minister either in trying to get together a European consortium or any direct intervention from the Government because my right hon. Friend the then Secretary of State made it clear that he would be against any direct intervention at that stage. Therefore, the possibility of bankruptcy loomed large.

My second question is: what would have happened to Westland if Sikorsky had not come forward with its offer? I emphasise that the offer did not just appear at the end of September or October. At the end of July Sikorsky, as a friend of Westland, was beginning to talk, even in Washington, about the problems of Westland and saying that it had worked with Westland for a long time and it wondered whether it could help in any way. That news must have filtered back, if not in July then early in August, and it was quite clear that there would be a move by the Americans at an early stage.

What would have happened if Sikorsky had not come forward? The chairman of Westland, having spoken to the Secretary of State for Defence and the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry, went round to speak to British Aerospace, the General Electric Company, Aerospatiale, Agusta and Messerschmitt. All of those companies said that it was bad luck and that they were sorry. However, we all know that, with the exception of Agusta, which was genuinely concerned because of its collaboration with Westland, they were all hoping that when Westland went into bankruptcy they would pick up the pieces. Some were happy that a company which might have been a future contender was going out of business. Those were the problems that Sir John Cuckney faced in July and August.

British Aerospace is leading the European consortium. Firm guarantees should have been given to British Aerospace from all the partners in the European consortium that they will be willing and able to live up to their commitment of providing genuine work for Westland over the next three or four years. My right hon. Friend the Member for Henley took part in the "Panorama" programme on Monday and he knows the reaction of the Westland workers as they listened to that debate. There must be no mistake: Agusta and Aerospatiale are not in good shape at the moment.

Also, the memories of the workers at Westland are long and they do not need to be reminded of the agreement made in 1968 between Aerospatiale and Westland, which was to be a splendid example of collaboration. With the connivance of Aerospatiale the French Government broke that agreement almost immediately and halved their order for Lynx helicopters from Westland. One cannot blame the workers or management of Westland if they remember that occasion and if they fear that it might be repeated.

Mr. Stephen Ross (Isle of Wight): Does the hon. Gentleman agree that the managing director of Westland has been telling the work force that he has attended at least three meetings with the French and the Italians in recent months and has had little support from them?

Mr. Spicer: I made that point earlier on. It was in July and August that the exchanges took place and there was no support and no clear-cut commitment. The tragedy of the resignation of the right hon. Member for Henley is that he has been a leading and respected figure in bringing the European concept together. With his support behind it, a future European consortium for helicopters would have carried more weight and conviction. Now that he has resigned I have less sense of conviction about the way in which that cobbled-together European commitment will hold up under the stresses and strains that will come about over the next few months and in the years ahead.

Mr. Dalyell: I visited Westland on 21 November as the company's guest. That was when the problems were starting. It was my impression, as a visitor—I cannot put it higher—that the workers were deeply worried because they had not been told what the various options and possibilities were. They were worried about the constant changes in management and in decision-making. Can the hon. Gentleman tell us whether the European option as it is now put forward has been fully spelt out? I do not know.

Mr. Spicer: I thank the hon. Gentleman for that comment, because it serves to illustrate my point. There is not a single person, including Sir John Cuckney and Members of the House, who in July or August would not have welcomed the sight of two contenders emerging at the same time. We would then have had a race, and the winner would have been fleetest of foot and the one that was prepared to offer the most to the Westland workers and shareholders. The fact that that did not happen is an indictment of what happened during the period from July until September. In my view, the European offer was too little too late.

Mr. Ashdown: I will try to assist the hon. Gentleman in answering the previous question. I am aware of the criticisms mentioned by the hon. Member for Linlithgow (Mr. Dalyell) about the deficiencies in the spread of information to the work force of Westland. It may be helpful to the hon. Gentleman to know that the members of the work force that I have consulted, from the trade unions to the shop floor, feel that over the past two or three weeks they have been provided with a magnificent service of briefing by the management and are now well aware of the full details.

Mr. Spicer: The hon. Gentleman is well qualified to speak on that. His work at Westland is well known and respected.

If the European offer had been made two or three months earlier there would not have been the same confusion in November or December. That is the nub of the problem. It is no wonder that the work force, the shareholders and the board of Westland look upon Sikorsky as a friend in need.

There comes a time in all walks of life when one has to stand by someone who has helped one out before. Half of the problem about the way in which this whole affair has been dealt with by the board is that it did not have a convincing offer early enough. It knows in its heart of hearts that all those great European companies wanted to see Westland go into liquidation, and that cannot be a welcome thought.

Mr. Nicholas Baker: I am grateful to my hon. Friend for giving way; one neighbour cannot possibly refuse another. I am interested in what he said because a number of my constituents work for Westland. No one could fail to understand why the work force, given the direction of the board and the view that it takes in this matter, is now of the view that it is. But it is hard to understand from the account that we have heard this afternoon, however late the British-European consortium deal has come along, the apparent inadequacy of the consideration given to that proposal — not previous proposals but that proposal which my right hon. Friend the Member for Henley said is something that could only be Minister-led — by the Westland board of directors for the benefit of the company.

Mr. Spicer: My hon. Friend makes a point, but I can only say that the board of Westland has lived for the past three months with the nightmare of liquidation hanging over it. There comes a time when one no longer has the opportunity or the time and decisions are made in haste. It is a tragedy that such a situation has been allowed to come about. I would say only that those of our constituents who work there have a much better future now than seemed possible six months ago. For that we have to thank the Government, my right hon. Friends the Prime Minister, the former Secretary of State for Defence and the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry.

Mr. Ken Eastham (Manchester, Blackley): The House has been concentrating its attention on the activities of the Cabinet during the past two or three weeks. I shall not dwell on that because it has been more than adequately dealt with by my right hon. Friends the Leader of the Opposition and the Member for Cardiff, South and Penarth (Mr. Callaghan).

It should be recognised that the crisis has lasted now for well over a year. Deplorable activities have taken place with regard to the personal conduct of members of the Cabinet but I want to put on record some of the facts of the unfortunate situation in which the company finds itself.

The hon. Member for Dorset, West (Mr. Spicer) said that he had a constituency interest and referred to one or two alliance Members. I also have an interest, being an engineer by training and a member of the Amalgamated Union of Engineering Workers. We have a great interest in the fact that 7,000 workers are involved. For that reason I and my hon. Friends have during the past year continually asked questions during Question Time on defence matters and made representations which have evidently fallen on deaf ears.

Numerous deputations have come to the House of Commons to meet Labour Members. There have been deputations from management and trade unions. I remember one meeting a few months ago when the management briefed Labour Members. They came along with slides and advised us in great detail just how critical their position was. At the same time, they also pointed out the problems of suppliers in the helicopter industry. We should remind ourselves that suppliers in other parts of the country are involved with the engines, electrics, instruments, metals and several other major components, and they are desperately interested in maintaining their companies and the jobs in them.

The last meeting that we had with the trade union group from Westland took place on 12 December. Its members said that they did not want to be treated as political footballs. Understandably, we had a great deal of sympathy with them. That is exactly how Labour Members felt the workers had been treated. It is all right being concerned about the shareholders and the stock exchange, but there has been little comment during the debate on the livelihoods of so many families who are dependent on the contracts. It is not due to any failings on the part of this group of skilled workers that they find themselves in a difficult position.

On 12 December the members of the engineering union told us that on numerous occasions the management had encouraged them to come to Westminster to lobby Members on behalf of the company. Suddenly, a directive was issued by the company forbidding trade union members from doing that. I was rather suspicious about such a trend.

Numerous deputations went to the Ministry of Defence and I joined one or two. We met the Minister with responsibility for defence procurement when we made special pleadings, explaining the desperate situation that the company was in. The Minister sat rather stony faced and gave us no encouragement whatever. We pleaded with him to tell the company what was required. We asked him, if he did not know the specification, to turn to his expert advisers to find out what kind of helicopter he wished the company to tender for. The reply from the Minister and his civil servants was to advise us that they did not know what specification the armed services required. I can understand that, but it is like constantly moving the goalposts. The management do the tendering and say what can be done and suddenly the civil servants change the specification. I remember pointing out to the Minister that it was not good enough for the company to be at the whim of the Ministry which, in six months, would provide such a specification.

Sir Adam Butler (Bosworth): I think that the hon. Gentleman is referring to one or more occasions when he came to see me about AST 404. He must not distort the record. He knows that there was no question of the civil servants changing the goalposts; it was the Army, which, in the light of experience on various manoevres, decided that it did not want the smaller helicopter. It had to go back to the drawing board and see what was needed. That is what I told the House and his delegation when he came to see me.

Mr. Eastham: I am not in any way distorting the facts; I am but stating the simple fact that the company was given no indication of the required specifications. At that meeting, I told the Minister that it was unrealistic to expect a company to continue to meet a wage bill when it was not obtaining the necessary contracts essential to its survival. Other hon. Members were present at that meeting——

Mr. George Park (Coventry, North-East): The delegations to which my hon. Friend referred met successive procurement Ministers, not only the right hon. Member for Bosworth (Sir A. Butler). The problem was not only one of the Army making up its mind about what it required — it continually added requirements for further equipment until it reached the point where the aircraft virtually required a new engine. The Army could not make up its mind about how many troops the planes should carry, so the orders could not be placed with Rolls-Royce and negotiations broke down.

Mr. Eastham: My hon. Friend was present at the meeting to which I referred, and his comments are accurate. It was nothing but a can of worms. The MOD would not help the company by telling it what it really required.

Although the MOD consistently said that it was unsure of its requirements, shortly before the House rose in December the Minister said that his Department was placing an immediate order for six helicopters. How could the MOD suddenly know what it needed? How was it able to place an immediate order for six Westland helicopters? I have not been given adequate answers to those questions.

The debate during the last few weeks has centred on the shareholders, so it is especially interesting that the company is now wooing its work force and asking it which company it would like to succeed. I am not making a case about which firm should own Westland, but perhaps in future takeover bids for other companies the managements and shareholders will follow the precedent being set by Westland and consult their work forces. However, I doubt that that will happen. Workers should beware of Greeks bearing gifts. If Sikorsky takes over Westland, they can be sure that it will be the last time that they are consulted. They will certainly not be consulted about any slimming down of the work force and the consequent redundancies.

Mr. Ashdown: The hon. Gentleman persists in carrying on the misunderstanding widely perpetrated by the former Secretary of State for Defence that Westland will fall under effective American control if the Sikorsky bid succeeds. Can the hon. Gentleman explain how a partnership shareholding of less than 20 per cent. is effective control?

Mr. Eastham: I do not want to become involved in share ownership. My prime interest lies in ensuring that the skilled engineers retain the jobs to which they are entitled. I believe that to be a legitimate point.

Much has been said about the American proposal, and the trade unions have studied it with great interest. A meeting in Brussels last Monday with the vice president of the Commission, Mr. Narjes, was attended by Mr. Jack Whyman of the AUEW, who is chairman for the trade unions, assisted by Mr. Chris Darke of AUEW-TASS. There were also three representatives from France, one from Germany and three from Italy. They said in their written account of the meeting:

"Following a full and frank discussion, we all agreed on the need for European co-operation in Aerospace and the following statement was issued to the Trade Unions.

On behalf of the EMF Bureau, a delegation composed of representation of EMF affiliated organisation in the UK, Germany, France and Italy met with Mr. Karl-Heinz Narjes, Vice President of the European Commission, whose responsibilities include industrial policy, on Monday 13th January, 1986 in order to discuss the future of Westland.

The EMF delegation re-affirmed its support of European co-operation in the aeronautics field and hence chooses the European Consortium option whilst expressing the wish that this does not exclude other groups stressed that this sector, and especially the helicopter sector, is of strategic importance and that European manufacturers are fully capable of meeting demand."

They also called for a debate within the European Parliament and asked the Commission to make its position known as quickly as possible. They intend to follow up the employment problems arising from whichever option is chosen.

Usually, we do not hear any mention of trade union interests, yet they have a vital interest. The buying and selling of shares is not the only factor—jobs are on the line, and that is often forgotten.

I always put a question mark over guarantees that companies might give their workers. Has Sikorsky given any clear guarantee about design and technology work? Are we certain that that will be retained in Britain? Are there guarantees about the manufacturing content of the helicopters—or will there be a system of sub-assembly, with the helicopters arriving in Britain in large cases and the workers getting out their screwdrivers and assembling Sikorsky-brand helicopters made in America? Is it simply a matter of Sikorsky wanting to secure the order book? Is it another example of asset stripping? We all know the consequences of asset stripping—the casualties are the thousands of workers made redundant. Those workers have done nothing wrong; they are the victims of wheeler-dealers.

The Government should remember that a considerable amount of taxpayers' money has been invested in Westland. Members of Parliament who represent the engineering industry believe that the workers are entitled to job security. The Cabinet has hardly distinguished itself during this affair, and we have all suffered half truths and statements that are supposed to be truths. It is nothing but a can of worms, so I am cautious about Cabinet proposals. A cooling off period is needed so that we can make a proper assessment. The decision is not just for Westland, nor is it for America. It is a decision for Britain and it involves 7,000 jobs.

Several Hon. Members rose——

Mr. Deputy Speaker (Sir Paul Dean): Order. Many hon. Members wish to speak in the debate, so I appeal for short contributions.

6.40 pm

Mr. Cranley Onslow (Woking): I have no wish to detain the House long. I realise that many of my colleagues wish to intervene.

I must declare that I have no interest in these matters. Although for many years I had a connection with the helicopter industry, none of the events which concern Westland involves anyone with whom I am connected in a professional sense. I know many of the personalities. I do not conceal that from the House. I have known them for many years and I know something about the background.

I might help the House by mentioning some of the personality involvements which I have had in the affairs of Westland and with the aerospace industry, with my right hon. Friend the Member for Henley (Mr. Heseltine), with whom I served as a junior Minister in the Department of Trade and Industry between 1972 and 1974.

I regret the course of events that led to my right hon. Friend's resignation, as do most of his colleagues

However, not all of us—not even a minority of us—think that his action was right or that his resignation was for the right reasons.

If my right hon. Friend the Member for Henley were here, I am sure that he would not deny that between 1972 and 1974 he was an interventionist Minister in an interventionist Government. The Government actually managed the affairs of Rolls-Royce (1971). That Government sought to make the board of the newly constituted British Airways get on with bringing BOAC and BEA together. That Government were deeply concerned about the future of the British Aircraft Corporation, Hawker Siddeley and GEC. The Government sought to influence those companies. That never came to anything, but the Government were interventionists in a positive and thought-through way. My right hon. Friend mentioned the European Space Agency, and there was Concorde and all the European collaboration which that project involved.

I hope that my right hon. Friend will not mind my saying that he was an interventionist in that term in office and that he showed in his comments today that he is still an interventionist. But he has been an interventionist in a different Government—in a Government who are not committed to intervention. In that fact the House can find the root causes of much of what has happened.

It is also clear from what my right hon. Friend said that, in the particular case of Westland, the Cabinet had taken a conscious decision that it should not intervene. It is possible to disagree about the reasons for that decision and the merits of the issue. We have heard differing views this evening from hon. Members who have an acquaintance with Westland matters.

It is important to get one issue straight in the minds of the House and of the public. Westland is not a big company. It is not involved in the highest areas of technology. The company is not crucial to our defence effort. Those facts were no doubt in the mind of the Cabinet when it approached the Westland problems, which have been well known to the House for a year or more.

Westland is unlike Rolls-Royce. That was a large company in enormous trouble. It had enormous commitments to our national defence effort, to the defence efforts of our friends and allies and to great companies in the United States and elsewhere which could not be allowed to fail. Rolls-Royce could not be allowed to go bankrupt and be bought up—as I said at the time—by the Kamikaze Aircraft Corporation. We could not let Rolls-Royce go. A decision recognising that Westland today is different from Rolls-Royce then is not unreasonable. That decision should not have come as a surprise to my right hon. Friend.

If there ever was a time when Westland could have been taken into public ownership, it was when the Labour Government were in power. The employees at Westland persuaded Ministers of the day not to nationalise the company. If I had been asked at the time, I should have said that that was probably the only company in the aerospace industry that should have been nationalised. It could have been restructured and been given different management. That could have solved the problems. That opportunity was missed by a Labour Government, not a Conservative Government.

In its approach to the difficult problem the Cabinet might also have been persuaded, rightly, by the type of arguments deployed by my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State for Transport on one of those almost continuous television chat shows about Westland's problems after Christmas. He argued that unless the Government were prepared to use public funds to bring the company into public ownership they could not force the company to carry out Government policy.

My right hon. Friend the Member for Henley should have recognised that. He should have seen earlier that his authority must come under severe constraint. It was clear that the majority of the Cabinet, having considered these matters on various occasions, did not think that the disadvantages of whatever solution the Westland board recommended to shareholders were serious enough to warrant intervention by the Government, using public funds. The disadvantages must have included the fact that the company was caught—as we are sometimes—in the crossfire between the Americans and the French.

We are talking about an industry in which, apart from the American capability—which is considerable—the French are the leading helicopter manufacturers and have the greatest guarantee of support from Government. Some who study such matters would say that the French motives in this affair have simply been to use Westland as a blocking tactic to keep the Americans out of Europe. The French probably have no intention of furthering or fostering the company's capability, of maintaining its design staff or of giving it work which can be relied upon. I pass no judgment, but I think it is right to make that point in answer to the crude, anti-American sentiments voiced by the Opposition.

Having heard what my right hon. Friend the Member for Henley said about the Alliance and the American defence capability, it seems to me, and to others who also study the subject, that the United States Government's commitment to NATO somewhat exceeds the French Government's commitment. That is to our advantage, not disadvantage.

The Americans understand the politics, the logistics and the procurement problems of the Alliance. They know that if there is to be a genuine commitment by the United Kingdom to the continuance of the Alliance it must pay off in terms of worthwhile jobs. There is a good case for saying that it is more probable that the Americans will genuinely and positively seek to solve the difficulties of a company such as Westland more than will Aerospatiale. Those are matters about which it is possible to have different opinions. It is reasonable to say that the Government may not agree, but they agree at least that there is no need to intervene and that, without detriment to the national interest, the decision should be left to the shareholders. The more options that the company has before them, the better.

My right hon. Friend the Member for Henley should have seen the position sooner—certainly before October. He should have realised that, whatever may have been said to him, he was not authorised to strike a deal with Europe, to pledge the Government's credit or to go beyond the influence that his former Department possesses.

The Prime Minister was entitled to put an end to disagreement between her Ministers. I say to her with diffidence that when the historians compile their analysis of these events there will be some who will write how remarkably patient and long suffering my right hon. Friend the Prime Minister was during the disagreement. The House knows that I say that not to curry favour with the

[Mr. Cranley Onslow]

Prime Minister, but because I believe it to be so. Sometimes hon. Members say things because they believe them to be so.

In his account of the course of events that led to his resignation—on television and on the radio—my right hon. Friend the Member for Henley complained of a constitutional outrage. In a perceptive article in The Guardian Mr. Hugo Young said that that was hyperbole—exaggeration carried beyond any reasonable point—and I agree with him. Mr. Young gave some examples about what he believed to be constitutional outrage.

During the Christmas recess I read the diaries of Sir John Colville dealing with his experiences as private secretary to Sir Winston Churchill at Downing street. He relates the time when the Prime Minister had just had a stroke and told his private secretary, "Do not let my Cabinet colleagues know about this. Carry on the Government as if I were in full control." Mr. Colville and Mr. Christopher Soames, as they then were, had the opportunity, if they had wished to take advantage of it, to do just that. Sir John Colville states that to do that would have been a constitutional outrage and he is right. To cancel a Cabinet Committee or to make provisional arrangements for a Cabinet Committee and then not to hold it is not a constitutional outrage. Indeed, I suspect it may have happened before.

Mr. David Winnick (Walsall, North): Will the hon. Member give way?

Mr. Onslow: I am sorry. There are other hon. Members whom the House may wish to hear, but the hon. Gentleman is not one of them.

Some of those who have commented on the Westland affair have called it a trauma, which shows the depth to which our education system has descended. I think that they may have meant a drama, which is what it could be called. My main complaint about the coverage of the affair is that it has been made into a melodrama. Much has been magnified, developed and distorted out of all proportion.

Mr. John Hannam (Exeter): That is nothing new.

Mr. Onslow: No, it is nothing new, especially when Parliament is in recess and the media can have a field day. It is standard practice. If the "Today" programme, which is dedicated singlehandedly to getting the nation out of bed on the wrong side every morning, and the rest of the media are allowed a clear run, they will take advantage of it. I do not complain, but I think I am entitled to make the observation.

I am glad that Parliament is back and that parliamentary matters of great importance can be debated and considered in their proper place, which is in Parliament rather than on the television screen. I am pleased that we have had this debate and I welcome the Government's amendment. I believe that in his speech my right hon. Friend the Member for Henley supported the proposition of a Select Committee process to show its capacity for investigation rather than the type of inquiry suggested by the Opposition.

Matters must be investigated. Challenges and assertions have been made, which no hon. Member should allow to be lightly brushed aside, such as the unlikely charge by my right hon. Friend about the Foreign Office, which I do not find credible. Things have been said about Sir John Cuckney and Sir Raymond Lygo and even about Sikorsky and civil servants. There are many other cases about which it is important to establish the facts and not simply to hear partial accounts bound by the limitations of a one-day debate.

It would be interesting and valuable for the House to have from Sir John Cuckney, as chairman called in to rescue the company, an account of the way in which he believed it to be his duty to carry out that function. It is important for Parliament that there should be no prejudging and no leaping to conclusions just because something has been said and an opportunity to deny it has not yet come along. I hope that the House will avoid that temptation from now on.

The right hon. Member for Cardiff, South and Penarth (Mr. Callaghan) mentioned in his speech the affairs of the British Aerospace letter about which we had such a storm in a teacup on Monday night — when the right hon. Member for Glasgow, Hillhead (Mr. Jenkins) came shuffling in from behind his green baize door like a sort of geriatric Jeeves to do all the mischief that he could.

My right hon. and learned Friend the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry — with hindsight — could have done better. He should have known from the fact that my right hon. Friend the Member for Henley asked about a letter that he presumed that such a letter existed. It could be assumed that the letter's existence was likely to become public knowledge. However, the contents of the letter were the burden of the matter. Even the right hon. and learned Member for Monklands, East (Mr. Smith), who is so adept at whipping up a parliamentary storm, will concede that this is not the most serious of matters that have engaged the attention of the House. There are serious issues, but that matter need not detain us.

With due diffidence, Mr. Speaker, if the debate is to be a credit to Parliament, as it should be, it is vital that it should proceed to its conclusion with the House being able to give a fair hearing to both sides. I would say to the Opposition Front Bench that we have recently had the unhappy experience of a type of trial by decibel. I do not believe that the House or the country wish to have that repeated tonight. Nothing is more important than that my right hon. and learned Friend the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry, whom we on this side of the House know and admire, should have an absolutely fair hearing during his reply.

Mr. John Morris (Aberavon): The hon. Member for Woking (Mr. Onslow) described Monday's events as a storm in a teacup. Those events do not deserve that description.

I do not wish to pursue the apology that the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry made on Monday about the non-disclosure of his awareness of the British Aerospace letter in his reply to my hon. Friends the Members for Bolsover (Mr. Skinner) and for Newcastle upon Tyne, North (Mr. Brown). I wish to query two aspects of the Solicitor-General's letter.

The House will know how the Law Officers Department generally operates. It is briefed by other Departments, which provide the basic information. It would be extremely unusual if the Law Officers were suddenly to act of their own accord without being requested, briefed or instructed by the Department. The Law Officers are the Government's legal advisers; they do not act on their own. Therefore, one wonders who instructed the Solicitor-General. Who inspired him? Who advised him? How did he come to write his letter? Was it part of the black information campaign being run by No. 10 to denigrate the then Secretary of State for Defence?

Mr. Winnick: The hon. Member for Woking (Mr. Onslow), who is the chairman of the 1922 Committee, came to the defence of the Prime Minister in a rather shoddy speech. Is my right hon. and learned Friend aware that the deputy chairman of the 1922 Committee is quoted in The London Standard as saying this:

"The skids are under Leon."

The London Standard states that the deputy chairman

"said that Mr. Brittan's job was now in serious jeopardy. Mr. Fox added, 'What we have got to get clear is that there are not two standards, one for one Cabinet Minister and one for another.'"

Therefore, what the chairman of the 1922 Committee said was contradicted by the vice-chairman.

Mr. Morris: I am grateful to my hon. Friend, who will be able to develop his point later. But I do not wish to be detracted from the questions to which I seek answers from the Government. Who inspired the Solicitor-General to write his letter? If we get nothing else from the debate, the House deserves and demands an answer to my question about who motivated him to put pen to paper.

The Solicitor-General states in his letter that he writes on the basis of Cabinet papers, and, he adds,

"on the basis of the information contained in the documents"—

those are Cabinet papers and what he has read in The Times—

"which I emphasise are all that I have seen."

That is a somewhat unusual phrase for the Solicitor-General to have used, unless he wished to protect himself against a future suggestion that he was inspired to write by someone else. If that is true, who was it and what was the state of knowledge of the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry? Was he full and frank with the House on Monday in reply to my right hon. Friend the Member for Morley and Leeds, South (Mr. Rees), who asked:

"Was the correcting letter from the Law Officers to the Secretary of State for Defence seen by the right hon. and learned Gentleman or his Department before it was sent to the Ministry of Defence?"

The reply was:

"I saw the letter after it was sent."—[Official Report, 13 January 1986; Vol. 89, c. 783.]

That completely ignored the other part of my right hon. Friend's question as to whether the Department had seen it.

Against that background, I have asked—I want a reply tonight because we cannot wait until tomorrow or Friday when it would normally be given—whether the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry or anyone in his Department saw the Solicitor-General's letter in draft before it was sent. All that he says in his answer is that he saw it after it was sent. Did he see a draft, did he see the material upon which the letter was based, or was he consulted about the contents of the letter before it was sent?

The purpose of my asking that is this: it is all very well for the Secretary of State during questioning to confine himself narrowly, as he did on the British Aerospace letter, to a precise answer on exactly what he did or saw at any one time. Although he ignored my right hon. Friend's invitation to reply for his Department, he was answering not only for himself, as he said earlier, but for the entire Government. It may be true that he saw the letter only after it was sent, but we know from our experience that letters are prepared in draft. On such a matter, a letter would go to No. 10, come back again and be seen by several people in several Departments, such as the Foreign Office. Although the Secretary of State may be accurate in saying that he saw the letter sent only after the event, can we be sure that he did not see the basis for the letter? In this instance, too, was he less than frank with the House?

Mr. Dalyell: Does my right hon. and learned Friend believe that it is all the work of an over-zealous civil servant? Would not any civil servant, understandably mindful of his career, be extremely careful to get political instruction before doing any such thing? Would not those exceedingly careful men at the Law Officers Department take infinite trouble in contacting the Departments concerned before they wrote any such letter?

Mr. Morris: I find it inconceivable—the House will respect my view on this, if on nothing else—that the Law Officers would have sent such a letter without consulting and obtaining the fullest possible instruction from the primary source, which is the Department concerned. In this instance, where the Solicitor-General was writing to correct another hon. Member he would have got full clearance from No. 10, too. That is my experience, and I doubt whether anyone who has served in Government would come to a contrary view. If I am wrong, I am happy to be corrected, but I want a precise answer, not another evasive answer that will cause the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry to return to the House to apologise once again for a half-truth.

How did the Solicitor-General's letter come to be disclosed in part? Prima facie, such a disclosure is contrary to section 2 of the Official Secrets Act. Who would have authorised that? It would not be in the interests of the Secretary of State for Defence to do so. Indeed, he adopts a high moral tone on disclosures by civil servants or anyone else. He sends for the chief constable of the Ministry of Defence. He consults the Director of Public Prosecutions and the Solicitor-General, who then telephones the Attorney-General in the south of France, or does whatever is necessary to obtain the fullest possible clearance.

Since the Secretary of State for Defence would not have disclosed the contents of the letter, who would have done so? We are left with the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry or No. 10 Downing street. Only those two parties would have an interest in disclosing the letter and, in all probability, the necessary material on which the letter was based. The Secretary of State agrees that he saw the letter after it was sent. I believe that a couple of hours elapsed before it was leaked from somewhere. Since the Prime Minister has agreed that an internal inquiry procedure has been set up, if evidence is forthcoming during that inquiry — we have had important although not always successful prosecutions under the Official Secrets Act during the past few years—what will happen to the perpetrator of the leak if he is discovered?

On Monday I asked the Solicitor-General whether, in this context, he considered equality under the law as an important principle. I found some difficulty in phrasing my question and Mr. Speaker in his wisdom eventually agreed to my asking whether other inquiries had been inhibited because of the handling of that matter. In the course of his reply, the Solicitor-General assured me that in the discharge of all their functions, Law Officers exercise an independent and impartial judgment. The assurance I want tonight is whether that independent and impartial judgment will be given if, in the course of the internal inquiries, sufficient material is obtained to refer the matter to those who are responsible for prosecuting. I trust that whoever is responsible for the leak will be dealt with in the normal way—equality under the law—and that the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry can claim tonight that the leak did not come either from him or from his Department. Such an assurance would lift that cloud from his head.

Sir Adam Butler (Bosworth): I will not follow the points made by the right hon. and learned Member for Aberavon (Mr. Morris), although I agree that he has made an important point that needs to be answered. That point, however, is a fairly narrow aspect of the problem.

I had hoped that my right hon. and hon. Friends would approach the debate with some slight trepidation as to the outcome. Any anxiety that we might have had on that score frankly disappeared when we heard the very weak attack mounted by the Leader of the Opposition. The right hon. Member for Islwyn (Mr. Kinnock) claimed that he intended to talk about the substantive aspects, the importance of high technology, procurement policy and the relationship within NATO. Instead, he dealt solely in innuendo and allegation that were unsubstantiated.

I would not be surprised if the right hon. Member for Cardiff, South and Penarth (Mr. Callaghan) is making a comeback. The right hon. Gentleman entertained us with his considerable wit on matters in which, as I shall show, he is somewhat out of date, not least concerning the factual matters about the two-way street.

I should like to refer to the exchange of letters and in particular to the recollections of what took place at that now famous meeting between the chief executive of British Aerospace and my right hon. and learned Friend the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry. It does not do individual hon. Members, or the House as a whole, any good to imply, because one accepts completely what one party to the meeting says took place, that the other side is lying. I confess that frequently my recollections of meetings can, although made in good faith, be quite different in detail from those of other people who attended those meetings. In the case of the British Aerospace meeting we have the recollections of four or five people against the recollections of Sir Raymond Lygo.

I know Sir Raymond Lygo well. He is an honourable man, and he is also a wilful man. Sometimes in such circumstances people hear what they wish to hear. The leader of the Liberal party opened our eyes to that fact and drew the attention of the House to the letter from Sir Austin Pearce that used the phrase:

> "Whatever the words used were meant to convey, the message was perfectly clear."

In other words, it was not the meaning of the words that was important, but the interpretation that was put upon them. I prefer to accept that there was a misunderstanding on this matter which occurred in good faith and that in no way has my right hon. and learned Friend the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry misled or sought to mislead the House on that issue.

I agree with my hon. Friend the Member for Woking (Mr. Onslow) in his comments about my right hon. Friend the Member for Henley (Mr. Heseltine), the former Secretary of State for Defence, and his departure from the Cabinet. It is a great pity that my right hon. Friend cannot continue in Government. The Cabinet and the Government need a range of views and men of different experience and outlook and one feature of the Conservative party is that we have accommodated such views. Equally, I believe that it was largely my right hon. Friend's own fault that he was forced to resign.

We do not yet know the full story and we may never know what actually happened in my right hon. Friend's mind, though we have a better understanding now than we had before. My right hon. Friend's espousal of the European consortium bid, his organising of that bid and his paternalistic approach to that matter — he talked about "my deal that should have been considered by Cabinet" — were factors in his resignation. I told my right hon. Friend that I intended to be critical of him tonight and I am sorry that he is not present. I believe that it was his over-association with that bid that caused him finally to take the step that he did. That was a great pity.

Mr. Tony Marlow (Northampton, North): At some stage in his speech did not my right hon. Friend the Member for Henley (Mr. Heseltine) say that what he wanted was for the Cabinet to give a strong recommendation to the shareholders and management of Westland that they should go for a particular deal? Is that not a peculiar thing for a Conservative Cabinet to do?

Sir Adam Butler: Does my hon. Friend the Member for Northampton, North (Mr. Marlow) mean peculiar for the Cabinet or peculiar for an individual Minister? I believe that in either case that would be completely wrong.

My right hon. Friend the Member for Henley was piqued because the consortium's deal was not discussed after Friday 13 December by the Cabinet. Surely the party that should have discussed that was the Westland board and it did so. In the event, it would have been wiser politically, if not better, if the board had been prepared to put both options to the shareholders with a full explanation. It may be that the time pressures about which we have heard were such as to make that impossible.

My right hon. Friend has earned credit in ensuring that the European consortium bid was firmly on the table. One must ask whether his intervention was necessary. He believes that Governments must be involved when defence collaborative deals are being formulated. I have had some experience of that. My hon. Friend the Member for Dorset, West (Mr. Spicer) drew attention to the long time scale during which bids could have been forthcoming. Bids could have come from GEC which could have bought Westland out of its petty cash. Bids could have been forthcoming from British Aerospace and I believe that the European bid could have been put together earlier. That did not happen, and Westland was under enormous financial pressure and up against its legal responsibilities in regard to continuing trading. Faced with that reality, Westland had to press on with the one genuine possibility that presented itself.

My right hon. Friend the Member for Henley deserves great credit for his work in connection with defence collaboration in Europe and I gave my right hon. Friend my full support in that matter. The European defence industry will become fully competitive only if it collaborates and will be able to compete with the Americans only if it works together and produces long production runs and if the European NATO allies work to that end.

The trading position with America is not, as the right hon. Member for Cardiff, South and Penarth described it, a shambles and a virtual one-way street. A few years ago the ratio would have been 4 : 1. The proportion may have improved since I left the Government, but the position then was of the order 2 : 1. However, the position in Europe as a whole was 6 : 1 against Europe.

My first point with regard to collaboration is a qualification of the need for and importance of such collaboration within European NATO. The Americans must accept that it is in the interests of the Western Alliance that the European pillar of NATO should be strengthened. That will require considerable maturity of response and resistance to the easy pressures for protectionism which may result. That view has friends in Congress and people such as Senator Nunn have chided Europe for its weakness in that respect, but the Americans cannot have it both ways. The Alliance as a whole and the Americans' interest as a whole, internationally and in security terms, will benefit from a stronger Europe.

Mr. William Cash (Stafford): Following the points made by the right hon. Member for Cardiff, South and Penarth (Mr. Callaghan), does my hon. Friend agree that a successful arrangement with Sikorsky does not mean that it will automatically take over and effectively destroy the entire Westland exercise but that, on the contrary, a proper engagement with Westland through Sikorsky may enhance rather than damage the European pillar?

Sir Adam Butler: I decided to avoid, if possible, advising Westland shareholders which way to vote, so I hesitate to answer that question. As I read what Sir John Cuckney has said in print and through advertisements, I believe that he sees the consequences of the Sikorsky deal as a stronger Westland than otherwise would be the case, and there is some support for the view that a stronger Westland will make for a stronger European helicopter industry than if the collaborative arrangement on the production side had taken place.

Secondly, although the object of defence collaboration in Europe is excellent, it cannot and must not be exclusive. We have heard how much co-operation already takes place between ourselves and the Americans. That will and should continue, but it should not be exclusive. The same applies to Anglo-Canadian, Anglo-Australian and Anglo-New Zealand co-operation. European defence collaboration is perfect as an ideal, but it must not become an obsession.

Thirdly, and highly relevant to the decision by the Westland board and shareholders, collaboration will be strongest if it is based on partnerships initiated by industry and on links seen to be of mutual advantage by the companies involved and where there is industrial compatability. Partnerships imposed by Ministers and politicians run the risk of suffering the same fate as the house that was built on sand.

In response to the question half put by my hon. Friend the Member for Stafford (Mr. Cash), I believe not only that Westland may be stronger in the hands of Sikorsky but that collaboration on important projects such as the EH101 and the A129 light attack helicopter will not be prejudiced if Agusta faces the situation, a matter on which there have been varying reports in the press. I believe that that collaboration will continue as planned.

With regard to criticism of the Government's handling of the case, although with hindsight certain slips would not have been made, I believe that in general the Government have behaved very properly. Having decided against the nationalisation route—it is interesting to note that the Leader of the Opposition never even suggested that and had to be reminded of it as an option by one of his Left-wing friends—and having rejected the NEB approach of the Liberal party, the solution had to come from the private sector. As I have said before, as a Minister I considered very carefully the possibility of placing orders with the company, what we should buy if we were to rescue the company in that way and whether we could fill the two to four years' gap in production and thus produce the necessary cash flow to finance the new projects, but the models available to us were either not wanted or wholly unsuitable. As has been pointed out, the Army did not want the W30 even as a gift. However, we supported the company strongly in relation to overseas sales at all levels and especially in relation to India.

The role of Government as sponsor and purchaser is extremely important and extremely delicate. Government must be even handed and I believe that in this case the Government must state clearly what their procurement policy is likely to be and their views with regard to international relationships. The letter from my right hon. Friend the Prime Minister to Sir John Cuckney spelled that out. In my view, however, the Government cannot say to shareholders, "The national interest is this, so we want you to forgo what is in your best interests." Government cannot do that in a takeover situation and they cannot do it in this situation. It is for the board to fulfil its legal responsibility to run the company having regard to the interests of the shareholders and of the employees. My private Member's Bill imposing the obligation to have regard to the interests of employees was thrown out by the Labour Government but that requirement is now law. Boards have to run companies with that in mind and that is what the Westland board has been doing.

I cannot say whether the Westland board is right or wrong, but I believe that it has a better chance of being right than the large number of people who sit on the sidelines and comment from partial knowledge. It is paramount that the shareholders make the right decision when they eventually vote and one must be concerned that their judgment should not be clouded by the political smokescreen that has arisen about certain very important matters. One must be concerned, too, that the Opposition, especially, have regarded this as an opportunity to damage the Government but may well merely damage the prospects of the company.

Mr. Dalyell: On a point of order, Mr Deputy Speaker. Can the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry confirm or deny the report on the 7 o'clock news that it was a senior official from the Department of Trade and Industry who leaked the letter from the Law Officers' Department?

Mr. Deputy Speaker (Mr. Harold Walker): Perhaps the right hon. and learned Gentleman will seek to catch my eye later in the evening.

7.29 pm

Mr. Paddy Ashdown (Yeovil): I commence by declaring an interest—I have shares in Westland plc. For fear that people may think that I hold such a large amount that it will sway my judgment, may I explain that, even at their present elevated price, they are worth less than £10. I bought the shares in 1976 in order to attend the annual general meetings of the company and I will be there on Friday.

If the Government are reaping the whirlwind over the Westland affair, that, frankly, is no more than they deserve. Over the past 15 months, I and other hon. Members from all parties have repeatedly warned the Government of the impending crisis at Westland helicopters. We were joined in this by the trade unions, to which I pay tribute, and the members of the work force. My right hon. Friend the Member for Tweeddale, Ettrick and Lauderdale (Mr. Steel) mentioned that in detail in his speech.

On 8 July 1985, I initiated an Adjournment debate in which I was supported by Conservative and Labour Members. We received scant reply from the Minister for Information Technology, and indeed the Prime Minister referred to this in her speech. This is not the first time that the Government have totally failed to see a major crisis in the making, despite ample warning. I understand that the Prime Minister is reported—contrary to the tone of her speech from which one would assume that Westland has occupied her every waking moment for the past five or six months—in last Sunday's newspapers as complaining at a recent Cabinet meeting that members of the Cabinet had spent three hours discussing an "insignificant little company in the South West".

The Prime Minis .. is reported as saying:

"What is the world coming to".

The world has swiftly descended around her ears.

It will be remembered that the Prime Minister showed an equivalent disregard for warnings she had received over the apparently insignificant little islands in the south Atlantic some years ago. The word being leaked by the Government is that the judgment of the former Secretary of State for Defence can no longer be trusted. I think we are entitled to be concerned about the judgment of the Prime Minister in failing to identify the importance of these matters and to take action to prevent them from damaging British interests.

I listened with great care and with admiration to the speech of the former Secretary of State for Defence. Everyone present will remember that speech as a parliamentary occasion until their dying day. The speech was delivered with great sincerity and with considerable ability. I believe that the reasons given by the right hon. Member for Henley (Mr. Heseltine) for resignation were powerfully expressed and could not fail to find sympathy with every hon. Member who heard them. Those matters will go on rumbling.

The point at which I part company with the right hon. Member for Henley is over some of the details that he provided of his part in the Westland affair. I must say that I was disappointed that, throughout his speech, although I made interventions to him on three occasions——

Mr. Gerald Howarth: And I did.

Mr. Ashdown —and although he accepted interventions from all other places in the House, he refused, for reasons of time. I note now that he is not in his place to hear what I have to say as the constituency Member. I find that quite remarkable. One or two people will draw the conclusion from this that some of the facts which the right hon. Gentleman related concerning Westland are shaky, to say the least.

May I put the record straight concerning the view of Yeovil on the Westland affair? Westland first approached the former Secretary of State for Defence in October 1984 — not, as the right hon. Gentleman said, last year. Westland mentioned the possibility of collaboration with the Europeans, but the right hon. Gentleman declined to show any interest. After Sir John Cuckney took over the company in July, he also approached the right hon. Gentleman about the company's problems. He was told that Westland was a private firm which should seek a private solution to its problems.

I compare this to the noble sentiments that were stated by the right hon. Gentleman in his speech. There was no suggestion at that time of a desire to intervene to help the company. In fact, the right hon. Gentleman candidly admitted in his speech that one of his suggestions was that the company should not survive at all but pass into receivership. Westland also approached members of the consortium which the former Secretary of State for Defence claims to have set up — in his speech he referred to "my deal"—all of whom, in the summer and autumn of last year, turned their backs on Westland.

GEC and British Aerospace said that they were not interested and privately suggested that they would welcome the company going into receivership so that they could pick up the pieces. The chairman of British Aerospace is even reported to have said that the production line for the new Anglo-Italian helicopter, the EH101, the world-beater that Westland was relying on, should be removed from Yeovil and taken to Brough. How is that for asset stripping? Then the role of those who now seem so eager to join Westland was that of undertaker, not partner. The right hon. Gentleman did absolutely nothing to stop them.

Mr. Stephen Ross: Will my hon. Friend consider what would have happened to Westland's work force of 1,500 on the Isle of Wight if the company had gone into receivership? Would any European or British company be willing to pick up the pieces of Westland Aerospace in the Isle of Wight?

Mr. Ashdown: Indeed not. My hon. Friend has made this point powerfully and capably, and I respect him for having done so.

Westland then approached European aerospace firms for assistance. Again, in every case, they were shown the door. With over-capacity in Europe, all the continental manufacturers, each of which would have been in a similar position to Westland were it not for nationalisation, considered that the easiest way to solve over-capacity was to see Westland go under. This has privately been the primary commercial aim of Aerospatiale for many years. The House is entitled to know, now that European collaboration is so important, why they were not interested six months ago.

Mr. Cash: Will the hon. Gentleman explain whether he has been entirely consistent — he has berated everyone else in Europe and in this House—in his own attitude to Westland, its shareholders and its employees from the beginning?

Mr. Ashdown: I thank the hon. Gentleman for his intervention, but for reasons of time this is the last one that I shall accept. I shall come to his point later.

It was only when Westland had been shown the door by everyone else that it turned to Sikorsky. Let me disabuse the House of some of the propaganda that has been put about concerning Sikorsky. Sikorsky is not, as it has been carefully portrayed, an American bloodsucker waiting to feed off a British firm. That may suit Labour party mythology, but it is at varience with the facts. Sikorsky has been Westland's old and reliable partner for more than 38 years. People in Yeovil trust Sikorsky. The relationship which has stretched over a generation has been warm, even-handed and profitable for both sides. That is why, at a recent meeting, when the two offers were put to the work force, Westland workers voted 1,500 to one in favour of Sikorsky.

I find it odd to hear from the Labour party that somehow or other the workers are being hoodwinked and duped. What a demeaning view of the work force!

Ms. Clare Short (Birmingham, Ladywood): Who said that?

Mr. Austin Mitchell (Great Grimsby) rose——

Mr. Ashdown: I apologise to the hon. Gentleman, but for reasons of time I will not give way. He may study the record tomorrow and he will see that the record backs me up.

The vast majority of the small shareholders, in common with the work force, support this deal. It is only the large financial institutions of the City of London which are opposed. It is interesting to note that it is an opinion which the Labour party supports. The shareholders and the work force support this deal because they know that every successful helicopter that Westland has built since the war, with the exception of the Lynx helicopter, has been built under licence from a Sikorsky design. That is precisely what is proposed.

Far from merely resembling a United States kit, Westland has added its expertise to Sikorsky aircraft to make them world beaters. We have used the aircraft and even Sikorsky admits that they are better than its own. They can sell in places where Sikorsky cannot sell.

I am sorry to say that, by contrast, Westland's relationship with Aerospatiale has been very different. It has been strained, difficult and infected with perfidy. Only when it became apparent that, because of interest shown by Sikorsky, Westland would not go to the receiver, as many hoped, the ex-Secretary of State for Defence and his present partners decided to act.

A report in today's Financial Times shows that the ex-Secretary of State's chief official, Sir Clive Whitmore, did not even approach British Aerospace or GEC until a mere seven weeks ago in late November. It is no surprise that we believe that the ex-Secretary of State's consortium is hastily cobbled together and ill-founded. Nor is it without significance that each member of the consortium, which the ex-Secretary of State is lobbying so hard to force down Westland's throat, a few short months ago expressed their preference that the company should go into receivership. Is it any wonder that a constituent recently told me that they feel that they are being offered a poisoned cup from the hand of the poisoner himself?

The right hon. Member for Henley expressed the view, which also is supported by the Labour party, that Sikorsky is about to own Westlands. Quite the contrary—it will own less than 20 per cent. In terms of finance and work, there is little to chose between the two offers. A recent parliamentary answer to me revealed that the six Sea Kings which are so tantalisingly dangled before Westland's eyes by the ex-Secretary of State if his consortium's proposals are accepted will come to Westland whichever offer it chooses. That offer reduces by 300,000 hours the work offered by the European consortium.

Even if the offers were equal in quantity, they are not equal in quality. Contrary to the propaganda that is being put about, the Sikorsky-Fiat offer gives more high technology, not less, and provides work in the late 1980s when Westland needs it, not in the early 1990s when it does not. It offers as a partner a firm that Westland has worked with for 37 years, not those who so recently said that they would like the firm to go into the hands of the receiver.

Perhaps most important of all is the fact that the offer gives Westland two firms to deal with rather than five and one new director on the board, not four. The ex-Secretary of State's proposals would mean Westland having three representatives of foreign Governments because every other European manufacturer is nationalised. It would put on Westland's board directors who represent its chief competitors. Westland is competing against the French in India. It is not difficult to imagine what the role of the Aerospatiale director on the Westland board would be.

I am a fervent supporter of European collaboration, especially in defence matters. I have long said that, all other things being equal, I would prefer a European deal. I hope that that answers the hon. Member for Stafford (Mr. Cash). Throughout, I have said that I would keep an open mind, that I thought that Sikorsky had the edge but that I would wait and see what happened. Only last week when matters were finalised did I come down in favour of Sikorsky. All other things being equal, I should have preferred a European deal, but all other things were not equal.

It would be ludicrous to ask Westland to accept any deal simply because it has "Europe" stamped on the outside. Europe is a good thing, but not if the price is increasing the risk to a great firm that has served Britain's defence interests magnificently and to thousands of jobs. The paradox is that the ex-Secretary of State for Defence has hastily cobbled together an inadequately founded deal and has thus damaged the very cause that he would espouse — European collaboration. The ex-Secretary of State claims to have espoused that cause as a matter of principle. He told us that all that he has done has been done as a matter of principle. I have to tell him that we in Yeovil see things somewhat differently. We cannot understand how he can make a principle out of a firm that he was prepared to see go into the hands of the receiver only a few months ago. We do not understand how the man who insists on giving £10 billion to the United States for Trident without British industry getting so much as a look-in should now be concerned about the continuation of a 38-year-old liaison that has profited Britain considerably. We are bewildered that the person who brought cruise missiles to Britain without giving the British people a say in their firing should now be worried about the United States taking over the country. We cannot see how the person who signed a star wars deal with the American President only a few weeks ago to act as a siphon for Britain's real high technology should now be worried about technology leakage from Westland. The ex-Secretary of State might claim all this as a matter of principle, but we see things differently.

It is essential that Westland's problems be resolved as quickly as possible. Further delay must mean greater risk to it. The management must be allowed to get back to running the company in these delicate circumstances and those who work there must be able to get back to their jobs. The Government must ultimately recognise that, because of their ineptitude — the ex-Secretary of State plays a part in this — the future of a great company that has served Britain magnificently and the security of thousands of jobs and the prosperity of my area is now in the hands of manipulators in the City of London and politicians whose concerns include their reputations rather than exclusively what is good for Westland.

When this ridiculous farrago, this circus, has moved on, and Westland is merely a mark in the political history books, we shall have to get on with the job of earning our living and serving Britain's defence interests by making the best helicopters. We will expect the Government to provide the support that they have so signally failed to provide throughout this sorry saga.

Mr. Jerry Wiggin (Weston-super-Mare): The House knows that I share a deep interest in the employees of Westland helicopters — 1,400 of them work in my constituency. The next biggest employer employs half that number. The company's future is therefore a matter of great concern to me and my constituents. The wealth that Westland puts into Weston-super-Mare is crucial to its economy.

I also want to express the anxiety that is felt by my constituents and those of the hon. Member for Yeovil (Mr. Ashdown). I am not convinced that some of that anxiety is as serious as is made out by some union leaders for their own purposes. In July, it looked as though the company was going into receivership, but it now has a good hand with two bids on the table.

The hon. Member for Yeovil is right to draw attention to why the management and work force feel comfortable with Sikorsky. As engineers, they have had a very good relationship with the company. They have found its designs good, although improvable, for a long time. With Aerospatiale, however, Westland has experienced the difficulties that were also experienced in the joint project to build Concorde, with three helicopters. The French are not easy people to deal with and their method of doing business is alien to our people. In both cases, however, substantial——

Mr. John Smith (Monklands, East): Concorde.

Mr. Wiggin: I remind the right hon. and learned Gentleman that I came to the House when Concorde was being built. There was a daily flight of engineers and technicians between Filton and Toulouse to deal with that project. The stories about differences of opinion were multitude. I do not want to exaggerate that; I simply make the point to explain the lack of enthusiasm within Westland for a European consortium.

In every conversation that I have with my constituents on the subject, the importance of urgency is raised. They believe that for peace of mind, for the credibility of the company and, very importantly, for the planning of the future work promised by both consortia there should be an urgent decision to resolve uncertainty. Nothing is as unsettling as uncertainty.

How did we get into this mess? As early as 1982, it was clear that there was a gap in the military procurement of helicopters by the Ministry of Defence from Westland. In an open and discussed manoeuvre, Westland went into the civilian market just before the over-capacity of helicopter production worldwide and the collapse in the oil price led to a catastrophic diminution in the market. I do not exempt the unions from blame. The productivity of Westland factories has not been as good as it should have been. Indeed, in Weston-super-Mare there was a disastrous strike not so many months ago.

Everyone, including the Government, has to accept some of the blame. The Government made a serious misjudgment in not appreciating the deep national interest that people have in the country's single helicopter manufacturer. Small though the company may be, it has managed to run up large liabilities. The concept that receivership would in some way solve the problems of Westland is mind-boggling. I was sorry to hear my right hon. Friend the former Secretary of State say that he seriously considered that option. It would have been damaging to the name of Westland. It took Rolls-Royce years to recover from what happened in 1972. It was ridiculous to contemplate that option for Westland.

Sir John Cuckney was told by the Government to solve his own problems. When he came back with Sikorsky in tow, the European helicopter manufacturers took fright. It was that more than anything else that enabled the European consortium to be put together.

I am sorry that my right hon. Friend the Member for Henley (Mr. Heseltine) resigned from the Ministry of Defence. I had the privilege of working for him for a few weeks. I believe that he started to breach many of the impenetrable barriers that had been left by Secretary of State after Secretary of State. The creation of a central staff, which I considered to be one of the greatest achievements of his period of office, will be to the benefit of that Department for many years.

The industrial might of the United States leads one inevitably to the conclusion that any item of armaments can be bought more cheaply across the Atlantic. I remember seeing more Chinooks on one airfield than we have in the whole Royal Air Force. I remember seeing on one airfield a line-up of fighters that contained twice as many as we have in our Air Force. It is such capacity that makes every item, from a simple bullet to the most sophisticated aircraft, cheaper across the Atlantic. That is what the Ministry of Defence must resist. I hope my hon. Friend the Minister of State is listening, because he and I have recently fallen out on the very point of price and whether it is better to buy cheaply across the Atlantic or to support our own industry.

On the other hand, one has to accept that, if the united states of Europe, which is what I believed I was voting for when I supported our entry into the EEC, is to mean anything, it must be able to produce helicopters. So the concept of an international consortium based within Europe to manufacture helicopters must be right. The Falklands war taught us many lessons. We must have within the shores of the United Kingdom basic indigenous suppliers of armaments materials. Could we have obtained the very quick assistance that was given at Yeovil and Weston-super-Mare during the Falklands war if parts had had to come from the United States? Would the United States have felt able politically to assist us in that unforeseen circumstance? Whatever happens, and in whatever partnership, we must maintain our capacity within the United Kingdom.

The basic problem is that we do not have enough helicopters in our armed forces. The sooner we tackle that serious problem the sooner we will get over the difficulty that is facing us today. The United States has 14 helicopters per 1,000 men in the armed services; the United Kingdom has 2·7. The United States has 800 helicopters per division; we have 180.

When I was in the Ministry of Defence, I found it difficult as a layman to persuade the military to consider the movement of men and materials by helicopter. There are 100 good reasons why it cannot be done and the military knew them all. There are 1,000 reasons why it can be done, and they did not know one of them. If a senior military officer is hung up on the movement of infantry in armoured vehicles, he will not allow his staff to argue to the contrary. I should remind the House that the Ministry of Defence is spending just under £500 million on the MCV80. I have long held the view that at least half that money should have gone into helicopters, not for constituency reasons, but because that is how modern battles will be fought. That is what the Americans found in Vietnam and what we found in the Falklands. It will be the same if we are unfortunate enough to be engaged in a war in future.

I am sad that the affairs of Westland have caused such division within the ranks of the Cabinet. One of the greatest evils that affect Government today is the propensity for leakage of documents. How many documents have been leaked already in this unfortunate saga? It is impossible to run a Government or a business unless proper secrecy and confidentiality are observed. When documents are leaked indiscriminately or deliberately there is blood on the carpet and damage all round.

I hope that within the next few days the Government will put their mind to drawing this unhappy affair to a conclusion. If the European consortium means business, it can for a modest sum make a bid for the company and buy out existing interests. If it does not mean business, let is say so and let the Americans get on with it. Between them, let the matter be resolved as soon as possible.

Mr. Willie W. Hamilton (Fife, Central): Anyone who attended the early part of the debate must have noticed the striking contrast between the narrow, low-key speech of the Prime Minister and the statesmanlike speeches of the ex-Secretary of State for Defence and of my right hon. Friend the Member for Cardiff, South and Penarth (Mr. Callaghan). They both saw the great danger which exists not only for this country but for Europe if there is American domination in defence and in the commercial sphere. It is not anti-American, as the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry has asserted, to say that we are entitled to defend our national interests as we see them as strongly as the Americans defend theirs.

By any standards, this has been a devastating week in parliamentary politics. It has been strewn with nuggets of gold for students of the British constitution. It has echoed with accusations from all sides of bad faith, retractions, character assassination, half-truths and downright lies. As if that were not enough, there has been, as the hon. Member for Weston-super-Mare (Mr. Wiggin) reminded us, a veritable flood of infringements of that sick joke, the Official Secrets Act 1911, by a succession of Ministers, ex-Ministers and others.

In all this furore it seems that the least important matter at issue is the future of Westland. I have no reason for going into that and, indeed, I am not capable of making an educated assessment of the company's position. However, that is rather disturbing, or should be, for a Government who claim to be patriotic. A decision is being made by the unseemly scramble of unknown and faceless men and women for shares in the City. Does anyone really think that that scramble is being motivated by a defence of the national interest? Is it merely an example of squalid greed that is motivating those concerned?

A Conservative Member said yesterday that, if a vital defence concern is implicated, the Government cannot stand back and say, "Leave this to a group of shareholders of whatever size the company might be." Whatever the future of Westland, and long after that is decided, the political and constitutional consequences will be enduring and dramatic, not least for the future of the Prime Minister.

The right hon. Lady's speech this afternoon was deliberately low-key and irrelevant to the issues that we are debating. She, above all Ministers and ex-Ministers, comes out of the shambles with the most egg on her face. From the outset, her fumbling and deviousness have allowed a relatively minor pimple to grow into an angry and ugly boil, which finally burst with the Cabinet walkout last Thursday of her Secretary of State for Defence.

The former Secretary of State for Defence was clearly fed up. The Cabinet meeting last Thursday was the climax of a general disillusionment with the way in which the Prime Minister runs the Government. Since 1979, the right hon. Lady has shown a ruthless penchant for kicking out of office a gaggle of Ministers who have dared to disagree with her. Never until now has she had one who has had the guts and the courage to walk out on her. That is the crux of the constitutional issue that is now before the House.

Unlike the rest, the right hon. Gentleman does not intend to go quietly. We shall encourage him to follow the course on which he has embarked. The right hon. Gentleman has gone with an extremely big bang. My right hon. and hon. Friends and I do not regard him as any sort of martyr, but having listened to him this afternoon and to the Prime Minister, any objective observer and listener must be convinced that he was telling the truth rather than the Prime Minister.

Almost immediately after the right hon. Gentleman had walked out of the Cabinet meeting, he became the villain of the piece. He had been the favourite of Tory party conferences and the favourite within the Cabinet. He was the favourite at the 1983 general election to attack the CND. Immediately after he walked out, there was initiated a carefully orchestrated process of character assassination by No. 10. That was not initiated by the Prime Minister.

[Mr. Willie W. Hamilton]

The right hon. Lady delegated the task to other Ministers who are prepared to tow the line, not least her mincing lackey, the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry. By God, what a pathetic figure he is! Most of the charges that he made have been renounced by successive Ministers, including the Foreign Secretary, the Home Secretary, the chairman of the Tory party, the Chancellor of the Exchequer, the Law Officers and various loud-trumpeting Tory Back Benchers. Over the past week liars and dissemblers have been strewn around like dossers at midnight underneath Waterloo bridge.

The Government, who presume to be an Administration of law and order, have engaged in more infringements of the Official Secrets Act in the past week than have taken place previously over the past decade. The former Secretary of State for Defence may be included. There is the Solicitor-General and a person un-named, and my hon. Friend the Member for Linlithgow (Mr. Dalyell) probably has the name of that person by now. The list includes the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry. I wonder how many prosecutions will result as a direct consequence of the infringements.

We know that Mr. Ponting and Sarah Tisdall were prosecuted, but we shall see whether that is the fate of the Solicitor-General, the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry and of the right hon. Member for Henley (Mr. Heseltine). I forecast that there will not be one prosecution as a direct result of the revelations. The unvarnished truth of this squalid story must be exposed in the national interest. I hope that the Government will give unequivocal undertakings that all papers will be available to any committee which seeks to investigate this matter and that all Ministers will give an unequivocal undertaking that they will give oral evidence to any such committee. If they are searchers after the truth, as they try to convince us they are, nothing less will suffice.

When the future of Westland is decided, whichever way it goes—I hope that it goes the European way—the constitutional issues will remain. They will plague the Government until the truth, the whole truth and nothing but the truth, is disclosed.

8.7 pm

Mr. John Wilkinson (Ruislip-Northwood): After today's debate, there may be as many different views on why my right hon. Friend the Member for Henley (Mr. Heseltine), the former Secretary of State for Defence, resigned as there are Members who heard him speak this afternoon. I have my own opinion, for what it is worth, and I shall share it with the House. To be candid, I think that my right hon. Friend was rumbled. I found his stewardship of the Ministry of Defence deficient in terms of a helicopter strategy. Many of us were warning the Ministry for many a long month of that deficiency. The aviation committee, of which I was the then chairman, visited Westland at Yeovil in November 1984, and ever since that date it was warning the Ministry, and especially my right hon. Friend, that something urgent had to be done about Westland if the company was to be saved.

My right hon. Friend rationalised his resignation. He did so with the invocation of grandiose ideas about the European-American relationship, the two-way, or, as he would describe it, the one-way street, and the difficulty which our manufacturers face in selling their products into the American market. As so often with my right hon. Friend, he overstated his case. He suggested, for example, that it was virtually impossible to sell into the American market and yet Normalair Garrett, which is an important part of Westland, has a significant system in the Rockwell B1 supersonic bomber. It has another system on the F18 fighter aircraft. Normalair Garrett is a 50-50 company, half Garrett and half Westland, half American and half British. So the fact that that section of Westland has been in part American has in no way detracted—rather the contrary—from its ability to sell into the American market.

Furthermore, one of the great difficulties that Aerospatiale, the big white hope of my right hon. Friend the former Secretary of State for Defence, has faced in selling its products into the United States has been its lack of an American partner to assist it in that process. One of the causes of the substantial losses incurred by Aerospatiale in its helicopter division has been its failure to sell helicopters, particularly the Dauphin, into the United States of America.

It is my belief that the relationship with Sikorsky, if endorsed by the shareholders on Friday, will enable the Westland company to sell the EH101 into the United States market. It would not have such a good chance of doing so were the Sikorsky-Fiat rescue package to be turned down. I say that because Sikorsky does not have an aeroplane in the 15-tonne class, the EH101 class, so it looks to the acquisition of the possibility of helping to sell the EH101 in the USA as something significant.

My right hon. Friend also adduced all sorts of grandiose arguments about burden-sharing. Here, too, his arguments were deficient because if burden-sharing means anything to me—and I wrote a paper for the Western European Union on this subject only two years ago—it means an equitable sharing of the financial burdens of defence.

Mr. Peter Hardy (Wentworth): The hon. Member is quite right to remind the House that he wrote a report for the WEU two years ago, but he will recall that on 5 December he presented a report on the European fighter aircraft. It seems to me—and the hon. Member will recall that I spoke in the debate and supported his paper, which also had the support of Opposition Members—that the basis of his argument as recently as last month was that we had to co-operate in Europe, as with the European fighter aircraft that he has so consistently supported.

Mr. Wilkinson: I am grateful to the hon. Gentleman, who leads the Labour delegation with distinction, but I shall show him that there is no mutual incompatability between these two propositions. If burden-sharing is to mean anything, we have to put our money behind our strong sentiments in favour of the Alliance, and this my right hon. Friend was signally unable to do. If he had been able to put money forward for some short-term helicopter procurement, while a longer-term rescue package was put into place, the position of the Westland company would not have become so critical.

In particular, he could have ordered some more commando versions of Sea King for the Royal Marines to replace their existing Wessex; he could have ordered more Sea Kings to replace the existing Wessex for the Royal Air Force for air-sea rescue; he could have retained the Wessex thus freed for service with the Royal Auxiliary Air Force in the light support role; he could have given a clear confirmation that the Royal Navy would actually order the EH101—an order has not yet been placed for that aeroplane. To have done so would perhaps have facilitated borrowing from the banks for Westland.

He could also have concerted a requirement with the Italian army for the mark 2 version of the Agusta 129. This he failed to do. Last, but not least, the Royal Navy could have procured the hovercraft, if only in an experimental role, for mine-hunting. My hon. Friend the Member for Leeds, North-West (Dr. Hampson) laughs, but it has considerable merit for minesweeping in inshore waters.

Sir Kenneth Lewis (Stamford and Spalding): I do not dispute what my hon. Friend says because he speaks from a knowledge of these things, but I would like to ask him whether finance might not have been a difficulty for the Ministry of Defence when it came to ordering a large increase in its hardware at a time when the Treasury was bearing down heavily on its budget.

Mr. Wilkinson: It certainly was a difficulty but the difficulty at that stage was not a lack of funding because of the Treasury. That will happen. The former Secretary of State for Defence continues to insist that there will be no need for a defence review when we know that there will have to be a defence review because of the relative-price effect, whereby the cost of weapons goes up faster than inflation.

The point that I would like to make is that the overspending on the Nimrod mark 3 programme was so severe that it impinged adversely on the budget for the procurement of aircraft. This was the main reason for the inability of the services to acquire helicopters and, above all, the inability of the services to fulfil air staff target 404 for a light support helicopter to be flown by the Royal Air Force in support of the Army.

The Army has identified the need for such an aeroplane since the early 1970s. The actual air staff target was not written until 1978. The target for a 13-seat aeroplane was written round the Black Hawk because at that time it was the only aeroplane that could fulfil the role because the military version of, the W30, was not developed. Yet, because of the funding problems that I have mentioned, AST 404 fell by the wayside—and more is the pity as far as Westland is concerned.

I believe that this judgment is inherently correct, that there will be a need for such an aeroplane and that this need of our armed forces will have to be fulfilled.

Dr. Keith Hampson (Leeds, North-West): Will my hon. Friend give way?

Mr. Wilkinson: No, I am trying to reply to the hon. Gentleman. He referred to my report on the European fighter aircraft. I was going on to say that the former Secretary of State for Defence, was wrong to suggest that Government should always lead the collaborative process and that, unless that happened, collaboration was bound to fail. There are many instances where successful collaboration is industry-led. The hon. Gentleman will remember the 1981 seminar in Lancaster house, under the auspices of the WEU, on aeronautical consortia in Europe, for which I was general rapporteur. There was the STAR communications satellite consortium, the MESH consortium in space business, the Euromissile Dynamics Group. These consortia, industry-based, prove that in many instances there are good industrial grounds for collaboration. As my right hon. Friend the former Minister of State for Defence Procurement, the Member for Bosworth (Sir A. Butler), said in an excellent speech, from all his experience that, in his judgment of Government, is the case.

Dr. Hampson rose——

Mr. Wilkinson: May I please finish the argument? I think that my hon. Friend has only just come in and I am trying to make an important point.

My right hon. Friend the former Secretary of State for Defence tried throughout the summer to reconcile the irreconcilable by trying to get the French into the European fighter aircraft project. That we all knew to be impossible because there were essentially two requirements. The French air force requirement, which is optimised for air-to-ground, is different from that of the other four air forces, which is essentially optimised for the air-to-air role. Nevertheless, my right hon. Friend insisted on spending time and nervous energy on this problem. Eventually the Germans called the French bluff, the Luftwaffe insisted that its operational requirements must be met in full. To his credit, the German Defence Minister, Manfred Wörner, who is a good friend of mine, stuck by the German air staff's decision and the former Secretary of State for Defence had to accept the reality.

Dr. Hampson: Will my hon. Friend give way?

Mr. Wilkinson: No. Please let me finish my sentence.

The other side to this was that so much time had been expended over EFA on the part of the former Secretary of State for Defence, when it was quite clear that the PANAVIA structure was the right one and should be built upon, that he failed to spend sufficient time on the problems of Westland.

Dr. Hampson: Will my hon. Friend give way, because this is a monstrous, grotesque distortion of the truth?

Mr. Wilkinson: I give way.

Dr. Hampson: My hon. Friend well knows that my right hon. Friend the former Secretary of State for Defence spent all that time convincing all the Europeans of his and this country's total commitment to European collaboration. That was fundamental to having the Germans on our side so that they would not go with the French. I was a party to the lobbying efforts by officers of the Committee. As my hon. Friend well knows, we were trying to get the Ministry of Defence to buy the W30 rather than this extraordinary package, which my hon. Friend has now conceived out of his own expertise. He knows full well that the problems faced in getting the air staff target accepted had nothing to do with my right hon. Friend the former Secretary of State for Defence. There were long-standing problems concerning the financing of, for example, Nimrod and the Army's attitude which preceded the period in office of my right hon. Friend, for whom my hon. Friend the Member for Ruislip-Northwood (Mr. Wilkinson) used to work.

Mr. Wilkinson: I regret allowing that intemperate intervention by my hon. Friend the Member for Leeds, North-West. I worked with the project management team on the prototype of the Jaguar. I have been associated with the Tornado. I believe that European industries have worked well together for a much longer period than my hon. Friend the Member for Leeds, North-West has had experience in these matters. I shall leave it at that.

The trouble is that my right hon. Friend the former Secretary of State for Defence did not put concrete proposals on how work would be provided to fill the hole in Westland's order book. All the projects in the so-called European package are paper aeroplanes for the 1990s. My right hon. Friend said that somehow we shall "merge" —whatever that means—the PAH2 of the French and Germans with the Agusta 129 of the Italians. The general staffs of the French and Germans have found it hard enough to concert their requirements around that single aeroplane. The British and the Italian armies have not agreed the specification of the joint aeroplane, so I do not know how that merger will take place. It does not provide work for Westland. The NH90 is also a paper aeroplane, in which five partners are involved. It is a nine-tonne aircraft with a configuration similar to that of the Black Hawk. It will come into service in the late 1990s. The Black Hawk is available and, with the new Franco-British RTM322 engine, which will operate shortly, its lift capability will be augmented by 25 per cent. That cost-effective option for our armed forces will sell exceedingly well on export markets, for which Westland's sale territories have already been designated. The EH101 is not incompatible with the existing Sikorsky programmes.

I regret to admit that I think that my right hon. Friend the former Secretary of State for Defence was rumbled. It was only when Sir John Cuckney had a rescue package in place that Mr. Levene, the national armaments director, was told to meet his European counterparts——

Dr. Hampson: It was not Levene. My hon. Friend has an obsession with Levene.

Mr. Wilkinson: I do not have an obsession with Mr. Levene. That was when Mr. Levene was told to come up with an alternative strategy. That strategy does not provide the work needed. If implemented, it will be detrimental to the competition needed in the defence procurement business to secure the most cost-effective equipment for our armed forces.

8.23 pm

Mr. David Winnick (Walsall, North): Clearly, if there had been no interest in the two groups that have bid for Westland, the Government would have been quite willing to let Westland go to the wall. The Prime Minister made that position clear this afternoon. That point should not be overlooked by the work force in Yeovil or those employed by other firms dependent upon Westland. Many other firms—not least in the west midlands—have collapsed because of Government policy during the past six years.

Like my colleagues, I listened with much interest to the right hon. Member for Henley (Mr. Heseltine) when he spoke of the need for a substantial industrial base in Britain. How right he was. That industrial base has been constantly undermined and eroded by the policies of the Government of which the right hon. Gentleman was a member. He must take some responsibility for what has been happening in industry since 1979.

As for the exchange of letters between the chairman of British Aerospace and the Prime Minister, one can see that there is a considerable difference between the accounts of the meeting held on 8 January. The only point on which the two sides seem to have agreed was that there was a meeting on that date. This matter must be pursued.

Paragraphs 6 and 7 are the crucial points in the chairman's letter to the Prime Minister referring to the meeting on Wednesday with the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry. On 13 January the Press Association's news agency quoted a source close to the board, who said:

"I was astonished to receive a phone call on Wednesday night from an equally astonished and somewhat shaken chief executive saying that he had been subjected to a naked threat in Mr. Brittan's office."

He said that he

"felt so strongly about the manner in which the threat had been made that he felt he had to report it to his board that night."

I wish to ask this question, especially because the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry is in his place—why should the chief executive of British Aerospace say that he was told by the Secretary of State that the company's actions were not in the national interest and that it should withdraw from the European consortium unless that were true? What would be the chief executive's motives in going to his chairman and making up a story? Does the chief executive bear a grudge, or is he conducting a vendetta against the Secretary of State? Is it suggested that the chief executive is in the pocket or the pay of the right hon. Member for Henley?

If the chief executive of BAe has told the truth, as outlined in the letter from the chairman to the Prime Minister, the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry has clearly not been doing so. One thing is certain—both cannot be right. The accounts differ substantially. We must therefore conclude that, if the chief executive is right, the Secretary of State has not been telling the House the truth.

The Secretary of State for Trade and Industry must realise that this matter will not go away. Despite the forthcoming vote, which obviously will show a substantial Government majority, most of the right hon. and learned Gentleman's colleagues believe that he should go.

The London Standard tonight quotes the hon. Member for Shipley (Mr. Fox), stating:

"Mr. Marcus Fox, the deputy chairman of the powerful 1922 Committee . . . declared: 'The skids are under Leon.'"

The article continued:

"Mr. Fox said that Mr. Brittan's job was now in serious jeopardy. And he added: 'What we have to get clear is that there are not two standards, one for one Cabinet Minister and another for another.'"

The Minister of State for Defence Procurement (Mr. Norman Lamont): Where is the relevance in this?

Mr. Winnick: The hon. Gentleman should know the relevance of this—we do not believe the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry. We believe, as do the majority of Tory Members, that the right hon. and learned Gentleman should, in duty and honour, resign from his position.

I also want to comment about the way in which the Prime Minister goes about her job. In an effective speech my right hon. Friend the Member for Cardiff, South and Penarth (Mr. Callaghan) spoke about that. What has emerged from all that the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Henley said when he resigned from his position confirms the strong impression of what The Economist last week described as the Prime Minister's "increasingly catankerous leadership". That journal also said,

"Her treatment of senior colleagues has landed her with a needless load of trouble."

It is interesting to note that since the Prime Minister first formed her Administration in 1979, 14 members of the Cabinet have been dismissed, and now the right hon. Member for Henley has resigned. We should not be surprised at that style, because before she went to Downing street the right hon. Lady publicly and frankly stated that if she became Prime Minister she would have no time in the Cabinet for arguments. That is one election promise she has undoubtedly kept.

Cabinet Ministers who hold or have held different views from hers—and there were quite a number of them—were simply removed from office. In the main what the right hon. Lady wanted was a Cabinet of people who were not willing to stand up to her or to argue with her. What we now have is a Cabinet of such people, with the exception of the Secretary of State for Energy who once a year is allowed to make a speech, usually out of London, showing how wet he remains. On the basis that he makes such a speech only once a year, he is allowed to remain in the Cabinet. I am afraid that the rest of the members of the Cabinet know well that if they were to speak out or argue with the right hon. Lady or insist on matters in the way that the right hon. Member for Henley has done, they would be dismissed.

An increasing number of people realise the right hon. Lady's domineering and intolerant attitude and deeply resent it. What we have learnt from the right hon. Member for Henley confirms our strong impression about what has been going on in the Cabinet in the past six years. The attitude of the British people in resenting the Prime Minister's style, attitude and domineering ways will shortly be shown in Fulham and certainly at the next general election.

Mr. Speaker: Before I call the next speaker, I should say that I understand that the Front Benches would like to commence the winding-up speeches at 9 o'clock. A large number of hon. Members still wish to take part in the debate.

8.33 pm

Mr. Alan Haselhurst (Saffron Walden): Before this debate began, I nursed the fear that there was a danger that Westland might become almost incidental to the debate. Fortunately, that has not generally been the case. The hon. Member for Walsall, North (Mr. Winnick) rather fanned the flames of my suspicion once again. At the heart of this debate is the survival of Westland and that must be our first priority. We are concerned with Westland, its expertise and its skilled work force because we should have a helicopter manufacturing capability in this country.

A long-term interest has to be faced as well. The short-term survival of Westland is not the only issue, but surely it is one of the dominant thoughts in our minds at present. As my hon. Friend the Member for Ruislip-Northwood (Mr. Wilkinson) reminded us, it has been a worry for some time. I do not wish to go back into the past as he chose to do, because almost a whole evening could be devoted to what happened in the past. We should address ourselves to the present situation and look at it from the point where the Government became sufficiently worried about what was happening to Westland that they galvanised themselves and decided that they were going to try to ensure that a choice was placed before the shareholders.

It would be churlish of the House not to recognise the efforts of the Government in that respect. I hope that I am not delving into controversy if I say that the Government appeared united in their view that the shareholders should be the final determiners of what was to happen. In my mind, it follows that if the shareholders were to be placed in that situation, some of them at least might find it relevant to think about exactly what view the Government might have about the future of our helicopter capability. The shareholders might have wanted some guidance on the national interest. I do not believe that they could have been left to guess what the national interest might be and they could only look to the Government for some clue about that.

The national interest is not an easy thing to determine. As Sir Raymond Lygo made clear in his conversation with my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry—I am reading from the authorised version—that point was discussed between them. It seems mildly surprising that the Government did not have a more positive view which looked beyond the mere immediate survival of Westland, vital though that is. It seems that there was a defence aspect as to whether or not Westland survived, and in partnership with whom it survived. There might be an aerospace aspect to the matter, bearing in mind our commitment and involvement in developing collaborative ventures in Europe with fixed-wing aeroplanes. We might have a parallel interest in helicopters.

It is certainly inconceivable that the Government do not have a view about whether what happened to Westland would have an effect upon our aerospace dealings, because it is clear from the Civil Service accounts of my right hon. Friend's meeting with Sir Raymond Lygo that the Government are greatly concerned about what our aerospace export potential should be.

Then there is the European aspect. I make no apology to the House for expressing my enthusiasm for collaborative deals with Europe. Where possible, this is a right and necessary priority for the United Kingdom. I do not want to say anything which will impede the rescue of Westland and I am certainly not in any sense anti-American. There is a great deal of aerospace trade traffic between the United States and Europe and that is right and proper.

The British aerospace industry should not have just one single pattern of involvement. It is healthy for customers, be they Governments or private companies throughout the world, that there should be more than one major supplier in the aerospace business. It is healthier for the competitive environment if there can be at least two major players in the aerospace game. I hope that we can get within Europe some counterweight to the American aerospace industry. That hope falls a long way short of obsession, the term used by my hon. Friend the Member for Bosworth (Sir A. Butler).

It is a heavy responsibility for anyone speaking in the debate to try to guess what the Westland board in this anxious time will decide to do. It is easy to point the finger of scorn at either of the deals on offer. One can make fun of what Sikorsky might wish to do in future when it has its grip tightened upon Westland. It is equally possible to make fun of Aerospatiale and say that it too is hoping that in the end there will be damage to Britain. We are trying to pursue collaborative deals in Europe in the aerospace business with fixed-wing aircraft, and when we are doing that it does not sit too easily to make snide remarks about our partners in those enterprises.

The vehemence of the Westland board against the European consortium has to be taken as significant, even if at the same time it constitutes a most singular aspect of this whole affair. I am worried that there is now a tainted atmosphere which might yet have a damaging effect on Britain's overall position in future aerospace business. I hope that that is not so. At the end of the day we can only try to determine what we believe Britain's national interest to be. Each of us in this House can only make his own interpretation of that, but blending short and long-term considerations it seems to be a pity that the opportunity to try to take one closer step towards integration of the European aerospace interests has not yet been grasped. I hope that we shall not rue that day.

8.39 pm

Mr. Gavin Strang (Edinburgh, East): The hon. Member for Saffron Walden (Mr. Haselhurst) said that at the heart of this debate was the future of Westland. Opposition Members are truly committed to the future of Westland, but at the heart of this debate is the motion and the amendment. The motion speaks about the need to secure a truthful record of what has transpired. To some extent, the debate has been inevitably dominated by the speech of the Prime Minister in attempting to answer the serious allegations made by the right hon. Member for Henley (Mr. Heseltine) in his resignation statement and also the further serious allegations made by the right hon. Gentleman.

I wish to concentrate on the role of the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry, because he is still a member of the Government. There are two matters to which I wish to refer. The first is what he said, on behalf of the Government, to British Aerospace. When that point was raised by my right hon. and learned Friend the Member for Monklands, East (Mr. Smith), the Secretary of State replied:

> "Let me make it clear that it is untrue to say that in the course of the meeting I made any suggestion that British Aerospace should withdraw from the European consortium or that its participation was contrary to the national interest."

When I put it to him that the House was not satisfied with his reply, he said:

> "The account that I have given of the meeting is accurate. I do not think that to warn people of the consequences of pursuing matters in a particular way, which they had accepted, and of which they had had word from their subsidiary—I am not accusing a particular person, but certain things had been said involving anti-Americanism which were likely to damage their interests—is the same as expressing a preference for the deal." —[Official Report, 13 January 1986; Vol. 89, c. 782-5.]

The Secretary of State is directly refuted by the letter which Sir Austin Pearce sent to the Prime Minister on behalf of British Aerospace. Sir Austin Pearce says that the Secretary of State said

"that the decision should be left to the shareholders alone".

He also said

"that what we were doing was not in the National Interest" and

"that we should withdraw".

I trust that, even if the Opposition's motion is not carried tonight, the Government's amendment means that the Select Committee on Defence at least — that is not what the Opposition want—will be enabled—no pressure will be put on Conservative members of the Committee to prevent it—to secure a full and open record of what happened.

My second point is more damning. It is that the right hon. and learned Gentleman deliberately misled the House as to whether——

Mr. Speaker: Order. No right hon. Member, or even hon. Member, deliberately misleads the House.

Mr. Strang: The right hon. and learned Gentleman misled the House about the letter. He knew that the Government had received a letter. If we read the Hansard report of Monday's exchanges — which is a most damning document—it is clear that he was anxious to conceal that fact. It is one thing to refuse to answer a question. We are all at liberty to do that. We can say, "I am not prepared to answer that on behalf of the Government". There may be uproar, but at least we know where we stand. One can also give a truthful answer which evades the point. But what one cannot do is deliberately —I withdraw that, Mr. Speaker—to do what he did.

When the right hon. and learned Gentleman was asked by the former Secretary of State for Defence about the letter, the right hon. and learned Gentleman said:

> "I have not received any such letter."

Later, when he was challenged by his hon. Friend the Member for Birmingham, Selly Oak (Mr. Beaumont-Dark), he said:

> "I can only speak for myself."

He was then asked by my hon. Friend the Member for Bolsover (Mr. Skinner)

> "whether the Government had received a letter from"
> (See columns 1215 and 1241.)

Sir Austin Pearce. The right hon. and learned Gentleman replied:

> "If it helps the hon. Gentleman, I am not aware of any letter from Sir Raymond Lygo to anyone else either." —[Official Report, 13 January 1986; Vol. 89, c. 782-6.]

He ducked the question. If that is not deliberate evasion, I do not know what is. We can then see what he said to my hon. Friend the Member for Newcastle upon Tyne, North (Mr. Brown). Having done that, can the right hon. and learned Gentleman then come here at 10 pm and apologise? Is that acceptable? I say that it is unacceptable.

The right hon. and learned Gentleman perhaps did not know what was going to happen at Downing street. No one knows that. Downing street let it be known that a letter had been received, I presume, at about 3.30 pm that Monday afternoon. If that had not been done by Downing street, did the right hon. and learned Gentleman think that it might be possible to keep the matter concealed and for it not to leak from British Aerospace? Did he think that the existence of the letter would not be discovered?

The suspicion is such that the right hon. and learned Gentleman must go. I feel no malice towards him. No one suggests that what he has done is such that his career should be damned for ever more, but if parliamentary democracy means anything, it means that right hon. Gentlemen do not give such answers when they have the type of information that we know he had. The Government must be prepared to face up to this matter. The Secretary of State has to be sacrificed to maintain a principle that is fundamental to parliamentary democracy.

8.44 pm

Mr. Kenneth Warren (Hastings and Rye): I declare an interest as an aeronautical engineer, but I have no part in the present Westland negotiations. I am Chairman of the Select Committee on Trade and Industry. That Committee today decided that next Wednesday it would consider whether it was right and proper for it to examine the Westland problem.

May I draw the attention of the House to the fact that this is a debate about Westland plc. I am worried that the turmoil and trouble at Westland has been diverted into a political issue which prejudices the working lives of many hundreds of Westland's workers, and the tens of thousands of workers in other parts of the aerospace and aero-engine industries which support that company. Westland is not up for grabs. It is not up for sale. It is trying to stay in business. Both sides of the House should try to place Westland once again in the forefront of helicopter design and manufacture, which is where it should be.

Westland is a vital United Kingdom engineering resource. It contains a helicopter technology which is unequalled in western Europe. I am worried that in the discussions which have taken place with Her Majesty's Government no consultations appear to have taken place with those who supply Westland. For every one person working at Westland two others work in the aerospace industry supporting Westland—the Racals, the Ferrantis, the Smiths, the Lucases, the Dowtys and the GECs. None of those people has been consulted. It has been suggested that the company should go up for auction to the highest bidder.

I am sorry that my right hon. Friend the Member for Henley (Mr. Heseltine) is not here, because I am extremely worried by the fact that the man who had some part and interest in the activities of Mr. Clive Ponting clearly breached the Official Secrets Act when he stated what were in Cabinet minutes and what had taken place in Cabinet discussions. I speak as a former chairman of the parliamentary campaign for freedom of information. It is unfair that there should be two standards of official secrets.

Mr. Dick Douglas (Dunfermline, West): As Chairman of the Select Committee, the hon. Gentleman should not be intervening in the debate.

Mr. Warren: I wish to return to the letters—

Mr. Douglas: I have a great respect for the hon. Gentleman. I am a member of the Select Committee on Defence. If his Committee is to undertake or consider an investigation, he is on thin ice when he intervenes in the way that he is doing. That is my considered view.

Mr. Warren: So much for the hon. Gentleman's considered view. I am speaking as a Back Bencher. I believe that the House has freedom of speech and that it is the prerogative of hon. Members on both sides.

I shall continue to speak about freedom of information. I am worried about the letter from the Prime Minister which has today been sent to Sir Austin Pearce, the second paragraph of which states that she understands that Sir Austin Pearce, the chairman of British Aerospace, is not prepared to release a copy of Sir Raymond Lygo's account of the proceedings. That is ridiculous. When the whole of the correspondence has been published, there can be nothing wrong in allowing Sir Raymond to publish his account of the proceedings.

I have known Sir Raymond well for a number of years and I believe that there was a misunderstanding about what was said between him and my right hon. and learned Friend the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry. I recommend that those two gentlemen should get together tonight or at least tomorrow morning to try to resolve the differences in what each thinks the other said. Westland is surely more important than who is right or who is wrong in a political issue.

The next matter about which I should like to talk is anti-Americanism. I am worried that my right hon. Friend the Member for Henley should talk about anti-Americanism, because he negotiated the SDI agreement a little while ago. British Aerospace is using United Technologies to promote its activities in the United States. Good luck to it. Let us consider the other partners in the so-called European consortium. Aerospatiale is under contract to Sikorsky for helicopter work. Messerschmitt-Bolkow-Blohm is part owned by Boeing, which is a competitor of Sikorsky, Aerospatiale and Westland. The simplicity with which people are classified as Europeans or anti-Europeans is unacceptable. Fiat is all right when it is supplying engines for the Tornado but apparently it is not all right when it is trying to help our helicopter industry. Last year, Agusta—a nationalised Italian company—tried to put up money to save Westland. Now it is no longer acceptable because it is on the European side. I am trying to be fair. The over-simplification of the issues that have been put before us has left in doubt the credibility with which my right hon. Friend the Member for Henley (Mr. Helsetine) tackled this problem. I am sorry that I have to say that.

Ten days ago I was invited by Westland to meet its directors and those of Sikorsky and Fiat. I explored with them what is meant by man-hours. I adopted a technical approach because it is not the man-hours that matter but who is the design authority: who gives design leadership in helicopter manufacture and who decides what engines and what systems should be used. The information that I obtained on both that and other occasions when this issue was discussed was that the design authority option is not available to Westland in the case of the European bid but that this option remains available to Westland if it follows the Sikorsky-Fiat route. I hope that they will choose Sikorsky as their partners.

I have received information that there is a bid before the Ministry of Defence for a new sighting system for the Army's helicopters. British Aerospace has put in a commendable bid to update the equipment that they are currently supplying. A Swedish-American-British group called Heliton has also put in a bid. It amounts to approximately the same value, on a fixed price basis, as that which has been put up by British Aerospace—£70 million. For reasons that nobody understands, the Ministry of Defence has said that although it may be a fixed price it will make the price £100 million, thereby wiping out that bid. The only problem is that the Royal Swedish Air Board has said that it is willing to buy between 20 and 30 Westland W30 helicopters and some Sea King helicopters.

In the cause of freedom of information, why has that information not been put before the House? Why has the House not been told the facts about defence contracts and of their value to Westland's resurgence? It is time that the attention of this House was turned to the restoration of Westland as a leading aerospace company and to the maintenance of the technology of its supporting companies. We must not waste the skills of the men and women at Westland. It is time that we looked after these people.

8.53 pm

Mr. Tam Dalyell (Linlithgow): The House will acquit me of being uninterested in Westland per se. I went to Yeovil in mid-November. I was taken round the plant by unions and management. I was also a member of an ASTMS delegation that was most courteously received by the Minister for Trade on the Indian order.

I wish to use the time available to me to return to the speech of my right hon. and learned Friend the Member for Aberavon (Mr. Morris). Since my right hon. and learned Friend made his speech a senior civil servant in the Department of Trade and Industry has been identified, according to the news on Channel 4, by the inquiry as the source of the leak of the Law Officer's letter. This is the letter that I made such a fuss about at 3.30 this afternoon.

If the news report is true—and apparently it is—upon whose instructions was a senior civil servant at the DTI asked to leak a letter from the Law Officers? Are we to believe that an over-zealous senior civil servant took it upon himself to do this? — [HON. MEMBERS: "Why not?"] I have some experience of the Old Bailey. I know what civil servants can go through. If anybody looks at what Clive Ponting went through and how he was treated by some of the Ministers who have spoken today, any civil servant would by very careful not to leak anything without ministerial authority.

My right hon. Friend the Member for Morley and Leeds, South (Mr. Rees) asked a key question. He said:

"Was the correcting letter from the Law Officers to the Secretary of State for Defence seen by the right hon. and learned Gentleman or his Department before it was sent to the Ministry of Defence?"

The Secretary of State for Trade and Industry replied:

"I saw the letter after it was sent."—[Official Report, 13 January 1986; Vol 89, c. 783.]

The question was whether he had been consulted, whether he had been told about the letter and whether he had been given any idea of its contents. Was the answer that was given to my right hon. Friend the whole truth?

Mr. Merlyn Rees (Morley and Leeds, South): That is a matter for the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry. My hon. Friend and I got involved with Mr. Ponting because our view was that he should have been dealt with not under the Official Secrets Act 1911 but by the disciplinary procedures of the Civil Service. I hope that this case will not be dealt with under the Official Secrets Act.

Mr. Dalyell: We need to know whether the answers given to my right hon. Friends the Members for Morley and Leeds, South and for Blaenau Gwent (Mr. Foot), who went back on Monday to this exact point, are the whole truth. Having read that Law Officer's letter, I now understand how reluctant Her Majesty's Government were to place it in the Library of the House of Commons. For a careful lawyer's letter, it contains an extraordinary paragraph. The penultimate paragraph says:

"On the basis of the information contained in the documents to which I have referred, which I emphasise are all that I have seen, the sentence in your letter to Mr. Horne does, in my opinion, contain material inaccuracies in the respects I have mentioned, and I therefore must advise you that you should write again to Mr. Horne correcting the inaccuracies."

What are we to think? Are we to think that on that Saturday the Solicitor-General was suddenly reading The Times and, equally suddenly, without any prompting, he said, "I must write a most serious and damaging letter against one of my senior colleagues"? Is that how the Government work? Is it a likely scenario? I ask my right hon. and hon. Friends to consider whether this bears any relationship to reality.

The paragraph is really saying, "If what you are reported as saying is accurate, then it seems to me that it might not be legal. Are you sure?" It seems to me that the Legal Officers were asking the Secretary of State for Defence whether what he had said was accurate.

There is a great contrast between the full letter and what Mr. Anthony Bevins quite properly, from the point of view of a journalist, wrote in The Times. Mr. Bevins referred to the trumped-up earlier leaks with a partial text of the Solicitor-General's letter. Who was it, and for what reason, who leaked a partial text? That is the question that the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry will have to address when he winds up the debate.

My right hon. Friend the Member for Cardiff, South and Penarth (Mr. Callaghan) raised many questions. I wish to repeat just one of them. I refer to the notes of the meeting on 13 December. Are they as the Prime Minister would have them, or are they as the right hon. Member for Henley (Mr. Heseltine) would have them? If we are told that the notes are difficult to find, I ask my right hon. and hon. Friends whether they have gone the way of the log book of the Conqueror. Is that what has happened to them? In such a situation notes taken by civil servants are sacrosanct. Is there not some condition that notes of Ministers' contributions taken by civil servants may not record things that are against Government policy? Is that not in the guidelines?

Mr. Merlyn Rees: I do not think that civil servants are enjoined not to make a note of things that are against Government policy.

Mr. Dalyell: I have the permission of my right hon. and learned Friend the Member for Aberavon to repeat two of his questions that should be answered tonight. My right hon. and learned Friend the Member for Aberavon asks the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry, pursuant to his reply to the right hon. Member for Morley and Leeds, South on 13 January, whether he or anyone in his Department saw the Solicitor-General's letter in draft or material upon which the letter was based before it was sent and whether he was consulted about the contents of the letter or its sending before it was sent. My right hon. and learned Friend asks the Attorney-General whether he will refer any apparent breach of security involved in the disclosure of the contents of the recent letter from the Solicitor-General to the right hon. Member for Henley to the Director of Public Prosecutions for his consideration and advice as to whether a decision to prosecute under section 2 of the Official Secrets Act 1911 is to be taken. Those questions should be answered between 9.30 and 10 o'clock tonight.

9 pm

Mr. John Smith (Monklands, East): The Prime Minister must now be wishing that she had responded to the call by the Leader of the Opposition on Monday to come to the House and make a statement on behalf of the Administration that she heads to answer the serious questions of public concern that were revealed during the recess and have doubled since Parliament reassembled.

One of the reasons why the right hon. Lady would have been wiser to make a statement is that it would have reinforced her reputation for forthrightness and boldness, which are said to be her leading characteristics. In addition, it would have had the tactical advantage that the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry would not have had to respond on Monday on behalf of the Government. That is where the really damaging series of events start from. When the Leader of the Opposition put the case for an inquiry he reminded us of the considerable history of the matter. The right hon. Member for Henley (Mr. Heseltine) also reminded us of that in his capable account of the way in which the Cabinet and Ministers addressed themselves to those issues.

There are two clear periods in this event. There is the warring period, when the Secretaries of State fought each other not just in the Cabinet Committees but in the columns of the press to the extent, as Sir Austin Pearce pointed out, that Sir Raymond Lygo was told by one Secretary of State what the national interest was and was given an opposite explanation of the nation's interest by another Secretary of State.

Since the resignation of the right hon. Member for Henley, there has been a period of post-resignation depth charges. Those depth charges let loose underneath the ship of Government have shaken the whole fabric to its foundations. It has been a most revealing time because it is not often that the veil of Government is parted and we are privileged to see what happens behind that curtain. It has long been the suspicion, well be[illegible]d the view of the Opposition, that many funny things happen behind the curtains that conceal the inner activities of the Thatcher Government from the nation. That suspicion has been amply justified.

There is a wider concern than the affairs of Westland, although we must be careful not to forget that that is at the heart of the debate.

Mr. Peter Thurnham (Bolton, North-East) rose——

Mr. Smith: There is concern about the way in which the Government have sought to manipulate some aspects of the matter. We know what the previous Secretary of State for Defence has had to put up with. We know how he has been cut down from behind, that he has had to face stories and gossip, and we know the way in which he has been prevented from putting his case. He mentioned a matter today which is of serious public concern, although it is not directly related to the details of the Westland story. He referred to a telephone call made from 10 Downing street to the BBC about a programme in which he was involved.

My next comment is a responsible one and I should like the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry to give a specific answer to it in his reply. I also hope that the Prime Minister will feel obliged to reply to it.

On Sunday 5 January the radio programme "The World this Weekend" set out to cover these matters. In the morning of Sunday 5 January the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry recorded an interview for "The World this Weekend". Later in that morning a telephone call was made from No. 10 Downing street to the producers of the BBC programme informing them that No. 10 was withdrawing permission for the interview to be used. The BBC informed No. 10, greatly to its credit, that it would not co-operate in such—I will start again for the benefit of the Prime Minister who has just arrived because it is important that she hears what I have to say.

On Sunday 5 January, the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry recorded an interview. Later that morning No. 10 called the BBC withdrawing the so-called permission for the interview to be used. The BBC refused to co-operate, but offered the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry a chance to do the interview all over again —one might think an act of considerable generosity in the circumstances.

Meanwhile, down in Oxford, the former Secretary of State for Defence had left his garden for long enough to go into the local studio of the BBC in Oxford, no doubt fitting it carefully in between pre-arranged photocalls with half the world's press who went to visit his garden. Sitting in the studio in Oxford, the Secretary of State for Defence was ready to take part live in that very edition of "The World this Weekend".

I am informed that while the former Secretary of State for Defence was in the studio waiting to start the interview, another telephone call came from No. 10 to the BBC saying that he had no permission to give any interview. I suppose that the very best that can be said about that is that it is even-handed in some respects — both are to be gagged. Neither Secretary of State can be trusted to appear on the same programme.

However, that is not all about manipulation. It is fortunate that the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs has arrived in the Chamber because he may be able to tell us whether it was on his instructions or those of the Prime Minister that the British ambassador in Rome was asked to go to the Italian Government and tell them to stop sending any telegrams to the Secretary of State for Defence for the United Kingdom. If that is true, and there has been no denial of it— the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry is not directly responsible for the Foreign Office but he is replying to the debate on behalf of the Government—we need to know why.

What a curious Government when a British ambassador is sent to tell a foreign Government not to communicate with a member of that very Government. What kind of impression do we create upon our allies? It is bad enough when they do not know which Secretary of State to communicate with because they both have different conceptions of the national interest, but how much worse when our foreign and diplomatic service is used for purposes of personal manipulation by the Prime Minister against her own Government.

Then there is the affair of the Solicitor-General's letter. Those of us who have had the opportunity in the past hour or two of reading that letter will wonder why it was sent at all. A more cavilling document it is hard to find. But, as my hon. Friend the Member for Linlithgow (Mr. Dalyell) and my right hon. and learned Friend the Member for Aberavon (Mr. Morris) said, one of the crucial questions here is how the Solicitor-General came to write the letter in the first place. He starts off:

> "Dear Michael, I saw in the 'The Times' on Saturday the text of a letter you are reported to have sent to the Managing Director of Lloyd's Merchant Bank."

I suppose that there are a number of explanations. He could have been sitting down on Saturday and picked up The Times and said, "Oh my goodness"—remembering all the telegrams that were passing and are all detailed here —"I had better write to my old friend Michael and tell him that he has got things slightly wrong." That would be a very innocent view of the whole matter. As my right hon.

[Mr. Smith]

and learned Friend the Member for Aberavon said, Law Officers usually do not disturb themselves to write letters to anybody unless there is a special inducement or instruction to do so. It has crossed some of our minds that someone in the Government spoke to the Solicitor-General—

Mr. Brittan indicated assent.——

Mr. Smith: Now we know the answer to that point. One mystery has been resolved after only 11 minutes of my speech—the Secretary of State put the Solicitor-General up to it. I quite accept that the Secretary of State might want to consult a Law Officer during these matters. The point is: who asked the Solicitor-General to send that letter to the Secretary of State for Defence? No doubt the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry will tell us precisely what his role was in that matter and how the letter came to be written.

Another matter is the leak of that letter. While the first matter is important, the second is sinister. If it is the case that one Department of this Government deliberately organised a leak to frustrate a Minister in the same Government, that is not only dirty tricks but a habit that is inimical to the practice of good government in this country. An investigation was called for by Opposition Members as soon as the information was revealed, and I understand that that has now taken place.

The rumour is—and I do not know whether it is true—that an official in the Department of Trade and Industry has been identified as the culprit. I hope that the Secretary of State will tell us whether it was on the instruction of any senior official or Minister in his Department that that leak took place. Secondly, if it is true that the leak came from an official in the Department of Trade and Industry, has he or will he recommend to the Law Officers that that person be prosecuted, as has happened previously?

I move directly to some of the more central events of the drama. We have watched, almost as astonished bystanders, as the former Secretary of State for Defence, beginning with his very careful resignation statement, revealed each chapter of this affair. He has spoken in a way that no one has been able to speak for years because he has been at the heart of the Thatcher Government for six and a half years. He speaks as a witness of knowledge and credit because he was entrusted with very high responsibility in a number of different offices of state.

To some extent, Opposition Members have had to watch the drama because we have not been possessors of information. In our system of government, information is uniquely locked within the people who run the Administration at the time. It is only accidentally and by a series of curious events that the veil has been parted.

Those charges will have to be answered by the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry on behalf of the Government. I propose to say little or no more about them other than that the Prime Minister—who must have known what the charges were, although she spoke before the former Secretary of State for Defence—chose to ignore them. The Prime Minister's hope is that this will all go away and that she can turn her back on this affair and get on to something else. I have to tell the Prime Minister that it will not go away. The tactic of refusing to make a statement on Monday led to a full-scale debate on Wednesday. The failure to give answers on Wednesday means that the debate will continue in the House and throughout the country.

I want to discuss the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry's involvement. It is fair that before he replies he knows what the Opposition expect him to answer. I begin with one of the minor matters but on which the former Secretary of State for Defence laid importance. Why does he not agree to publish the documents of 4 and 18 October which, it is said, show that he had a strong preference for the European solution? If he is prohibited from publishing by instruction from the Prime Minister, will he tell us whether it is true that the former Secretary of State is correct in saying that he supported the pro-European solution?

The most important question that the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry must answer is about the so-called British Aerospace affair—the meeting in his Department the day before the Secretary of State for Defence resigned. The right hon. Gentleman knows—he must have known since Monday—the importance of that letter. Looking back, most of us did not realise how truly significant it was. It figures in our deliberations as a result of a question by the former Secretary of State for Defence. I have thought ever since then that if the former Secretary of State for Defence had not asked that question we should still be in ignorance about the existence and content of that letter.

The important question, as the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry knows, is about what transpired at that meeting in two important respects. The Secretary of State was asked on Monday about what he said to Sir Raymond Lygo. The Secretary of State said that there was no truth in the suggestion that he said that British Aerospace was acting against the national interest or that it should withdraw from the European consortium.

There are two pieces of evidence before us. The Prime Minister has chosen to reveal the departmental minute and we have a letter from Sir Austin Pearce. The information is not yet complete because Sir Austin Pearce in his letter says that a full transcript of Sir Raymond's account of proceedings is available. I understand that that was attached to the letter to the Prime Minister. The Secretary of State for Trade and Industry must have read it.

The line is that Sir Austin Pearce objects to that being published. I regret that but I understand that the Government have no objection to it being published because otherwise it would be foolish to refer to it in that way. The sooner that we have the full text of that memorandum the better, in the interests of the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry and of everyone else. It should be published at an early date.

The Secretary of State relies upon the minute to bolster his account of the meeting. The minute is called the official record. In fact, it is the note taken by the Secretary of State's private secretary, to be sent to the private secretary of the Minister of State responsible for the aerospace industry. The deficiencies in the document are serious. First, the minutes are not meant to be a verbatim account of what happens at a meeting. They are meant to be an official record for future action.

Mr. Alfred Dubs (Battersea): Many years ago I was in the Civil Service. I remember being told that notes taken at meetings were to be a creative process. It would be most unusual, if not unheard of, for a civil servant making a note of a meeting to put into his Minister's mouth words which were at variance with the Minister's stated policy.

Mr. Smith: I wondered what instructions had been given to civil servants when I was a Minister. I am sure that my hon. Friend the Member for Battersea (Mr. Dubs) is right and I take account of his experience.

The important point is that the record was not meant to be verbatim. However, the most important difficulty about relying on the record arises from the sequence of events. The controversial meeting took place at 5 o'clock on Thursday 8 January in the office of the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry. The allegation that the Secretary of State said that British Aerospace was acting against the national interest and that it should withdraw from the consortium was contained in the resignation statement on 9 January of the former Secretary of State for Defence, the right hon. Member for Henley. The so-called minute is dated 10 January. It was prepared long after the controversiality of the conversation was known and when the sensitivity of the conversation was well understood.

The letter from Sir Austin Pearce is most important. It is highly relevant and it is fortunate that it has become available. I shall mention some matters that are slightly at the margin, but just as important. Sir Austin Pearce's letter states:

"The meeting took place immediately following a discussion Sir Raymond was having with Mr. Pattie on Airbus Industrie's proposals for a new programme."

The Secretary of State for Trade and Industry said that it would have been "wholly artificial" if he did not see Sir Raymond Lygo, but apparently a message was sent to the meeting that the Secretary of State wished to see him and the Minister of State took Sir Raymond to the Secretary of State's presence.

One aspect that Sir Austin Pearce is worried about is the connection with the Airbus proposals. He states:

"The connection is worrying to say the least."

The chairman of British Aerospace is worried that a connection is being made between Airbus—the future of his company—and the Westland affair. That must cause the Prime Minister deep concern. That is not a matter of credibility, but a matter about the way in which the Government behave and project themselves.

In his letter, Sir Austin Pearce states that,

"Sir Raymond returned directly,"

after the meeting with the Secretary of State,

"to a special Board meeting of British Aerospace which was in progress and made a full report of his conversation to the Board. He also wrote down all the salient points that had been made to him. His report stated that the following points were specifically covered by the Secretary of State."

I shall refer to some of the points. He said that the Secretary of State

"1. expressed a view that as the DTI were our sponsoring Dept we should have consulted with his Dept before we entered the Consortium.

2. . . . whether we had fully considered the effect our actions might have on our American business.

3. his concern at the Consortium leadership role we appeared to be adopting."

The following point is fair to the Secretary of State:

"4. that the decision should be left to the shareholders alone".

Sir Raymond Lygo makes that claim also. The report continues:

"5. That the agreement of the National Armaments Directors had never been endorsed by Government."

The Secretary of State was correct on that point, as history has shown.

"6. that what we were doing was not in the National Interest.

7. that we should withdraw."

That matter could hardly be more clear from the testimony of Sir Raymond Lygo. The Secretary of State muttered that it is not true. If it is not true, what is the Secretary of State's position on Sir Raymond Lygo? He must tell us in his reply. Is he telling us that Sir Raymond Lygo invented the conversation or that he had a brainstorm? Is he telling us that Sir Raymond repeated the conversation in front of the board of British Aerospace and wrote it down at the time because his brains had deserted him suddenly and his imagination had taken over? We know perfectly well that neither Sir Raymond Lygo nor Sir Austin Pearce had the faintest idea that this would be a matter of public argument or that it would figure in debates on the Floor of the House.

If there is any doubt about Sir Raymond Lygo, let me draw attention to the fourth paragraph on page 3 of the letter to the Prime Minister, where Sir Austin Pearce says:

"I have no doubt that Sir Raymond's account of the events so fresh in his memory and recounted to the Board so soon after the event with the assistance of notes made immediately after that meeting was substantially correct and"— this is significant—

"are borne out by much other information that is coming to light. So far we have refused to make any public comment."

That speaks volumes.

I should tell the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry that if anyone would benefit from a committee of inquiry into the matter it is him, because if he is telling the truth, he has nothing to fear from an inquiry that would consider the matter fully and at which he would be given a full opportunity to exonerate himself. He must decide what to do. I make no calls for action by him before an inquiry is constituted, because I do not wish to prejudice the outcome of an inquiry. The Secretary of State should submit himself to the verdict of that inquiry.

The debate is not simply about the political fate of one Secretary of State for Defence or the political future of a Secretary of State for Trade and Industry, let alone a Prime Minister. It is not simply about the contents of this letter, although circumstances force us to consider it carefully. It is not just about the relationship between Government and private industry, although that gives some cause for concern. It is not just about the ultimate destination of the control and ownership of one of Britain's important defence contractors, important though that is. The importance of this debate is that the Westland affair provides us with the clearest possible, most graphically illustrated, most thoroughly documented demonstration of how the Government have sacrificed, and continue to sacrifice, public interest to their ideological obsession with market forces.

In addition, when the Government know that their obsession with market forces collides with the public interest and would be revealed, they engage in a course of deception to keep it concealed from the public eye. That is why, throughout the affair, the Government have shown a public face of even-handedness and of leaving it to the shareholders and the market to decide, but, as each step in the process has revealed, all the while, Ministers—especially the Prime Minister and the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry—have been working to achieve one solution. They have worked to obstruct one solution being put and have promoted another, but they knew that they could not be caught doing that, so they kept up the facade that they were even-handed.

[Mr. Smith]

That is what has led them into this difficulty. That is what puts Ministers into the awkward position of having to decide between observing confidentiality and giving honest answers to the House of Commons. That is why we have had so many meetings of the Cabinet and the Government. Although Governments have many controversial and difficult things to do, the open and clear course is to call a meeting of the Cabinet, allow the two protagonists to put their cases, reach a decision, say that that is Government policy and get on with it. But that has not happened yet. There have been selective meetings of Ministers and manipulation of Cabinet minutes. No. 10 Downing street has practised a course of deception on one of the principal members of the Government. The former Secretary of State for Defence has many genuine complaints about the way in which he was personally treated by the head of the Government.

However, the Government are obsessed with market forces, even when £750 million worth of Ministry of Defence work has gone to that company during the years, and only recently another £40 million was committed. The cost of the public sector orders far exceeds the past or future value of the company. Its share capital is insignificant compared with the size of the public sector orders that are given. Therefore, it is a legitimate matter of public concern and should, from the beginning, have engaged the full attention of Government from the top down. Cases should have been argued — no doubt passionately and carefully—in the national interest and, decisions having been taken, they should have been implemented openly and fearlessly. The opposite has happened and this discreditable Government with their discreditable Prime Minister and discreditable Ministers have finally been found out.

9.30 pm

The Secretary of State for Trade and Industry and President of the Board of Trade (Mr. Leon Brittan): I would like to start by referring once again to the statement that I made on Monday in which I sought to apologise to the House for any misleading impression that I may have given in my statement that afternoon. From some of the comments made during the course of today's debate, it has been suggested that I view the charge of misleading the House as being something less than of the utmost gravity. I assure the right hon. Member for Cardiff, South and Penarth (Mr. Callaghan) that that is most certainly not the case. I welcome the opportunity of reiterating the apology I made on Monday.

Since Monday, permission has been given for the letter from Sir Austin Pearce to be published. That account of the meeting which took place between myself and Sir Raymond Lygo is, of course, substantially different from that given by the minutes taken by my officials and confirmed by my recollection and the recollection of others.

Although a close scrutiny of the document will show that there is great similarity in the accounts, there are material points which are different. [Interruption.] On the two material points in Sir Austin Pearce's letter to which exception has been taken, points 6 and 7 — the suggestion that I told Sir Raymond Lygo that what British Aerospace was doing was not in the national interest and the suggestion that British Aerospace should withdraw from the consortium—I made it quite clear to the House on Monday that I said no such thing.

Ms. Clare Short (Birmingham, Ladywood): Will the right hon. and learned Gentleman give way?

Mr. Brittan: No, I shall not give way. A number of accusations have been made against me and I think that the House would wish me to have the opportunity to reply.

I said no such thing at that meeting and I have made that absolutely clear. Since Monday's debate, I have looked at the records supplied by Sir Austin Pearce and I repeat once again that at no time during that meeting did I say that what British Aerospace was doing was not in the national interest. Nor did I say that British Aerospace should withdraw from the European consortium. I would be perfectly happy to give an account of that meeting to a Select Committee of the House and I have no objections to doing that.

I would tell those hon. Members who would challenge my account of that meeting that fortunately I was not alone at the meeting. There were six people present in that room. Apart from myself, there were three civil servants, including my private secretary. Of course, Sir Raymond Lygo was present, as was my hon. Friend the Minister of State. It is useless for the right hon. and learned Member for Monklands, East (Mr. Smith) to say, in his attempt to deal with these matters, that the practice of the Civil Service is not to record the whole of what we say. We all know perfectly well that that is the practice. Quite apart from what was said in the note which corroborates my account to the House on Monday of what I said, all persons present at that meeting other than Sir Raymond Lygo—that is to say, three senior civil servants who have served Governments of different political persuasions, my hon. Friend the Minister of State and myself — have all confirmed our recollection as well as the note. I repeat that at no stage did I say that what British Aerospace was doing was not in the national interest. Nor did I say that British Aerospace should withdraw from the consortium.

Mr. Winnick: Will the Minister give way?

Mr. Brittan: No, I will give way as often as the right hon. and learned Member for Monklands, East gave way. It is I who am under attack, and I am entitled to defend myself.

Anyone who challenges what I have given as an accurate account of what occurred on that occasion and suggests that I am telling a lie, not to put too fine a point on it, is saying the same about not one but five people, including three distinguished public servants.

With regard to the conflict of recollection, on the matter of the national interest I can understand how Sir Raymond Lygo could have misunderstood what I said. The record of the meeting, which accords with the recollection of all those present other than Sir Raymond Lygo, shows that I said that I believed that it was not in the national interest that the uncertainty about Westland should carry on much longer. I should have thought that that view would commend itself to the House.

If we are talking about probabilities—I do not rest my case on probabilities because I was there and I know what I said, as the right hon. and learned Member for Monklands, East well knows — it would have been absurd for me to say that the participation of British Aerospace was against the national interest and even more absurd for me to say it at that meeting. Sir Austin Pearce correctly recalls that I had a meeting with him on 13 December — a day on which, to put it mildly, the controversy was running pretty hotly because by then the Government's endorsement of the national armaments director's recommendation was due to expire unless an offer was received from the European consortium which was acceptable to the Westland board. Had I believed that the participation of British Aerospace was against the national interest, I had ample opportunity to say so on that occasion. I did not say it then and I did not say it on 8 January. I very much regret that Sir Raymond Lygo had a different understanding, although I note that he is not prepared to have his own account made public. I have no objection to saying to a Select Committee what I have said to the House. Similarly, I have no objection to Sir Raymond Lygo disclosing whatever record he took at the time.

Mr. Dykes: Will my right hon. and learned Friend give way?

Mr. Brittan: I would rather not give way, as I wish to deal with some of the more general matters that have been raised, particularly some of the serious questions about industrial, commercial, economic and European policy.

The Prime Minister has already set out in her speech the policy of the Government and the reasons behind that policy. On occasions such as this, it is natural for opinion between parties and within parties to polarise, and to polarise in opposite directions. The matter is presented as a controversy between a European solution to problems and a transatlantic solution to problems. There is a tendency to polarise the issue as a belief either in an interventionist policy in industry or a hands-off policy in industry. I do not see the issue in such a simple way.

With regard to the contrast between the European and transatlantic solution to problems, I recognise that there is a great deal to be said for an independent European source of industrial activity not only in defence but in other areas. It does not follow, however, that its advantage is supreme in every case. It is a gross over-simplification of a serious issue to pretend to present such a clear-cut choice. With regard to the aircraft industry, and especially fighter aircraft, there is a powerful case for European co-operation. I am happy to pay tribute to my right hon. Friend the former Secretary of State for Defence for the work that he did in helping to bring that about. I part company with my right hon. Friend, as I suspect others will, because, although it is right to have European co-operation on fighter aircraft, it does not necessarily follow that that must be the only solution at which the Government should arrive with regard to helicopters.

There are of course advantages in European co-operation even in the case of helicopters. I am not denigrating that solution. There are disadvantages, however, and one is entitled to draw attention to them —disadvantages from the point of view of competition policy, value for money and choice. One of the more unconvincing passages of my right hon. Friend's speech was where he tried to say that in the European defence arrangements it was still possible—even when there was only one source of defence procurement — to prevent monopolistic pressures and the country paying more than necessary for its defence.

Dr. Hampson rose——

Mr. Brittan: There are advantages and disadvantages in European co-operation over helicopters. It is unrealistic to present, as some uninformed people have done, a caricature of the choice facing a British company which has fallen on hard times as between a European or American solution. It is unrealistic and an over-simplification, because reference has been made by those hon. Gentlemen who have constituency or other personal connections with Westland, such as the hon. Member for Yeovil (Mr. Ashdown) and my hon. Friend the Member for Dorset, West (Mr. Spicer), to the fact that Westland has had, for 38 years, the closest possible connection with Sikorsky. Sikorsky is not a newcomer to Westland. In the successful days of Westland, that success was achieved by building planes initially designed in the United States— such as the Sea King and the Wessex — and then developing them with their expertise for other and specialist markets.

That is the experience of Westland. It is not conclusive —it does not follow from that or from the fact that the work force virtually unanimously favours one solution— [Interruption.] It does not follow that that is the solution or the only solution, but it follows from the account that I have given of the advantages and disadvantages of the European route and of the American route that it is entirely reasonable for the central policy of the Government to be to leave the choice to the company through its shareholders.

Mr. Mark Fisher (Stoke-on-Trent, Central): Will the right hon. and learned Gentleman give way?

Mr. Brittan: No.

That will always be the right policy. When it comes to Government intervention, I am not taking an absolutist stance. I am not taking a stance that there are no circumstances in which it would be right for Government to have a policy or a view about which route was the preferred one. Nor am I saying that there are no circumstances in which it would be right for the Government to intervene financially as well as by expressing a preference.

My view in these matters is that it is perfectly legitimate for a Government to sponsor and assist British industry in certain cases by, for example, giving launch aid of some £250 million for the Airbus, the protection of which launch aid was a perfectly legitimate reason for me to warn Sir Raymond Lygo — [HON. MEMBERS: "Warn?"] — not against being a member of a consortium but of the danger presented to the consortium by talking about the issue in a way which stimulated protectionist attitudes in the United States.

Let me remind the House——

Mr. Dykes: Will my right hon. and learned Friend give way?

Mr. Brittan: No, I shall not give way.

Mr. Dykes rose——

Mr. Speaker: Order. The hon. Gentleman has seen that the Secretary of State is not giving way.

Mr. Brittan: I remind the House that, on this important point, the record of the meeting which, as I understand it, the right hon. and learned Member for Monklands, East was at least good enough not to dispute as being inaccurate but rather challenged as being incomplete makes it quite clear that Sir Raymond Lygo understood——

[Mr. Brittan]

Mr. John Smith: I did not say that.

Mr. Brittan: Sir Raymond Lygo——

Mr. Smith: Can I make this clear?

Mr. Brittan: Yes, certainly.

Mr. Smith: The Secretary of State's recollection is incomplete. I made no such distinction. I drew attention to considerable differences between the two documents. I said that there were deficiencies in it because it was done after the issue became controversial. I am not to be taken as assenting to the proposition that the Secretary of State has pronounced.

Mr. Brittan: The right hon. and learned Gentleman is perfectly well aware that, although indeed the minute was written up on 10 January, the notes from which it was taken were made——

Mr. Fisher rose——

Mr. Straw rose——

Mr. Brittan: I shall not give way. The notes from which it was taken were made contemporaneously and accord fully with the minute of the meeting. The right hon. and learned Gentleman may not find it comfortable to be reminded——

Mr. Dykes: Will my right hon. and learned Friend give way?

Mr. Brittan: No.

Mr. Dykes rose——

Mr. Speaker: Order. The hon. Gentleman has been here long enough to know that if the Secretary of State does not give way he must sit down.

Mr. Brittan: The right hon. and learned Gentleman may find it uncomfortable to be reminded of the point, but it is indeed the case that Sir Raymond returned to the question of anti-American sentiment.

In case anyone thinks that that is a pretext or excuse, let me remind hon. Members of what Sir Raymond Lygo himself said about it. He said that British Aerospace Incorporated, the United States subsidiary of British Aerospace, had expressed great concern about its United States business being harmed. So that was not a fantasy in my mind but a subject of serious concern. The right hon. and learned Gentleman might also like to know that the record of the meeting showed that I responded by saying that I was ready in that case to act immediately in defending British Aerospace's interest.

Those who regard as unreal the prospect of America taking action against British Aerospace should know that it is only within a very recent period that I had to write to the United States trade representative, Mr. Clayton Yeutter, about that very matter. The position of the United States Government is that they do not like the success of the Airbus. [Interruption.] These are serious matters and they are highly material to what was said and done in relation to Westland. The United States Government do not like the fact that the Airbus is doing increasingly well. It is not just that they do not like it; they are actually threatening to take action against it. That action is on the basis of protectionism in the United States. What they say is that the support that we are giving to the Airbus in Europe entitles them to take protectionist action against it.

Mr. Stuart Bell (Middlesbrough) rose——

Mr. Brittan: I am not giving way.

It is to that sort of pressure that one is responding. The anxieties that Sir Raymond Lygo and I share are very real. It is for that reason that I say that we were not as a Government, and I was not as an individual, taking any kind of absolutist position either in relation to Britain and Europe or Britain and America, nor were we taking any absolutist position with regard to intervention in industry.

Mr. D. N. Campbell-Savours (Workington): Tell us about Rome and the ambassador.

Mr. Brittan: My right hon. Friend the former Secretary of State for Defence suggested that on 4 October I indicated that I had a preference for a European solution. Why that should be regarded in the eyes of my right hon. Friend as such a devilish thing to have escapes me, but it so happens that that is not the case. On 4 October I stated that the prospect of a European solution being developed within the time scale did not seem to be good, but I wanted to get a better assessment of those prospects before responding to Westland's proposals for Government underwriting of W30 sales. At that stage the proposition being put forward by Westland in concert with Sikorsky was that, if the reconstruction went through, the Government should underwrite W30 sales. So I recommended that Westland should be encouraged to pursue discussions urgently with European partners. However, I did not express a preference on that occasion for any particular solution that might be developed by Westland. [Interruption.] I believe that I am entitled to deal with the matters which were raised by my right hon. Friend the Member for Henley. I shall not have the agenda for my defence dictated by Opposition Members.

Mr. Fisher rose——

Mr. Brittan: I shall not accept interventions.

Mr. Fisher rose——

Mr. Brittan: The hon. Gentleman cannot seek to intervene all the time on the one hand and expect me to deal with all the matters which have been raised on the other. [HON. MEMBERS: "Give way."] Are Opposition Members being honest in saying that they want to hear my answers or do they want merely to shout me down? The other matter—[Interruption.]

Mr. Speaker: Order. The debate has proceeded in good order so far. Other right hon. and hon. Members have been given a fair and quiet hearing and the House should afford that also to the Secretary of State.

Mr. Brittan: Opposition Members are muttering from a sedentary position that I am not answering the debate. I am answering a point which was made by my right hon. Friend the Member for Henley, the ex-Secretary of State for Defence.

Mr. Fisher rose——

Mr. Ted Leadbitter (Hartlepool): On a point of order, Mr. Speaker. As I understand it, when Ministers reply, they are presumed, as Front Bench spokesmen, to take up the issues which have been raised during the debate. I ask you, Mr. Speaker, whether there is any procedural manner in which you can ask the Secretary of State to respond to the charges made by the right hon. Member for Henley (Mr. Heseltine).

Mr. Speaker: I think that that is exactly what the Secretary of State is doing.

Mr. Brittan: For the convenience of the House, I shall explain what matters I am proposing to deal with in the time left available to me. They are exactly the ones that I had in mind to respond to if I was allowed to proceed uninterrupted. I was going to deal with the meeting of 17 October, with the Foreign Office telegram and with the Law Officer's letter.

I shall deal first with the meeting of 17 October, to which my right hon. Friend the ex-Secretary of State for Defence has drawn attention. At that meeting, Sir John Cuckney referred to what he described as the Government's preference for a European minority shareholder in Westland. I said that a European minority shareholder was in both the commercial and political interests of the Government. However, that was against the background that in the board's view at that time a reconstruction involving Sikorsky seemed likely to require an element of Government underwriting. I therefore urged Sir John, as I had done previously, to explore thoroughly the possibility of a European minority shareholder. What I did not do, and have never done, was to suggest that the Government would make any attempt to influence the eventual decisions of the board or the company's shareholders. I remind the House that at that time Fiat had not joined Sikorsky.

Mr. Heseltine: I think that I heard my right hon. and learned Friend say for the first time that at the meeting of 17 October he indicated that a European minority shareholding was in the commercial and industrial interests of Westland. That, I think, is a preference.

Mr. Brittan: What I said was perfectly simple and straightforward. I said that a European minority shareholder was in both the commercial and political interests of the Government—I shall move on quickly because I know that the House wants to hear about other matters. I said that in the context of a Sikorsky bid, which at that stage seemed likely to require an element of Government underwriting. A European minority shareholder emerged later, and that was Fiat.

When my right hon. Friend the Member for Henley wrote to Lloyds bank on 3 January, the House will recall that he wrote in answer to Mr. Horne, who had written to him that day. The Westland directors noticed that the terms of his letter were in certain respects different from the terms used in the Prime Minister's letter, and raised the matter with the DTI as the sponsoring Department, and there has been no doubt about that. I, in turn, consulted the Law Officer, as I said in an intervention earlier in the debate, who had not been sent a copy of my right hon. Friend's letter of 3 January. The Law Officer subsequently wrote the letter which has been the subject of controversy. I did not see it before it was written and I did not ask him in any way to write the letter to my right hon. Friend the then Secretary of State.

Finally, let me deal with the other matter that has been raised.

Mr. Derek Foster (Bishop Auckland) rose in his place and claimed to move, That the Question be now put.

Question, That the Question be now put, put and agreed to.

Question accordingly put, That the original words stand part of the Question:—

Mr. Speaker forthwith declared the main Question, as amended, to be agreed to.

Resolved,

That this House endorses the Government's consistent objective of supporting Westland plc in its efforts to achieve a financial reconstruction, of supporting United Kingdom participation in collaboration with North Atlantic Treaty Organisation allies and of safeguarding the interests of the company, its employees and its shareholders, recognises the efforts of the Government to ensure that the Westland Board had more than one option to secure that objective; affirms that it will be for the company to determine its future course of action; and further recognises the competence of departmental Select Committees of the House of Commons to consider the issues raised by these developments.

Statutory Sick Pay

10.28 pm

The Parliamentary Under-Secretary of State for Health and Social Security (Mr. John Major): I beg to move,

That the draft Statutory Sick Pay Up-rating Order 1985, which was laid before this House on 17th December, be approved.

The purpose of the order is to increase the rates of statutory sick pay and the bands of earnings which determine the rate payable. My right hon. Friend the Secretary of State has carried out his annual review of those amounts as he is required to do by the Social Security and Housing Benefits Acts 1982. The uprating of the bands, and consequently the rates, is reviewed in relation to changes in the general level of prices which, in the 12 months to October 1985, rose by 5·4 per cent. as measured by the index of retail prices. The draft order accordingly provides for an equivalent increase in the SSP rates and earnings levels to apply from 6 April 1986.

As hon. Members will know, there are three rates of SSP. As usual, in working out the new rates we have followed established practice and rounded them to the nearest 5p. The new upper and middle thresholds have been rounded down to the next 50p. Rounding down in that fashion is beneficial to employees as it enables more to qualify for the higher and middle rates of SSP than would otherwise be the case. The lower earnings threshold —below which no SSP is payable—is not subject to uprating by the order. That is set automatically by the Act at the lower earnings limit for class 1 contributions, which will be £38 from 6 April 1986.

The result of these calculations is that from next April employees with average earnings of £74·50 or more per week will qualify for SSP at the new standard weekly rate of £46·75. Those who earn between £55·50 and £74·49 will be entitled to the new middle rate of £39·20. And those who earn between £38 and £55·49 will receive the new lower rate of £31·60. These new rates represent increases of £2·40, £2 and £1·60 per week respectively.

The draft order makes the usual transitional provision for those employees who have current entitlement to SSP at the time the uprating takes effect. Whichever level of SSP an employee is receiving at the time the uprating takes place, whether standard, middle or lower, he will, from 6 April receive the new amount of SSP relevant to that level for as long as his period of entitlement lasts. This is so even if his average earnings—which are, of course, calculated at the start of his sickness—would put him in a different earnings band. Without this beneficial provision some employees could face a significant reduction in the SSP payable to them at the uprating date and I am sure hon. Members will welcome the fact that this will not occur. [HON. MEMBERS: "Hear, hear."] I acknowledge support from whatever quarter it comes.

April 1986, will, of course, see other changes in SSP that lie outside the main provisions of the order. The House will recall that under legislation passed in the Social Security Act 1985, an employer's maximum liability for paying his employees SSP when sick will increase from eight weeks to 28 weeks. Full reimbursement of the costs of this extended period will continue to be available with employers deducting their costs from their national insurance liability. Some other changes in the present rules and procedures will also take place consequent on the increased maximum duration. These were developed following consultation and discussion with employers and others earlier last year. I am pleased to say that a completely revised employer's guide to statutory sick pay, incorporating these changes, was issued to all employers last October to enable them to make the necessary preparation for these changes. The new rates covered in the order before us will thus be the first ones to apply to the extended scheme.

It remains the Government's intention to review SSP rates and earnings bands annually, with increases taking effect from the following April. By 1987 social security benefits will also have moved to an April uprating date, We intend, therefore, that in future the Secretary of State will review SSP rates at the same time as other social security benefit rates.

Details of the new SSP rates and earnings bands will be notified to employers shortly in a leaflet issued with the new national insurance contribution rate tables, which will also come into operation in April. The new SSP rates will also be publicised in leaflets available generally from the Department of Health and Social Security.

Finally, I should perhaps remind the House that the rates of SSP are statutory minima. Many employees—in fact, the great majority—receive occupational sick pay from their employers and a number continue to get full pay when sick. We have no evidence to suggest that the current rates of SSP have resulted in hardship or difficulties for employees. Indeed there are clear indications that most employees prefer SSP to the sickness benefit it replaces because it is so much simpler for them to receive their money when sick from the same source as when working. Neither is there evidence to suggest that the rates have affected employers' and employees' flexibility for negotiating levels of occupational sick pay.

The draft order provides for the SSP rates to keep pace with the rise in the general level of prices. I commend it to the House.

10.33 pm

Mr. Michael Meacher (Oldham, West): First let me make it clear that the uprating principle underlying the order is not in contention, but I wish briefly to use the debate to highlight two main issues where the Opposition remain distinctly critical. One is the experience of statutory sick pay as it has developed, especially in the light of its extension to 28 weeks from 6 April next, and the other is the proposed privatisation of other benefits where the example of statutory sick pay is being used as a model.

Our main objection is that the extension of statutory sick pay represents not only the abolition of state sickness benefit but the prolongation over a much longer period of all the disadvantages clearly manifest in this act of privatisation.

First, unlike sickness benefit—and we take a view of it different from the over-generous picture for employees given by the Minister—statutory sick pay is taxable and subject to deductions for national insurance contributions. Therefore, for many employees, especially those on low earnings, SSP means less money when they are unable to work because of sickness or disability. Indeed, for those on very low incomes, about £50 a week, the loss can be as hefty as £14 or £15 a week.

Nor is it any defence to say, as Ministers do—although the Minister did not do so tonight—that the low level of SSP is compensated for by supplementary benefit. Recent figures show that one third of sick or disabled people do not claim the supplementary benefit to which they are entitled. Perhaps that is the best indication of the inadequacy of SSP. Means-tested supplementary benefit should never be regarded as a satisfactory substitute for an adequate benefit as of right when people cannot work.

Ministers also like to evade the unsatisfactory nature of SSP by referring—as the Minister did tonight—to the number of occupational sick pay schemes. Of course, a few do exist, but many employees are not covered by them because they are generally run on a discretionary basis. In particular, part-time workers and others in low-paid jobs are frequently excluded.

A sign of the amount of loss of benefit from the extension of SSP is provided by the Government's estimate of the so-called savings that will accrue in the next financial year—of the order of £200 million. Those savings are being made purely at the expense of the sick and disabled who are already having to cope with the extra costs of disability. It is surely wrong and unfair that employees will be paying out more in tax and national insurance contributions because of the extension of SSP, while employers will not be expected to pay any national insurance contribution for SSP payments.

Another matter for concern is that—

The Minister for Social Security (Mr. Tony Newton): The hon. Gentleman plainly has not understood the financial basis of SSP. The saving of £200 million is a saving to public expenditure, but it is almost precisely counterbalanced by the revenue forgone from the national insurance fund in compensation for the payments by employers to employees. The notion that either the original introduction of SSP or its extension entail losses to beneficiaries of the sort suggested by the hon. Gentleman is, quite simply, wrong.

Mr. Meacher: The figures are not so very different from what I have suggested. The Minister is right to say that there is an offset, and I wholly accept that. But there are substantial disadvantages to employees. The figure that I am quoting is the public expenditure figure that appears in the Government's public expenditure papers.

Does the Minister deny that, if employees are to pay substantially more in tax and national insurance contributions, there will be a significant disadvantage for them? Does he deny that as a result of the scheme, many on the lowest levels of income—about £40, £50 or £60 a week—are suffering substantial losses that can be as much as £14 or £15 a week?

Another matter for concern is that the rate of unemployment is already higher among the disabled than among the work force as a whole. An extension of SSP, with the additional administrative burden on employers, is all too likely to lead to discrimination against workers with poor health records.

Indeed, there are other disadvantages to SSP. It has involved a much harsher linking than that applying to sickness benefit, although that is now to be changed.

Moreover, because it is administered by employers—that is not to be changed—and not by the DHSS, there are no powers, short of taking the employer to court, to enforce payment of statutory sick pay by employers. If an adjudication officer, social security appeal tribunal or a social security commissioner issues a formal decision that a person is entitled to statutory sick pay, the DHSS cannot force a recalcitrant employer to pay the correct amount to the employee. Employees in unorganised workplaces, particularly part-time workers or those in low-paid jobs, are vulnerable to harassment by employers in relation to absence through sickness, given the leeway that the DHSS has now given to employers.

There is no protection for employees who are dismissed by their employers so that the latter can avoid paying them statutory sick pay. Extending statutory sick pay in April will increase the employee's exposure to unscrupulous manoeuvres by some employers.

For those reasons, we contend that statutory sick pay, which was introduced almost without warning and with perfunctory consultation, has worked to the detriment of employees in a variety of ways.

There are good grounds for the fear that the introduction of statutory sick pay will be used as a wedge in the door of further moves to hive off state responsibility for social security benefits. Evidence of further intended privatisation by the Government emerged on 19 December when the DHSS issued a consultation paper on statutory maternity allowance. That proposed that responsibility for paying maternity allowance——

Mr. Deputy Speaker (Mr. Harold Walker): Order. The hon. Gentleman is straying wide of the order. I have given him a lot of rope, but he must not discuss maternity pay.

Mr. Meacher: I am not seeking to introduce a debate on maternity allowance, but I am making the valid point that the introduction of statutory sick pay is being used as a model for further extending the privatisation of social security benefits. I wish to make one or two other brief comments related to that, but I do not seek to discuss that argument in depth because it is to be discussed in another place.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: That can be left to another place because the order is about uprating statutory sick pay, not the principle, which the House has already decided.

Mr. Meacher: I accept that, but it is important that this is being used as a model for further privatisation. It suggests that statutory maternity allowance should be paid at the lowest rate of statutory sick pay—£31·60 a week in April 1986 terms—regardless of earnings. Statutory maternity allowance and statutory sick pay should not in general link to the same period of interruption in work. A further act of privatisation is now to be carried out on the model of statutory sick pay, despite all its drawbacks, but in this case it will be on even meaner terms with only one level of benefit instead of three, and that will be the lowest statutory sick pay level.

We do not dispute the uprating basis in the order, but we want to place firmly on record our strong condemnation, not only of the principle of the privatisation of social security benefits, but of the manifest disadvantages for the employee that this has been shown to involve. We oppose the extension of the principle, with its disadvantages to other benefits such as statutory maternity allowance.

[Mr. Meacher]

If the Government do not take note of our objections, I give notice that when we come to power we shall deal with them rapidly.

10.44 pm

Mr. Charles Kennedy (Ross, Cromarty and Skye): The speech of the hon. Member for Oldham, West (Mr. Meacher) was reasonably credible, and I agreed with much of what he said until his closing sentiments—perhaps that does not surprise him. It will certainly not surprise those sitting on the Treasury Bench. A return of the Labour party to power would greatly surprise the British people.

My hon. Friend the Member for Roxburgh and Berwickshire (Mr. Kirkwood) and I welcome the fact that, on this occasion, the DHSS is staying within and upholding the law of the land, and will uprate accordingly. We have no argument with that. It was sensible of the DHSS to bring the uprating procedure into line as from 1987. My noble Friend Lord Banks and others have argued for that, and we welcome it.

My basic point on the uprating order relates to the impact that statutory sick pay has on small businesses. The Minister will recall that my hon. Friend and I have moved amendments and made speeches, in Committee and in the House, on the effect of the statutory sick pay scheme in this respect. That is why we welcome the reference in the explanatory details that accompanied the order to the DHSS consultation paper on the reduction of burdens on business. It would be helpful if the Minister would say briefly how matters are progressing in that respect—by which I mean the suggestion that employers should be allowed to opt out of SSP, provided that they pay wages to their sick employees at least as good as their SSP entitlement.

The Government will recall that the announcement of an extension of the SSP scheme was met with horror by, among others, the National Federation of Self Employed and Small Businesses. I agree with the hon. Member for Oldham, West that the bureaucracy of the SSP scheme and the extension which has been announced would discriminate against the employment potential of small businesses, and encourage more part-time employment rather than full-time employment. The Government said during SSP debates that they were conscious of the difficulty, and made some concessions in terms of bridging the gap.

You have been tolerant of my similarly lateral interpretation of the order, Mr. Deputy Speaker. May I end by saying that we welcome the fact that the uprating will go ahead, and especially the fact that the SSP uprating will be brought into line with other benefits. Any comments which the Minister can make on these broader points, based on the principle that we are debating this evening, would be helpful to my hon. Friend and myself.

Mr. Major: This has been a modest debate — [Interruption.] I make no complaint about that. As is often the case on such occasions, the debate has ranged rather more widely than the strict terms of the order. The hon. Member for Oldham, West (Mr. Meacher) went substantially more widely, and the hon. Member for Ross, Cromarty and Skye (Mr. Kennedy) greatly tested your traditional good nature and patience, Mr. Deputy Speaker. Being a more timorous soul, I have no intention of tempting your good nature to that extent.

I am grateful to the hon. Member for Oldham, West for welcoming the principle of the uprating, although I was a little alarmed that he seemed to see plots and difficulties where none exists.

The hon. Gentleman also spoke a little scornfully of what he described as the privatisation of social security benefits. That seems an odd way to put it. The introduction and subsequent extension of the SSP principle leads to a closer and better relationship between employers and employees. I believe that the ability to make SSP payments in the way that now obtains makes for a sound basis for relationships between employers and employees. It has generally been welcomed, it has proved fairly successful and I am sorry that the hon. Gentleman made that rather ideological point.

The hon. Gentleman also touched in passing on occupational sick pay schemes. The two issues are not unrelated. A very substantial number of employees now benefit from such schemes. Precise up-to-date figures are not available, but the latest firm information is that about 80 per cent. of employees are covered. That figure is based on a survey in 1977 and, although I cannot state this as a firm fact, there is every reason to believe that the number of employees so covered has continued to grow since then. In my view, that makes out the case for the rationalisation of SSP in the way in which it has been introduced in recent years. I hope that in due course the hon. Member for Oldham, West will entirely welcome the changes that have been made.

The hon. Gentleman referred also to the forthcoming extension of SSP liability from eight to 28 weeks. In terms of the number of weeks that is a considerable extension, but on further examination it proves not to be so great a change as it might appear at first glance. Under the existing eight week scheme employers already deal with the bulk of short sickness spells. Only about 10 per cent. of sickness spells last longer than eight weeks and of those about half last no longer than 13 weeks. We estimate, therefore, that under the current eight-week scheme employers deal with about 5 million spells of sickness per year. The extension will mean that 700,000 of those cases will not be transferred to state sickness benefit but will continue to be paid SSP by employers until the sickness ends or there is a transfer to invalidity benefit at the commencement of the 29th week.

We all know that my hon. Friend the Minister for Social Security is one of the most tolerant Members to represent any party in the House in recent years, but even his traditional tolerance started to snap—I felt him quiver at my side like a greyhound ready to leave the trap—when the hon. Member for Oldham, West referred to the saving of £200 million on the extension of SSP as a loss to sick employees. My hon. Friend intervened to make it quite clear that that is not so. The £200 million saving in public expenditure certainly represents sickness benefit that is not paid out, but it is replaced by £285 million paid out in statutory sick pay and recovered by the employer from the national insurance fund through deductions from the national insurance contributions that would otherwise be paid into the fund. Therefore, although I understand the hon. Gentleman's point, I think that it had no substance and that in view of the clear comments of my hon. Friend the Minister I need not labour the matter any further.

Mr. Meacher: Perhaps I may press the matter a little further. It is true that contribution income to the national insurance fund will be reduced by £285 million in a full year as a result of the Government's decision to relieve employers of paying national insurance contributions on employees' SSP, but that is offset to some extent by increases in revenue from tax and national insurance contributions from employees on their statutory sick pay. There is a reversal in the burden of payment which is very much in favour of employers and against employees. The Minister must take that firmly on board.

Mr. Major: I understand the hon. Gentleman's point. He should bear in mind, in the context of the state's capacity to pay, the fact that this change has meant a substantial saving as so few sickness benefit claims are now made through the normal social security system. I do not have the figures here, but that substantial administrative cost saving has meant funds are available for other uses in the social security system. We must consider the broad principle. The scheme has been successful and, with the exception of some of the unharmonious comments of the hon. Member for Oldham, West, it has been broadly welcomed.

Mr. Meacher: The Minister tries to make something out of the savings on administrative costs. He says that he does not have the figures, but I understood the savings to be only £3 million to £4 million. It in no way derogates from my main point.

Mr. Major: I did not find the hon. Gentleman's main point very attractive. Nor do I think that it weighs heavily in the scales against the convenience, principally to the employee, of receiving statutory sick pay in lieu of state sickness benefit from the same source as he receives his salary. It is an administrative convenience of some significance to him, too. I know that the hon. Gentleman is anxious about the beneficiaries of any type of social security benefit. I should have thought that he would regard this as a significant advance. That is our view and I believe that it would be shared by most beneficiaries.

In the midst of his other comments, the hon. Member gave the impression that the extension of statutory sick pay would lead to discrimination against the chronically sick and disabled. I hope that he does not believe that. We have no evidence to that effect. There is no reason to suppose that the scheme will have that effect. In general, disabled people do not have bad attendance records. Indeed, they tend to be very good. Successive Governments have tried to increase awareness that a disabled employee is a good employee whose attendance record, on the evidence available to us, is likely to be better than average.

Some employers might try to avoid employing people likely to have poor attendance records, but I do not believe that statutory sick pay has aggravated that. Employers are more likely to be worried about problems with production and with the employment of temporary staff which frequent absences of their regular employees can result in. As employers are fully compensated for the statutory sick pay that they pay out and, as the hon. Gentleman said, the cost of making that payment, there is no realistic reason for fearing that the extension of the scheme will mean additional discrimination against the chronically sick and disabled. That is the thrust of much that we have tried to do and will do in the Bill that will shortly be presented to the House to ensure that the sick and disabled are treated as well as possible. That is an important priority.

The hon. Gentleman considered other matters beyond the scope of the order. I hope that he will understand that, in your presence, Mr. Deputy Speaker, I have no intention of pursuing them. The hon. Member for Ross, Cromarty and Skye made several interesting points. I am grateful to him for welcoming the alignment of uprating and the support that he offered. It is a logical extension and, in the absence of the hon. Member for Oldham, West mentioning it, we can conclude that we have his support on that count.

The hon. Member for Ross, Cromarty and Skye asked about the "Burden on Business" consultation document issued by my hon. Friend the Parliamentary Under-Secretary of State for Health and Social Security. The consultation period has ended. We are considering the responses. I hope that we shall soon be in a position to reach conclusions on that matter. It was a useful exercise to have the consultation. We have had a number of worthwhile responses.

The hon. Member for Oldham, West welcomed the general principle. Despite some of his comments, the statutory sick pay scheme has been running smoothly and successfully. I should like to take the opportunity to congratulate employers on the way in which they have taken the scheme on board. When it was mooted I think they had reason to be concerned, and many of them expressed concern. Their experience in running the scheme has shown that their concerns were largely unrealised. I am confident that they will equally take in their stride the extension of the period from eight to 28 weeks, not least because it will not lead to anything like a proportionate increase in payments, as might be supposed.

The order proposes an increase in the rates of statutory sick pay so as to keep them in line with the general rise in prices since the rates were last reviewed. Despite some equivocation, I detect no opposition to the order. I hope that the House will feel inclined to approve it without dissent.

Question put and agreed to.

Resolved,

That the draft Statutory Sick Pay Up-rating Order 1985, which was laid before this House on 17th December, be approved.

Southend Hospital (Radiotherapy Unit)

Motion made, and Question proposed, That this House do now adjourn.—[Mr. Mather.]

11.1 pm

Dr. Michael Clark (Rochford): I wish to discuss an issue of great importance to south-east Essex. I start by expressing appreciation to the local press, which has shown a great interest in the matter, and to the senior surgeon of Southend hospital, who has done the same.

Southend health authority includes Rochford in my constituency and is under North-East Thames regional health authority, as is Oldchurch, the hospital that my hon. Friend the Member for Hornchurch (Mr. Squire) talked about on Monday evening. So far during 1986 two thirds of the Adjournment debates have been on this one subject. It is significant that North-East Thames regional health authority has come under so much criticism.

At the beginning of my speech I should like to thank my hon. Friend the Member for Southend, East (Mr. Taylor) for his support this evening. I know I speak for him in many of the things I have to say. Southend health authority is gravely underfunded to the tune of about £6 million a year. Yet it is in a region that is overfunded. That is causing much concern in Southend. How can we manage when we are £6 million short per annum?

To give a little background to the North-East Thames regional health authority, it has five medical schools, more than any other region. Because of boundary changes in 1974 and 1982, the Middlesex hospital, University College hospital and the Royal Free came into that health region. As a result, we have nine radiotherapy units and we have had many staffing problems with senior registrars. It is the London end of the region, not the Essex end and not Southend in particular, that needs sorting out. It is totally wrong that, through an accident of history and boundary changes, Essex should suffer and London should not be sorted out. Essex comprises half the population of the North-East Thames health authority and south-east Essex comprises half the population of Essex.

I referred earlier to the underfunding at Southend. That is due to the region's inability to tackle the problems in London. It is now ironic in the extreme that the region, in trying to rationalise, rather than closing hospitals in London, is proposing to remove the radiotherapy unit from Southend. I know that my right hon. Friend the Member for Southend, West (Mr. Channon), the Minister for Trade, will agree with my comments. I am delighted that he is present this evening. I realise fully that his ministerial office precludes him from speaking on the issue this evening. However, I believe that I shall be saying many of the things that he would wish to say.

With nine centres for radiotherapy treatment, six of them lie in a four-mile radius on the western edge of the region. The two that lie to the east are Southend and Colchester. It is clear that these locations are not ideal, but the North-East Thames regional health authority proposes to keep four out of six of the London radiotherapy centres and to close both the Essex centres. It is proposed to open a new one at Broomfield near Chelmsford. Perhaps we need to have a radiotherapy centre in the middle of Essex, and perhaps at Broomfield, but not at the expense of Southend.

The four units that will be left in London provide treatment for patients in the North-East Thames region and for patients in the three other Thames regions that join with it. I understand that 75 per cent. of the Middlesex hospital's patients come from outside the region. Perhaps it would be fair to conclude that the underfunding that the Southend health authority has to endure is caused to a large extent by the fact that on the western edge of the region we are treating patients from other regions and not receiving any recompense for so doing.

What is the solution to the problem? I believe that it is to have a full cancer treatment unit at Southend. However, it appears from the report that the Southend option has not been evaluated fully, despite the fact that the team points out that the least expensive option would be to maintain and improve a centre outside London.

The centres that it is recommended should remain open are the ones which involve patients having to travel a long way to receive their treatment. Patients have to travel 61 minutes on average to receive treatment at the Middlesex hospital. The average travelling times for patients receiving treatment at the London hospital, St. Bartholomew's and the Royal Free are 55 minutes, 47 minutes and 37 minutes respectively. Yet the North Middlesex hospital, where the patients in the catchment area have to travel only 33 minutes, will be closed. At the Southend hospital, with patient travelling time of only 35 minutes, the radiotherapy centre is also proposed for closure.

It is proposed in the report that the patients from Southend should be transferred to Broomfield or to London. It is acknowledged that such transfers will involve long journeys because it is proposed in the report that hostels should be provided for those who have to travel these long distances.

It is also mentioned in the report that if the centre were at Southend it would be difficult for half the people in the catchment area to reach the hospital. The converse is that half of those in the catchment area find it very convenient to travel to the Southend hospital. The proposals will merely reverse the two halves of the catchment area.

The report has been described by the medical consultants at the Southend hospital as a waste of £80,000 of public money. It is riddled with errors. There are pages of errata and I can still find some factual and numerical errors that are not listed. It is said that the exercise is not a cost-saving one. If it is not, goodness only knows what its advantages are.

When the team set about reviewing therapy treatment in the North-East Thames region, no consultant surgeons were on the review team, nor a consultant haematologist, despite the fact that both groups of medical experts provide a considerable proportion of the cancer treatment in Southend and elsewhere. It is not surprising that the report was rejected unanimously by the medical staff at Southend hospital.

There has been no consideration given, as it appears in the report, to cancer treatment overall in London. As I have said, in London four regional health authorities come together. It would surely be sensible to consider the London provision in total rather than a quarter at a time. Yet we learn that the same team from Coopers and Lybrand will be undertaking another survey for North-West Thames, again in grand isolation. One performance index that is used in the report is the number of radiotherapy courses that each hospital provides, and conclusions are drawn from that. However, no account is taken of the fact that each hospital has a different number of linear accelerators. If we consider the number of courses per linear accelerator, we find that Colchester, which is to be closed, is top of the list. Southend is third or fourth. St. Bartholomew's and Middlesex, which are to be kept open, are at the very bottom. St. Bartholomew's has a usage of its linear accelerator of only 37 per cent. of the usage of all the other hospitals, when averaged out. It is clearly the wrong decision to keep these four London units open and to close Southend.

It is also assumed that we can have a regional cancer unit only where there is a CT scanner and so Broomfield is chosen, but that CT scanner is fully loaded and a new one will be needed soon. By the time the transfer takes place in 1991, it is thought that the CT scanner will be obsolete and that nuclearmagnetic resonance scanners will be used instead. So why can Southend not make a bid for one of those and keep the unit at Southend?

The report also assumes that 97 per cent. of Southend's patients will go to Broomfield and that 3 per cent. will travel to London, and yet all the communications in Essex are east-west, or from mid-Essex are radial into London. It is not practical to have communications between Chelmsford and Southend. For example, at present only 4·5 per cent. of patients from mid-Essex come into the Southend area for treatment.

The report ignores the fact that withdrawal of radiotherapy from Southend will have a detrimental effect on acute services at Southend hospital, indeed rendering some of them non-viable. Those of us who take an interest in Southend hospital are very worried that a loss of centres of excellence will mean that Southend hospital will no longer attract top consultants, not only in radiotherapy but in other medical specialties too.

There are no plans in this report to have gynaecology or ear, nose and throat units at Broomfield, but the report does say that the impetus which the regional cancer unit will provide should lead to fresh evaluation of these plans, meaning, presumably, that gynaecology and ear, nose and throat units will be provided at Broomfield in due course, again, perhaps, at the expense of Southend.

The report also says that the unit to be established at Broomfield will be of such a size that it will be twice as big as the units established in London. The Broomfield unit will, in fact, be as large as St. Bartholomew's and the Royal Free put together—far too large and impersonal.

So what conclusions do we reach? What should we do? I am certain that we should have a unit at Southend. We should obtain this by perhaps closing the radiotherapy unit at St. Bartholomew's or at the Middlesex hospital. By all means let us have a radiotherapy unit at Broomfield, but let it be the same size as the units that will exist in London: in other words, half the size proposed in the report. We can then retain the radiotherapy unit at Southend where we already have ear, nose and throat, gynaecology and haematology specialties.

Paragraph 33 of the report draws together criteria on which the location of the cancer treatment unit should be based. It says that there should be "sufficient patient throughput";

"an adequate range of services including radiotherapy and medical oncology";
"modern machinery";

it should be on the site of a district general hospital; it should "avoid excessive travel for patients";

it should be on a site where clinical trials, teaching and training go on. Southend meets every one of these criteria. The report is not acceptable, and should not be accepted.

I would like to read a few extracts from a letter that I received only yesterday. I have received many letters on this subject, as have, I am sure, my hon. Friend the Member for Southend, East and my right hon. Friend the Member for Southend, West. Many have come from old people; many have come from those who have assisted others to travel for radiotherapy treatment but this letter is from a young mother of 31. I shall quote extracts from the letter of this cancer sufferer who attends Southend general hospital. She says:

"I am 31 years old and have two children . . . The proposed move of the Southend Radiotherapy Department to Broomfield has just added to the stress and anxiety that I and fellow patients have had to endure. I live five miles from the hospital and am fortunate to be able to drive myself to and from daily treatment. The total travel time is approximately thirty minutes which is endurable. I could never have coped with the ninety minute journey to Broomfield each day. I also have to arrange for my children to be cared for in my absence. I can only manage this with the kindness and goodwill of friends, as I have no relations living nearby."

She implies that, if she were away from home longer, she might not be able to find people to look after her children. She says:

"I have received excellent service at Southend General from a very caring team of professionals . . . To have to stay in a hostel, as is proposed for Broomfield, away from those I needed most, would have considerably increased the anguish and distress I suffered . . . The travelling time for already very ill and distressed patients would be increased, bringing misery and hardship. I feel that the level of patient care would fall dramatically due to the size of the new unit. This will surely outweigh any financial benefits that a centralised unit would offset . . . I have not read one press report or spoken to any individual to date who is in favour of the scheme of moving cancer treatment miles away from the most heavily populated area of Essex."

Neither have I. I have not come across a constituent, medical specialist, Member of Parliament, press reporter or anyone else who thinks that this is a good idea. I call upon my hon. Friend the Under-Secretary of State to reject the report, to think again, to leave the unit at Southend and to boost it.

11.16 pm

Mr. Teddy Taylor (Southend, East) rose——

Mr. Deputy Speaker (Mr. Harold Walker): Order. The hon. Member needs the consent of the hon. Member for Rochford (Dr. Clark) and the Under-Secretary of State to intervene. If it is given, the hon. Member may proceed.

Mr. Taylor: I congratulate my hon. Friend the Member for Rochford (Dr. Clark) on raising this important issue. I assure the House that all hon. Members who are covered by the Southend health authority agree absolutely with everthing said by my hon. Friend.

I appreciate that this is a matter for the region. I am sure, however, that the region will bear very much in mind the views of my hon. Friend the Under-Secretary of State. I hope that he will confirm that the Government believe that health care is an exercise not just in accountancy but in the care of people. I hope also that my hon. Friend the Under-Secretary of State is aware of the profound resentment over many years about underfunding. That resentment will increase if this proposal is accepted.

I thank my hon. Friend the Under-Secretary of State for giving me a minute to say those words.

11.17 pm

The Parliamentary Under-Secretary of State for Health and Social Security (Mr. Ray Whitney): I am happy to have the opportunity to reply to the powerful points put by my hon. Friend the Member for Rochford (Dr. Clark) and the effective points graciously and briefly put by my hon. Friend the Member for Southend, East (Mr. Taylor). I am grateful to my right hon. Friend the Member for Southend, West (Mr. Channon) for being here tonight. I recognise the vows of silence and virtues that his position requires of him.

My hon. Friend the Member for Rochford pointed out that two thirds of the Adjournment debates so far this year have focused on the backwash of the review of cancer treatment services that has been commissioned by the north-east Thames region. Had I not been aware of that concern before, I certainly would be by now. I ask my right hon. and hon. Friends to pass on my assurance to their constituents that their concern is recognised and to pass on also my points about the situation, as I understand it, on the basis of a review called for by the region. I should like to correct a number of misconceptions.

It is important to understand why this review was put in hand. My hon. Friend the Member for Southend, East in his succinct remarks made reference to the financial issues. I hope it is accepted that the idea that the review was instigated simply to save money is not correct. The basis for the review was to look at the way in which the services, including radiotherapy, for people suffering from cancer are currently provided within the region's area, and to see whether those services could be improved. I take the point made by both my hon. Friends about the quality of service to their constituents being the point at issue. This is why the review was launched, and the review and then the region must achieve the best solution.

At this stage it is not for me to say whether the report has got it right. I am well aware that some people hold the view that the report has not got it right. I am bound to say I am not too impressed by the fact that my hon. Friend the Member for Rochford suggested that one or one or two press reporters said the review had got it wrong. I am not impressed by their opinion, but I am impressed by the worries expressed by my hon. Friends and their constituents and it is important for that to be taken into account.

Dr. Michael Clark: And the medical profession.

Mr. Whitney: I will certainly come to that: that must be taken into account. I have no doubt that our proceedings tonight and on Monday will be taken into account by the regional health authority. The need for a review of the service was clearly set out in the regional strategic plan published in July 1984. I hope my hon. Friends will agree that this approach as a principle must be right.

We are looking for a continually improving Health Service and that is why we continue, in real terms, to put more of the nation's resources into the Health Service. Since 1979, 20 per cent. more in real terms has been devoted to the Health Service, and the projection for the next financial year is that our increase will probably be 2 per cent. above the rate of inflation. Our commitment to devoting an increasing amount of resources to the Health Service is clear, but we must also look at the way those resources are used, or the service will stagnate. This often means that changes are required and, of course, changes are unsettling and sometimes difficult. I hope that none of us will feel that the Health Service has no right to debate such issues. That must be what a sensible service is about. This review was to look at exactly the sort of service that is needed.

The report argues the medical case for concentrating the specialised cancer services. I suggest to my hon. Friends that it is important to accept that concentration of specialised services, including radiotherapy, into specialised centres. The report believes that would improve the quality of care and the service to patients. That is the first issue to be debated: is the report right about that?

It may be that some of my hon. Friend's medical consultants and specialists in Southend did not agree with the conclusions. I would certainly not say they are wrong, but it is fair to recognise that the medical chairman of the review team, Professor Whitehouse, is a distinguished specialist in the field. He is the professor of medical oncology at Southampton university. His conclusion and the conclusion of his team was that there should be five specialised centres, compared with the existing nine radiotherapy units. Should there be five? I am not saying whether there should be or not, but if so, where should they be?

That leads us to yet another difficult issue. There are special cases which have the problems of accessibility to which my hon. Friend the Member for Rochford referred tonight and to which my hon. Friend the Member for Hornchurch (Mr. Squire) referred on Monday night. That matter will be taken into account when the regional health authority considers the results of its working party.

Many of the services needed by cancer patients can and should be provided in every district. The report is clear about that. My hon. Friend the Member for Rochford read a letter from his lady constituent. I do not know the details of her case, but to reassure her I ask him to tell her that this is not a matter of the elimination of a service.

We are talking about specialised services, and by definition, they cannot be everywhere. It is not a matter of resources. It makes no more medical than economic sense to provide the degree of specialisation about which we are talking. Services such as radiotherapy must be established to serve a relatively large population to attract sufficient patients to enable clinicians to sustain and develop their expertise. Too wide a dispersal of facilities and staff, and such expertise is not developed and the increasingly high standard of patient care for which we are looking is not achieved. That is one of the problems that must be tackled by the RHA. It is one with which the review team sought to deal, but clearly not to everyone's satisfaction.

I hope that my hon. Friends accept that a valid exercise was conducted. A balance must be struck between poorer access with greater travel problems and a better service. This is not merely a matter of finance.

It is not for me or my right hon. Friend to make a judgment on this case. My hon. Friends will recognise the process. The report was put out to public consultation in September 1985 and the period for comments finished at the end of the year. The health authority's working party has been established and the health authority will consider its findings in the spring.

If the RHA agrees to changes—those recommended or others arising from the full consultation and the debate, of which this is part—then in the usual way there will be local consultation on any changes to local services or closures. Again, in the usual way, if any of the proposals are opposed by any of the relevant community health councils then the matter will be referred, via the RHA, to my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State for a decision. In those circumstances, I am sure that my hon. Friends understand that it would not be appropriate for me to comment in detail on the proposals at this stage.

It must be right that regions can launch reviews and examine better ways of producing a higher standard of specialised patient care in any faculty.

My hon. Friends the Members for Rochford and for Southend, East referred specifically to Southend's financial position. In resource allocation working party terms, Southend is an underfunded district in an overfunded region. My hon. Friend the Member for Rochford referred to £6 million. I understand that that figure is the amount by which it is estimated that Southend is below its target. In other words, it is 17 per cent. below its target. The latest revision shows that Southend is about 5 per cent. below its target, or £2 million below it on an allocation of £40 million. Be that as it may, the region is firmly committed to the policy of securing a fairer distribution of resources between its districts. I understand that in the financial year 1985-86 the region has allocated extra funds—about £500,000—to Southend. I hope that that is accepted.

My hon. Friend the Member for Rochford referred to London needing to be sorted out. Perhaps it does need that. The movement of RAWP towards ensuring that there will be greater equality in terms of services and provision is recognised and accepted, but it has to be brought about at a measured and tolerable pace, otherwise the consequences, even within an expanding budget, given the increase in the number of doctors and nurses and the increase in pay levels, in real terms, that we are achieving——

Oral Answers to Questions

NATIONAL FINANCE

City of London

1. Mr. Hoyle asked the Chancellor of the Exchequer if he has any plans to meet the Governor of the Bank of England to discuss affairs relating to the regulation of the City of London.

15. Mr. Bruce asked the Chancellor of the Exchequer when he next expects to meet the Governor of the Bank of England.

The Chancellor of the Exchequer (Mr. Nigel Lawson): I have frequent discussions with the Governor of the Bank of England on a variety of matters.

Mr. Hoyle: Has the Chancellor held any discussions with the chairman of Lloyd's? Will he also have discussions with Mr. Ian Hay Davison, who was the chief executive of the Lloyd's Council? Does he believe that the inquiry into Lloyd's set up by his right hon. and learned Friend the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry will restore confidence in a tainted City? If the inquiry produces an adverse report, what steps will be taken to implement its proposals as quickly as possible to put matters right?

Mr. Lawson: The hon. Gentleman is a day late. Trade and Industry Question Time was yesterday, and Lloyd's is the responsibility of my right hon. and learned Friend. I do have responsibilities in the City, and I object strongly to the hon. Gentleman's reference to a tainted City. Certain parts of the City are tainted, but to suggest that the City as a whole is tainted is wrong. I hope that the hon. Gentleman will withdraw that remark.

Mr. Bruce: As this week the Government have yet again been forced to raise interest rates, and as the highest real level in interest rates ever has come about during their period in office, when the Chancellor next meets the Governor of the Bank of England will he accede to his request to join the European monetary system and so help to stabilise the pound without having to impose such high and penal rates of interest?

Mr. Lawson: There are arguments both for and against joining the EMS. However, if the hon. Gentleman imagines that joining will mean that it will never again be necessary to raise interest rates, he is misinformed.

Mr. McCrindle: Next time my right hon. Friend speaks to the Governor of the Bank of England about the City of London, will he, on behalf of the thousands of my constituents who earn an honest living in the square mile, tell him that there is a considerable amount of irritation at the imputations by Opposition Members and others that the reputation of the City has been hopelessly besmirched? Will my right hon. Friend take that opportunity to underline the fact that that is not the case over a very wide area of activity? Will he remind the Governor, if any reminding is necessary, of the major contributions to the economy of this country made by invisible exports from the City?

Mr. Lawson: My hon. Friend is right. The City is pre-eminent among the financial markets of the world and makes a substantial contribution to the British economy in many different respects. Whatever may be said by Opposition Members below the Gangway, I am sure that the right hon. Member for Birmingham, Sparkbrook (Mr. Hattersley) would not wish to denigrate the City in the way that many of his hon. Friend's have done.

Mr. Skinner: Does not the Chancellor have a cheek to suggest that my hon. Friend the Member for Warrington, North (Mr. Hoyle) was wrong to criticise the City and say that it is tainted? Did not the Attorney-General, some nine or 10 months ago, in reply to a letter from a Tory Member, say that he found the level of City fraud unacceptable? Why did he say that? It was simply because at that time the PCW syndicate, whose two principals were Peter Cameron-Webb and Peter Dixon, had managed to get rid of about £130 million from Lloyd's—money that they had pocketed themselves. They have never been brought to book by the fraud squad. Why are the Government not doing something about it? Of course there is a scandal in the City, but this Government are not doing anything because most of them——

Mr. Speaker: Order. This is not an Adjournment debate.

Mr. Lawson: That accusation, which you may not have been able to hear Mr. Speaker, was a particularly scandalous one.

The Government have long been concerned about the problem and growth of financial fraud. One of the first tasks that I peformed on becoming Chancellor of the Exchequer in 1983—long before Opposition Members were talking about the problem — was to chair an interministerial group, out of which arose the setting up of the fraud investigation group which came into being on 1 January 1985. In 1983, long before the Opposition were alive to the problems, my right hon. and learned Friend the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry, when he was Home Secretary, set up the Roskill committee with the Lord Chancellor to look into the legal aspects. That committee has just published a powerful report. As the House knows, we shall be legislating on that matter in the next Session.

Mr. Hickmet: Is my right hon. Friend concerned at the level of investment and penetration of our markets by Japanese banks and financial institutions in the City, especially as they are not subject to the Bank of England prudential lending limits? Has he discussed that matter with the Governor of the Bank of England, bearing in mind the steps taken by the Japanese to prevent our banks from competing in their markets on similar terms? What steps does he propose to take?

Mr. Lawson: My hon. Friend has raised an important matter. In general terms I think that the City of London and the United Kingdom have benefited from the existence of overseas banks and financial institutions in the City and the country. However, there has been a lack of reciprocity. We are increasingly making it clear that reciprocity is the name of the game. If Japanese financial institutions want to have an increasing presence in the City of London, then what is sauce for the goose is sauce for the gander. I am glad to say that there have been many recent instances of British financial institutions obtaining licences to operate in Japan as a result of the strong line that the Government have taken.

Mr. Hattersley: When does the Chancellor propose to announce the membership of the new board of banking supervision? Can we be assured that it will include members from outside the self-protected charmed circle of the City itself?

Mr. Lawson: The membership will be chosen on the basis of the ability and experience of the individuals concerned. I shall bear the comments of the right hon. Gentleman in mind. I deprecate his implication that anybody who comes from what he calls the "charmed circle of the City" must be in some way tainted.

Mr. Speaker: May I ask for brief questions, and that will lead to brief answers.

Shares, Savings and Investments

2. Mr. Greenway asked the Chancellor of the Exchequer if he will estimate the number of people holding shares, savings or any other kind of investment in 1978 and 1984; and if he will make a statement.

The Minister of State, Treasury (Mr. Peter Brooke): The number who own shares directly has at least doubled since 1978 to over 3 million people, and recent market research suggests that the figure may now be much higher.

Mr. Greenway: I welcome that magnificent spread of wealth in the country. May I ask how many people who have been saving for old age with pension and insurance companies would lose if privatised companies were renationalised on the discriminatory basis so rashly announced by the Leader of the Labour party in his new year interview? What would those people do?

Mr. Brooke: The number involved would be affected according to which shares were held by which institutions. However, 13 million electors hold occupational pensions, and if there were privatised shares in those institutions they would all be mulcted of the improvements in the price since they were served.

Mr. Tony Lloyd: Will the Minister admit that in the case of all the privatised companies, shortly after privatisation the number of small shareholders has decreased dramatically? In the case of British Aerospace, recently in the news, within 12 months the number of shareholders holding fewer than 500 shares went down to almost 10 per cent. of those who had bought them at the point of privatisation. Will the Minister tell the House the truth — that privatisation is not about wider share ownership, but is about the hands of some of his hon. Friends going into the jam pots to make money for themselves and their backers?

Mr. Brooke: Individual decisions about individual shares will be taken differently, according to the company, by individual investors. The fact remains that 80 per cent. of the new shareholders in British Telecom still hold those shares.

Sir Brandon Rhys Williams: Does my hon. Friend's Department look favourably at ways, such as minor tax changes, that might encourage people to invest not only in equities but in debentures and other forms of investment?

Mr. Brooke: The Government are supportive of sales of debentures in the same way as they are of equities.

Income Tax

3. Mr. Chope asked the Chancellor of the Exchequer what is the effective marginal tax rate on earnings of those in the lowest tax band; and how this compares with other major industriai countries.

6. Dr. Twinn asked the Chancellor of the Exchequer what is the effective marginal tax rate on earnings of those in the lowest tax band; and how this compares with other major industrial countries.

The Financial Secretary to the Treasury (Mr. John Moore): The marginal income tax rate on earnings for those in the lowest tax band in this country is 30 per cent. This is the second highest national rate among the OECD countries.

Mr. Chope: I thank my right hon. Friend for that reply. Does he agree that our marginal tax rate is far too high, particularly for those on low earnings, when compared with 10 per cent. in France and 11 per cent. in the United States? Does he also agree that the high marginal rate is contributing to the increase in the black economy?

Mr. Moore: There is no question but that the high marginal rate, as well as the problem of regulation, has an impact on the black economy. That is one of the factors in the burden of taxation. I concur with my hon. Friend's two specific points: the United States rate is 11 per cent. and the French initial rate is 10 per cent.

Dr. Twinn: Does my right hon. Friend agree that these are startling comparisons? Does he know of any of our competitors with such a high rate?

Mr. Moore: The only nation with a rate above us in the OECD is Ireland. To give some illustrations, the United States rate is 11 per cent., Japan 11 per cent., West Germany 22 per cent. and France 10 per cent. All our industrial competitors have an initial rate substantially below ours.

Mr. Meadowcroft: Is it correct that other countries have a different starting level at which one begins to pay tax, that virtually every PAYE taxpayer pays only the standard rate, and that therefore the tax system is hardly progressive for higher earners?

Mr. Moore: It is right that the initial rate starts at a different point. In the United States, for example, the average production worker has a threshold that starts at about 17 per cent. of his overall initial wage against the United Kingdom comparison of 27 per cent. The hon. Gentleman is right to say that on thresholds we are approximately in the middle of the OECD ranking.

Mr. Terry Davis: Has the Financial Secretary noticed that the question refers to the effective marginal tax rate, which is usually taken to include national insurance and other surcharges? Will he confirm that the new family credit scheme and the proposed changes in housing benefit suggested in the Fowler review mean that the number of people facing an effective marginal tax rate of more than 70 per cent. will be doubled from 250,000 to 500,000?

Mr. Moore: I reconfirm that the question relates to the effective marginal tax rate as opposed to the national insurance rate. I draw to the attention of the House the fact that the proposals of my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State for Social Services reduce below 100 per cent. for the first time all the effective marginal rates.

Mr. Alan Howarth: If my right hon. Friend has occasion, with his colleagues, to reflect on the respective merits of lowering the basic rate of income tax or increasing the threshold at which it is paid, will he bear in mind that there are important economic and indeed constitutional arguments in favour of making the Government, in their public expenditure, accountable to a larger rather than a smaller number of taxpayers?

Mr. Moore: That point has beeen made in public debate. I shall draw it to the attention of my right hon. Friend the Chancellor of the Exchequer if there is scope to reduce taxes—one cannot say at this time—when he considers his Budget.

Northern Region

4. Mr. Dormand asked the Chancellor of the Exchequer if he will estimate the amount of new finance available for the northern region as a consequence of his autumn statement.

The Chief Secretary to the Treasury (Mr. John MacGregor): It is not practicable to estimate the incidence of new finance over the whole range of Government expenditure on a regional basis.

Mr. Dormand: Is the Minister aware that I have asked a similar question on every Budget statement made since the Government came to office in 1979 and that each time I have received a similar reply? I expected something different for a change — that there will be an improvement in the northern region. What is different about this answer? If the Minister and the Government genuinely wish to make an impact upon the 230,000 unemployed people in the northern region, may I suggest that he takes the initiative and seeks to establish a northern development agency and—this is important—makes the same sums of money and resources available to it as are available to the Scottish and Welsh Development Agencies.

Mr. MacGregor: I do not know whether the reply that I shall give is the same as the one that the hon. Gentleman has received in the past.

Mr. Dormand: I hope not.

Mr. MacGregor: It is not possible to estimate the amount of new finance, because a great deal of public expenditure is demanded or comes from procurement policies which depend upon decisions about competitive tenders by firms in different parts of the country. There are many good reasons why it is not possible to estimate the range of new finance.

On the hon. Gentleman's second question, he will be aware that substantial sums—over £2 billion—have been spent in the northern region on many activities of the kind in which the SDA becomes involved — regional, development, industrial and urban grants, and so on. There has been substantial expenditure. I am well aware of the northern region's problems, which are long-term. To pour taxpayers' money on them is not the sole answer.

Mr. Forth: I congratulate my right hon. Friend on the consistency of his approach to this matter, as illustrated by his answer to the last question. Does he recognise that if there are to be any bids from regions for assistance, the west midlands region must also be considered because, regrettably, unemployment is still distressingly high there? He should not be allowed to get away with the idea that the problems exist only in the north or in the other fringe areas of the United Kingdom. The heart of England equally needs recognition of its problems.

Mr. MacGregor: I well understand that the problems of restructuring regional industrial areas, many of which are dependent upon traditional industries, are not confined to the northern region.

Mr. Wrigglesworth: Is the Minister aware that there has been a 57 per cent. cut in regional aid to the northern region since the Government came to office and that further cuts are forecast in the public expenditure White Paper published yesterday? In addition, a £2·6 billion cut in public capital expenditure is forecast in the White Paper. Will that not be further devastating to the northern region? Is not the truth of the matter that the Government have given up hope of ever helping the northern region?

Mr. MacGregor: Not at all, because substantial sums have been poured into the northern region. One of the key elements is the new jobs in the new industries coming to the northern region—some 21,000 in the electronics and pharmaceutical industries. It takes a long time to restructure an economy, but those things are happening. We have altered the course of regional development aid because there was no clear evidence that some of the money being spent was cost-effective. Since the northern region still has a high proportion of its area covered by assisted area status, proportionately it will benefit a good deal more from the new policy.

Mr. Bell: Is the Minister aware that the consistency to which he referred means that the north-east is continually going downhill? Whereas the Government say that 55,000 people are unemployed in the county of Cleveland, the figures released by the county council planning department show that there are 71,300 people unemployed. Is he aware of the study last year which found that £350 million needs to be invested in the northern region to cover the revamping of houses, roads and schools? Where is there provision for that?

Mr. MacGregor: If we are to maintain the downward pressure on inflation, which is important for northern region industries and those everywhere else, and if we are to contain the cost of public expenditure as a proportion of GNP, which is also important for those industries, there are inevitably constraints on the total level of public spending. In this White Paper we have increased public expenditure on housing renovation and roads compared with last year's White Paper.

Mr. Campbell-Savours: Is it not true that the Government intend to make a further 40 per cent. cut in environmental and industrial expenditure in the northern region by the time of the next general election? Is it not equally true that at a time when those cuts are taking place in the northern region, Northern Ireland, for some reason, is being insulated from public expenditure cuts? Why is Northern Ireland insulated in this way? Why is it intended that Northern Ireland should get an increase by 1988? Is it that violence in Ulster is paying? Is it that the Government are refusing to admit that the higher the level of violence in Northern Ireland, the more money the Government are willing to sink in? Is that not a disgrace?

Mr. Macgregor: The way in which public expenditure in Northern Ireland is calculated in the areas to which the hon. Gentleman refers is the same under this Government as it was under the Labour Government. It is done by a block formula arrangement which reflects the same trends in expenditure and income.

Mr. Phillip Oppenheim: Is my right hon. Friend aware that any money spent on trying to create jobs in the northern region almost invariably means fewer jobs in other hard-hit areas like the east midlands, which have received virtually no Government aid?

Mr. MacGregor: It is important that we can at least say that any regional aid has some possibility of being cost effective in creating jobs. That is what we have done in our regional policy.

Mortgage Interest (Tax Relief)

5. Mr. Jessel asked the Chancellor of the Exchequer what recent representations he has received on tax relief on mortgage interest.

Mr. MacGregor: My right hon. Friend has received a number of representations on the subject.

Mr. Jessel: Do the Government accept that mortgage interest relief, especially to young home buyers, is vital and must continue? Is not the £30,000 mortgage limit now rather on the low side in areas where an ordinary family house now costs £50,000 to £80,000?

Mr. MacGregor: The £30,000 limit is a matter for decision in each Finance Bill. My hon. Friend would not expect me to make a statement about that today. The Government have made it clear on many occasions that they have no intention of abolishing mortgage interest relief, for the very reason given by my hon. Friend. We are still awaiting similar clear and categorical assurances from the Opposition.

Dr. Bray: Is the Chief Secretary aware that if Government policy to preserve broadly the present level of exchange rate remains, the prospect in the medium term is of increasing, not falling, interest rates?

Mr. MacGregor: I shall not make any comments about interest rates. The hon. Gentleman will have noticed that the question is about tax relief.

Mr. Gow: Will my right hon. Friend remind the House what the level for tax relief on mortgage interest would be if the initial figure of £25,000 were to be updated to take account both of inflation and of the increase in house prices?

Mr. MacGregor: Off the cuff, I cannot recall the answer to that question, although I used to take a close interest in the matter. I shall write to my hon. Friend.

Mr. Hattersley: On the rhetorical question which the Chief Secretary so carefully prepared, may I offer him a spontaneous but categorical answer? There is no question of the next Labour Government, whom he clearly anticipates, abolishing mortgage interest tax relief. May I ask the Chief Secretary, on the subject of the question rather than on the subject of his slightly inappropriate question to me, how many representations he has received from owner-occupiers about the hardship they are now suffering through having to endure the highest real mortgage interest rate in the history of this country?

Mr. MacGregor: We have received no such representations. It is interesting to note that over the period of this Government the number of people who have moved into home-ownership has expanded enormously. That trend is continuing, and there remains a high demand for mortgage funds and owner-occupied housing.

Mr. Penhaligon: I am sure that there will be general pleasure at hearing that mortgage interest relief will be retained, regardless of the colour of the Government. However, whatever the logic of the current situation, can the Minister explain why, if somebody succeeds in increasing his income, while he is in possession of a mortgage, from £10,000 to £100,000 a year, that great increase in his personal income should be accommodated by a double subsidy from the Government towards his interest payments?

Mr. MacGregor: I did not fully catch the hon. Gentleman's question, but if he is referring to the range of income and mortgage interest relief he will know that the fact that mortgage interest relief applies to the tax rates reflects the fact that some people are paying much higher rates of tax.

Car Tax

7. Mr. Pawsey asked the Chancellor of the Exchequer what representations he has received advocating the abolition of car tax.

Mr. Brooke: A number of such representations have been received.

Mr. Pawsey: Is my hon. Friend aware that only the motor industry is discriminated against by having imposed upon it a separate and additional tax? Does he agree that if it were abolished it would benefit both the consumer and the motor industry and would lead to a substantial number of additional jobs?

Mr. Brooke: My hon. Friend knows that the car tax was introduced in 1973 mainly to compensate for the revenue lost from cars when the purchase tax rate of 25 per cent. was replaced by the standard rate of VAT. If car tax were abolished, a significant proportion of any increased demand would probably be met by imports, which currently represent about 58 per cent. of new car sales.

Mr. Douglas Hogg: Having regard to the number of industries which serve the British motor industry, would not the abolition of the car tax have a significant effect upon employment in the motor industry?

Mr. Brooke: Taxation is only one of the factors that affects the demand for cars. Per capita income, manufacturers' unit production costs and pricing policies also affect demand. However, I take my hon. Friend's point.

Mr. Park: I appreciate the Minister's explanation of how the tax came to be introduced in the first place. Is he aware that if he were to remove this unique tax it would be more than compensated for by the increase in car sales? Austin-Rover, having been asked, is confident that it would be able to gain a full proportion of the increase in sales if the tax were abolished.

Mr. Brooke: A useful rationalisation has taken place within the United Kingdom motor industry, but excess capacity in western Europe and elsewhere remains. Imports, therefore, remain a considerable risk. However, I am delighted to say that the optimistic climate created by the Government has led to expansion at Vauxhall, Lotus, Jaguar and Peugeot.

Mr. Snape: Does the Minister accept that this tax is a unique imposition upon the British volume car manufacturer and that it is yet another example of this Government shooting British industry in the foot, to the benefit of its foreign competitors?

Mr. Brooke: This car tax applies to all manufacturers, whether they are foreign or British manufacturers.

Mr. Nicholls: Should not any mitigation of the car tax take second place to doing something about the fact that a constituent of mine can earn £91 a week as a nurse and then find that she has a take-home pay of only £68? Is not that the kind of thing that ought to take pride of place as regards any mitigation of tax?

Mr. Speaker: Order. That is ingenious, but it is a bit wide of the question.

Mr. Brooke: That seems to me to be a Budget question and it would be inappropriate for me to anticipate my right hon. Friend the Chancellor of the Exchequer.

Economic Growth

8. Mr. Dykes asked the Chancellor of the Exchequer if he is satisfied with the progress of the United Kingdom's real economy in terms of manufacturing output and overall growth since the beginning of 1985.

Mr. Lawson: Manufacturing output and GDP are expected to have grown by 2½ and 3½ per cent. respectively.

Mr. Dykes: Both the real and the money figures since 1984 and 1981—the low point—look quite good in certain manufacturing sectors, but the real, ominous truth remains that in the leading manufacturing sectors the figures in unit, quantity or volume terms are well down both on 1979 and on 1973. Can my right hon. Friend say, to reassure all of us, that there are other manufacturing sectors—in volume, quantity and unit of output terms, not in money terms—where there has been a big growth since 1984 and 1981? Can he reassure us once again about the miracle of the monetarist counter-revolution?

Mr. Lawson: If my hon. Friend is looking for miracles he will not find them anywhere, least of all in the policy changes that he would like to see.

As regards manufacturing, he is quite right. There are some industries that have not done so well and others that have done very much better. Taking manufacturing output as a whole during the lifetime of this Parliament, and up to the third quarter of last year, which is the latest figure that we have, the output of manufacturing industry as a whole is up by more than 7½ per cent. in real terms.

Mr. Austin Mitchell: We can discount the Minister's optimism, because he is so desperate for signs of good cheer that he would greet the quickening of rigor mortis as a healthy symptom. If he really wants to get the economy going, why does he not bring the pound down from its artifically high level and stop subsidising imports and penalising exports? He could do that by reducing interest rates, which crucify everyone?

Mr. Lawson: The hon. Member imagines that devaluation is a cure for everything. No doubt he would also recommend it as a cure for rigor mortis.

Mr. Higgins: Does my right hon. Friend agree that as regards manufacturing industry there are two important points? One is the improvement in productivity by a reduction of overmanning, as many companies now find that they can produce the same amount with two thirds of the original labour force. Secondly, profitability in manufacturing industry is probably higher now than in the past decade.

Mr. Lawson: My right hon. Friend is right. One of the most encouraging signs has been the increase in productivity to which he referred, both in the whole economy and in manufacturing in particular. Manufacturing productivity, for example, during the life of this Parliament—taking the same period as I took earlier—is up by almost 10 per cent. It is necessary, however, as the CBI fully recognises, if we want to see more of our people in work, for industry to have a tighter grip of wage increases.

Dr. McDonald: Could the Chancellor tell the House his current thinking about the impact on British manufacturing output of the highest interest rates ever, higher than those of all the other major industrial countries?

Mr. Lawson: I indicated at the time of the autumn statement that the outlook was promising for output, and it has not changed since then. It is striking that, unlike the recovery under the Labour Government, in the recovery during the lifetime of this Government we have seen a rate of growth of capital investment, including investment in manufacturing, of 4 per cent. a year compared with 1¼ per cent. a year for investment under Labour.

I do not wish to see interest rates higher than necessary, any more that anyone else does, but I would much rather have them at this level than have the negative real interest rates that we had under the Labour Government, which were cheating every saver in the land.

Revenue (Oil Prices)

9. Mr. Kirkwood asked the Chancellor of the Exchequer whether he will make a statement on the consequences for United Kingdom revenue of the change in oil prices.

Mr. Lawson: I have nothing to add to what I said in the debate on the autumn statement.

Mr. Kirkwood: In what circumstances would changes in the sterling price of oil justify changes in the Government's borrowing requirement targets?

Mr. Lawson: Changes in the sterling price of oil, if there were such changes—which would have an effect on oil revenues—would certainly be one of the things that I would take into account in deciding the appropriate PSBR at the time of the Budget. But it would be only one of a number of factors.

Mr. David Howell: Will my right hon. Friend tell us whether it is correct that Ministers are proposing to talk, or are already talking, to Saudi Arabia about oil prices? Whilst, in the interest of world stability, it would be better to prevent a huge collapse in oil prices, will my right hon. Friend assure us that it remains the policy of the Government to let oil prices settle themselves in the market? Will he accept that, providing there is no large collapse, it should not over-influence him in his decisions about tax cuts in the forthcoming Budget?

Mr. Lawson: I am happy to reassure my right hon. Friend that policy in these matters is exactly the same as it was when he was at the Department of Energy and when I was at that same Department.

Income Tax

10. Mr. Andrew MacKay asked the Chancellor of the Exchequer what increase in take-home pay would be received by a person earning £140 per week if the basic rate of income tax was reduced from 30 to 28 per cent.

Mr. Moore: The increase would be £1·90 per week for a single person or working wife, and £1·39 for a married man in 1986-87, based on the illustrative allowances shown in the autumn statement.

Mr. MacKay: Is my right hon. Friend aware that if we are really serious about trying to help the lower paid by means of any tax cuts that we make in the forthcoming Budget, the best way of going about it would be to raise thresholds and reduce national insurance contributions for those on lower pay, when the take-home pay would be much greater than that which he has just announced?

Mr. Moore: I know that my right hon. Friend the Chancellor of the Exchequer will be interested in the views of my hon. Friend and others. I know that my hon. Friend wrote to my right hon. Friend on 10 December expressing some of those views in detail. Regarding the reductions in the basic rate of £1·90 a week for a single person, if the same amount were applied on thresholds for a single person, the amount would be £1·44, or 50p less.

Group of Five Nations (Finance Ministers)

11. Mr. Freeman asked the Chancellor of the Exchequer when he next plans to meet Finance Ministers of the Group of Five nations to discuss international monetary affairs.

Mr. Lawson: The Finance Ministers of the Group of Five nations meet from time to time for this purpose.

Mr. Freeman: Does my right hon. Friend agree that since the Finance Ministers of the Group of Five last met in New York four months ago, their plan to reduce the value of the dollar has worked, the dollar has weakened against sterling by about 5 per cent., and the rate with the deutschmark has changed by about 10 per cent. to a rate of approximately DM 3·50 to the pound? Does that give him confidence for his forthcoming meeting with the Group of Five Ministers?

Mr. Lawson: My hon. Friend makes a good point. Certainly before the G5 meeting the general view of those in industry was that, whereas the dollar was too high and could well come down, the mark could go up a little against sterling. Since the Plaza meeting sterling has risen 5 per cent. against the dollar and fallen by 9 per cent. against the deutschmark.

Mr. Robert Sheldon: Is it not clear that Western countries depend on the present buoyant economy of the United States? Should not Germany and Japan, let alone ourselves, do more to stimulate our economies, and so play our part in a continued resurgence of activity in western Europe, America and Japan?

Mr. Lawson: It is possible to exaggerate considerably both the extent to which growth in the world economy is dependent on growth in the United States, and the extent to which that has slowed down. That growth has slowed down from an unsustainable rate, but it is continuing in the United States and quickening in the Federal Republic of Germany. One would certainly like to see the Japanese pursue a more generous policy than at present.

Mr. John Browne: Does my right hon. Friend accept that the international economy is being severely hurt by an international trade war, which this time is being carried on by competitive devaluations of currencies? Does he further accept that such a trade war could be stopped if we were to move towards fixed exchange rates and honest international money, that is, if there were some restoration of gold convertibility on a gold exhange standard? When he meets his G5 friends, will he please undertake to consider the restoration of stability in world monetary and financial affairs, in the hope that that will reflect on the world economy in terms of genuine trade growth?

Mr. Lawson: I certainly take note of what my hon. Friend said. He will not expect me to answer all his points. I am sure that the strength and durability of the world recovery since the world recession in the early 1980s, and the growth of world trade that has accompanied it, depend on the fact that all the countries involved are pursuing anti-inflationary, sound money policies.

Mr. Blair: Does the Chancellor of the Exchequer agree that now is the last time to be complacent about the international economy? Does he not realise that it still faces the terrible, pressing problems of world debt and a potential decline in economic growth? Will he assure us that when he meets the Group of Five he will be at the forefront of calls for a co-ordinated cut in interest rates and policies of expansion, and will not indulge in absurd notions of leaving those matters to market forces?

Mr. Lawson: I can assure the hon. Gentleman that the Finance Ministers of the Group of Five are fully seized of the problem of international debt and of the need to maintain sound anti-inflationary polices, both for their own sake and to ensure a continuation of world recovery.

Wage Increases

12. Mr. Haynes asked the Chancellor of the Exchequer when he next intends to meet the National Economic Development Council to discuss the level of wage increases.

Mr. MacGregor: The impact of wage increases on jobs was discussed at a meeting of the council on 8 January.

Mr. Haynes: When the Chancellor of the Exchequer next meets the NEDC to discuss the question of wages, will he bear in mind that many lower paid workers do not even pay income tax because of their circumstances? If he reduces income tax in the coming Budget, he will not help them very much. While he is having a go at the workers, will he have a go at his hon. Friends in the very high income bracket who have been receiving massive increases every year since he came into office?

Mr. MacGregor: May I make it absolutely clear that it would be wrong for me to say anything about what the Chancellor might do in the forthcoming Budget.

PRIME MINISTER

Engagements

Q1. Mr. Butterfill asked the Prime Minister if she will list her official engagements for Thursday 16 January.

The Prime Minister (Mr. Margaret Thatcher): This morning I presided at a meeting of the Cabinet and had meetings with ministerial colleagues and others. In addition to my duties in the House I shall be having further meetings later today. This evening I shall be giving a dinner for his Majesty King Hussein of Jordan.

Mr. Butterfill: Will my right hon. Friend join me in welcoming the initiative taken by ACAS in securing a meeting next Tuesday between the employers and the majority—one hopes all—of the teachers' unions to discuss negotiations on their pay claim? Will she share with me the hope that the National Union of Teachers will at last recognise that, if we are to have discussions about the amount that teachers should be paid, we should also have discussions about what they are supposed to do for the money?

The Prime Minister: We hope that ACAS is able to help the two sides to reach a satisfactory conclusion. The Government, like parents, want to see an early end to this damaging dispute, but I agree with my hon. Friend that it is our objective to have a statement that clearly defines teachers' duties and to have a pay structure that gives better pay to better teachers. That remains our objective.

Q2. Mr. Haynes asked the Prime Minister if she will list her official engagements for Thursday 16 January.

The Prime Minister: I refer the hon. Gentleman to the reply that I gave some moments ago.

Mr. Haynes: When did the Prime Minister first learn of the letter sent by the Solicitor-General to the former Secretary of State for Defence?

The Prime Minister: I do not have the precise dates with me—[Interruption.] If the hon. Member will repeat the question, I will see whether from my recollection I can give him an answer. Will he repeat his question? I am sorry, but I did not quite get it.

Mr. Haynes: Will the Prime Minister tell the House when she first learnt of the letter sent by the Solicitor-General to the former Secretary of State for Defence? That is the second time.

The Prime Minister: Fairly soon after it was written, when it was sent to the Department—[Interruption.] I cannot give the hon. Gentleman the precise time or day, for obvious reasons.

Mr. Heseltine: May I ask my right hon. Friend, in between her other meetings, whether she can answer for me a question arising out of yesterday's debate, at column 1167, where the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry quoted from the records of the meetings that took place on 4 and 17 October? Would it now be in order, as he has quoted from those documents, for me to add a few words to the quotations?

The Prime Minister: As my right hon. Friend knows, matters of order are not for me. I am not quite certain whether my right hon. and learned Friend quoted direct from the documents. As I heard him, he was giving the gist of the information. I am not sure whether he quoted direct. The precise point of order my right hon. Friend would clear with other people.

Q3. Mr. Nellist asked the Prime Minister if she will list her official engagements for Thursday 16 January.

The Prime Minister: I refer the hon. Gentleman to the reply that I gave some moments ago.

Mr. Nellist: Is the Prime Minister aware of how appalled the country is at the succession of half-truths and naked, political ambition of recent days alongside the total disregard for the future of the jobs of Westland workers? Is she not appalled at the sharks of the City picking over the bones of Westland shares—the same people whose hands are bloody over recent redundancies in Coventry, South-East? Is the Prime Minister further aware that neither bid guarantees jobs at Westland, and that the only way to a secure, long-term future for the helicopter industry is public ownership and an expanded civilian programme?

The Prime Minister: I do not believe that the future for Westland lies in public ownership. We have great regard for the people who work there and for their future. I hope that for that reason the matter will be speedily resolved.

Mr. Michael Marshall: My right hon. Friend will be aware of my interest in British Aerospace, as declared in the Members' Register. Specifically on the question of the meeting between my right hon. and learned Friend the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry and Sir Raymond Lygo on Wednesday 8 January, does my right hon. Friend accept that a close reading of the documents now available, together with other evidence, suggests a case of genuine misunderstanding, which I hope will help us to understand some of the problems?

The Prime Minister: Yes, I think that that is correct. I am glad that those accounts have been fully published.

Mr. Kinnock: Given the extent, the closeness and the frequency of the contract between Sir Raymond Lygo and United States Government aerospace interests, does the Prime Minister agree that he is the last man who would need to be advised by the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry? Does that not make the excuse offered by the Secretary of State for the meeting on 8 January somewhat thin? Was not the real purpose of that meeting, not to advise, but to menace?

The Prime Minister: No one would ever accuse Sir Raymond Lygo of being anti-American in any way whatsoever. My right hon. and learned Friend the Secretary of State gave his own account of the meeting and why he thought it was advisable to have it at the time. I have nothing to add to that.

Mr. Kinnock: Will the Prime Minister then answer the question, which she evaded yesterday and which her right hon. and learned Friend did not answer? Can she think of any plausible reason whatsoever why Sir Raymond Lygo should falsify either the words or the meaning of the meeting on 8 January? Is there any feasible reason why Sir Raymond should say that the Secretary of State had said to him

"what you are doing could be extremely damaging to you and your business."

Is that not more Mafia than ministerial?

The Prime Minister: No. No one on this side of the House is accusing anyone of falsifying any document—[Interruption.] My hon. Friend the Member for Arundel (Mr. Marshall), who asked me a question a moment ago, has the right explanation.

Mr. Kinnock: I know that the Government's stock in trade is to suggest that there has been a misunderstanding. May I suggest that the quotations from Sir Raymond are so extensive, so detailed and so particular as to forbid the idea that any of the difficulty arises from misunderstanding? Sir Raymond was within minutes of his departure from the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry when he retold the story in full detail.

The Prime Minister: The accounts are out. I fully accept that my right hon. and learned Friend's account is the correct version of the meeting—[Interruption.] It is not impossible for there to be different, genuine recollections, genuinely held.

Mr. Ashby: Is my right hon. Friend aware of the serious fire raging underground in a coal seam in a village in my constituency? Is she prepared to give an undertaking to assist the local authority financially in putting that fire out?

The Prime Minister: We shall obviously do all that we can, because the matter is serious.

Mr. Cartwright: In view of the widely publicised Libyan involvement in the affairs of Fiat, has the Prime Minister been given clear assurances that President Reagan's ban on economic and business links with Libya will not apply to Westland if the Fiat-Sikorsky rescue bid succeeds? Can she guarantee that the President's sanctions against Libya will not affect technology transfer from the United States to Westland?

The Prime Minister: I can guarantee none of those things without looking into them a good deal further.

Sir Geoffrey Finsberg: Does my right hon. Friend agree that what happened yesterday, when we saw the Opposition querying the veracity of notes taken by civil servants, is unprecedented? Does she perhaps feel that those who started saying that are basically those who have never held office and never should?

The Prime Minister: I thought that they were unwarranted attacks on civil servants, who serve all Governments supremely well.

Mr. Foot: As the notorious letter sent by the Solicitor-General to the former Defence Secretary seems to involve the pursuit of a most vicious vendetta, will the right hon. Lady give an absolute undertaking that she will make the report to the House herself when she discovers the culprit?

The Prime Minister: The inquiry announced in my reply to the hon. Member for Great Grimsby (Mr. Mitchell) on 14 January is still in progress. The right hon. Gentleman knows the custom with regard to leak inquiries—their outcome is not announced. That has been the traditional custom.

Mr. Andrew MacKay: In the light of the serious terrorist attacks on Rome and Vienna international airports during the recess, which left many innocent people murdered or maimed, and as it was quite clear that the godfather of terrorism, Colonel Gaddafi, was behind the attacks, will my right hon. Friend say what action the Government intend to take against Libya?

The Prime Minister: My hon. Friend is aware that we took action against Libya after Yvonne Fletcher was murdered by guns fired through windows in the Libyan embassy. We cut off diplomatic relations, cut any defence equipment and severely restricted immigration and ECGD credit. There is very little at present that we can add to that action, which has not been diminished in any way.

Q4. Mr. Foulkes asked the Prime Minister if she will list her official engagements for Thursday 16 January.

The Prime Minister: I refer the hon. Gentleman to the reply that I gave some moments ago.

Mr. Foulkes: Does the Prime Minister recall that the right hon. Member for Henley (Mr. Heseltine) has claimed that a further meeting on Westland was fixed for 3 pm on Friday 13 December? Does she recall that, yesterday, she said that, as no meeting was agreed, no meeting could be cancelled? Did she hear the Secretary of State for Transport say on the Radio 4 "Today" programme this morning that he was glad that the meeting had been cancelled? However inadvertently, he confirmed which side was telling the truth on this issue.

The Prime Minister: As I said yesterday, no meeting was needed and no meeting was agreed—[Interruption.] No meeting was needed and no meeting was agreed. I made that clear yesterday.

Mr. Greenway: Is it not to the eternal discredit of the Labour party—[Interruption.]

Mr. Speaker: Order. I hope that the hon. Gentleman will ask a question on the Prime Minister's responsibilities.

Mr. Greenway: Does my right hon. Friend agree that it is to the eternal discredit of the Labour party that it separated, when in government some 20 years ago, discussions on teachers' pay from discussions on conditions of service? Is it not that which has led to the damage to children's education today? Does my right hon. Friend agree that those circumstances must be reversed as soon as possible?

The Prime Minister: There have been several attempts to negotiate pay and conditions of service together. So far, all have failed. I agree that this has been to the detriment of the education system. We must make strenuous efforts this time to see that conditions of service and a pay structure that gives better teachers more pay are agreed.

Q5. Mr. Livsey asked the Prime Minister if she will list her official engagements for Thursday 16 january.

The Prime Minister: I refer the hon. Gentleman to the reply that I gave some moments ago.

Mr. Livsey: Turning from Britain to Wales, to the £200 million cut in education forecast in yesterday's expenditure White Paper and the 13 primary schools in Powys that are doomed to close, will the Prime Minister instruct the Secretary of State for Wales — [HON MEMBERS: "Reading."]—to increase the proposed rate support grant in Powys—[HON MEMBERS: "Reading."] — to the Welsh average from its present totally inadequate level for 1986-87?

The Prime Minister: I know that the hon. Gentleman feels strongly about education and about primary schools in his constituency. He knows full well that it is for local education authorities to determine the pattern for the provision of education. May I point out that his constituency, Powys, is favourably treated by the Welsh rate support grant. The block grant per head in Powys is 70 per cent. of expenditure compared with an average for the Welsh counties of 59 per cent. of expenditure. The disbursement of the amount is, of course, left to the local authority.

Questions to Ministers

Mr. Michael Heseltine (Henley): On a point of order, Mr. Speaker. Owing, perhaps, to my relative inexperience in the practices in which I now participate, may I refer you to the reply that my right hon. Friend the Prime Minister gave me in which she referred to a possible point of order? It would have been my fault if there was a misunderstanding, but I did hear the word "order". I was not addressing a point of order in any way to you, Mr. Speaker. If I created confusion, I apologise at once to the House. I was asking my right hon. Friend a serious question. Because it was overtaken by the concept that it might be a matter of order, I do not think that my right hon. Friend was able to answer it. Is it possible for that question to be answered now, as it is relevant and urgent? Events are taking place that could be influenced by my right hon. Friend's reply.

Mr. Speaker: I think that the Prime Minister may have misunderstood the question. It occurred to me that she thought it was a point of order addressed to me. In those circumstances, I think that the right hon. Member for Henley (Mr. Heseltine) might try again on Tuesday and get his answer then.

Mr. Stuart Bell (Middlesbrough): On a point of order, Mr. Speaker. Is it not a fact that, when a Secretary of State for Trade and Industry quotes from official documents, those documents should then be placed in the Library?

Mr. Speaker: Such documents should be laid, but in this instance I do not think that, there was a quotation from a document.

Mr. Heseltine: Further to the point of order, Mr. Speaker. I appreciate your generosity in suggesting that the answer should be asked again on Tuesday, but I would beg you to understand that meetings will take place before Tuesday to which the answer is relevant. I therefore would be grateful if I could ask that question now.

Mr. Speaker: It would be quite irregular for me to allow Question Time to go on. Virtually every day hon. Members feel that they have not got the answers that they wanted to their questions. The solution for the right hon. Gentleman would be to put down a written question today, to which he could get an answer tomorrow morning.

Mr. D. N. Campbell-Savours (Workington): Further to that point of order, Mr. Speaker. The issue is whether the quote was from an official document. If it was from an official document let it be placed in the Library. The question we are all asking is: was it a quote from an official document? If it was, will it be placed in the Library? That is the point that the right hon. Member for Henley (Mr. Heseltine) wishes to make. It is a perfect point of order and I ask that he be allowed to press it on the Floor.

Mr. Speaker: I have already dealt with this matter. [HON. MEMBERS: "No."] I have dealt with the matter. I have already said, and I say it again, that if Ministers quote from an official document, as opposed to paraphrasing an official document, it is our rule that that official document should be laid.

Mr. Richard Hickmet (Glanford and Scunthorpe): Further to that point of order, Mr. Speaker. May I ask for your guidance? Is it in order for the processes of the House to be abused by the Labour party through the preparation of a document in the Labour party office containing 12 planted questions—[HON. MEMBERS: "Oh."]—to be put today to my right hon. Friend the Prime Minister, to the Foreign Secretary and to the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry? Is this not a synthetic outrage being manufactured by the Labour party?

Mr. Max Madden (Bradford, West) rose——

Mr. Dennis Skinner (Bolsover) rose——

Mr. Speaker: Order. I have not seen that document.

Mr. Madden: Further to that point of order, Mr. Speaker. You said just now that you believed that the Prime Minister had misunderstood the question put by the right hon. Member for Henley (Mr. Heseltine). As I understood the question that he was seeking to put, he wished the House to know whether the quote made last night by the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry was a direct quote. Owing to the importance of this matter, which was the subject of a full day's debate yesterday, and of important events which are to take place tomorrow, perhaps you might allow the precedent, which occurs from time to time, for Ministers, including the Prime Minister, to answer particular questions. In today's circumstances, as you have said that you thought that the Prime Minister had misunderstood the question you might allow the question to be put again.

Mr. Peter Shore (Bethnal Green and Stepney): Further to that point of order, Mr. Speaker. This is almost a unique misunderstanding. I do not think I have ever heard a question put in the House to the Prime Minister which has been misinterpreted by the Prime Minister, or for that matter by any other Minister, as being a question to you in the Chair as a point of order. It is a material question. Obviously if the document was quoted from directly and can therefore be released, it would be a material matter affecting the public response to the various proposals that are before the Westland company. In these circumstances, and to resolve for the House and everyone concerned the difficulties we are in, surely it is possible for the Prime Minister now to be given leave to reply to the direct question.

The Prime Minister (Mrs. Margaret Thatcher): On a point of order, Mr. Speaker. I do not think I did misunderstand the question. The question as I understood it was that if there is an intended and direct quote from a document, and a speech gave a direct quote from a document, and said it was directly quoting from a document, the whole document should be laid. The first thing is, therefore, to check Hansard to see whether what was said was given as a direct quote from the document. That is the first thing that we must find out. What follows from that is a matter for the House, not for me.

Mr. Speaker: I think—[Interruption.] Order. I am on my feet. I think that the Prime Minister has dealt—[Interruption.] I think—[HON. MEMBERS: "No"] Order. It is not a matter for me. The Prime Minister has dealt very fairly—[Interruption.] Order. I believe that the right hon. Lady has dealt fairly with the question that was put to her, and which I confess I thought she may have misunderstood. I now understand that she did not misunderstand.

Several Hon. Members rose——

Mr. Speaker: Order. I am not taking any more points of order on this matter—[Interruption.] Order. These are not matters for me.

Several Hon. Members rose——

Mr. Speaker: Order. I was originally asked whether I would allow an answer to be given to the question. I said —and it was an act of generosity—that I would allow the right hon. Member for Henley (Mr. Heseltine) to put his question again on Tuesday. He replied that the matter was so urgent that it required an answer today. The Prime Minister has now given that answer. There is nothing more that I can do about the matter.

Mr. Neil Kinnock (Islwyn): Further to that point of order, Mr. Speaker. I believe that the way in which this matter has developed leaves you in an invidious position —clearly through no fault of yours. My understanding —and I think that it is generally shared among hon. Members—is that the right hon. Member for Henley (Mr. Heseltine) asked a question, during the course of which he used the word "order". I thought that he was addressing a question to the Prime Minister, asking whether she would give permission for him, as he put it, to finish a quotation. It was a request to the Head of a Government of whom, until last week, he had been a member.

That was misinterpreted not by the Prime Minister, as she has acknowledged, but more generally as being a question of order relating to the convention that if an official document is referred to during the course of the proceedings of the House, that document should appear in full in the Library.

My right hon. Friend the Member for Cardiff, South and Penarth (Mr. Callaghan) referred to this matter on Monday. I am speaking about the convention in general terms. The problem is that if a Minister refers to an official document, effectively that Minister can determine whether the document receives more general circulation by deciding whether to acknowledge that he is quoting directly from it.

That convention put you, Mr. Speaker, in an absolutely intolerable position because once such references are made, it is natural that other hon. Members—whether Opposition or Government—will ask under which set of rules they fall.

I am not making an appeal now, because you have made your decision clear, Mr. Speaker, and I would not ask you to reverse it. However, in the interests of the House, and as it is possible that the right hon. Member for Henley has overheard this exchange, he could rise on a further point of order and clarify precisely what he meant. Secondly, it may—[Interruption.]

Mr. Speaker: Order. I ask the House to allow me to hear the point of order.

Mr. Kinnock: Secondly, it may occur to the right hon. Member for Henley that there are other procedures, even during the course of this afternoon, that he might employ to secure an answer in this House.

If that were generally recognised, I am sure that we could terminate what might otherwise become an extremely long exchange of attempted points of order.

Mr. Cranley Onslow (Woking): Further to that point of order, Mr. Speaker. I think that the whole House clearly heard my right hon. Friend the Member for Henley (Mr. Heseltine) refer to column 1167 of yesterday's Hansard. Since a reading of that column nowhere suggests that my right hon. and learned Friend the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry was quoting from any document other than the notes of his speech, this is not a matter that should detain us any longer.

Mr. Speaker: I have the page from Hansard in front of me, and during the course of the exchanges I have been looking at it carefully. I cannot see that the right hon. and learned Gentleman quoted from any document yesterday. I say to the Leader of the Opposition that there is a distinction between referring to a document and quoting directly from it.

Official Report

Mr. Gavin Strang (Edinburgh, East): On a separate point of order, Mr. Speaker. I wish to draw to your attention what I believe is an important error in the Hansard report of the speech that I made last night explaining why I believed that the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry could no longer stay in office and the Government maintain the trust that should exist between Ministers and Parliament. Is this the appropriate time to draw that to your attention, or should I do so after the statements?

Mr. Speaker: If the hon. Gentleman would raise the matter after the statements, it would give me an opportunity to look into his speech. In order that I may do that with more accuracy, will he tell me in what way the report was inaccurate?

Mr. Strang: The passage can be found in column 1150 of Hansard dated 15 January. I was quoting the question which my hon. Friend the Member for Bolsover (Mr. Skinner) put to the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry on Monday. I believe that there is an important omission from that quotation, which is a direct quotation from Hansard dated Monday 13 January. I would be happy to explain the error more fully now, or I shall do so later if you wish to check Hansard.

Mr. Speaker: If the hon. Gentleman will allow me to check Hansard, I shall take his point of order after the statements.

Mr. Andrew Faulds (Warley, East): On a further point of order, Mr. Speaker. Since the Prime Minister was party to the deception practised on the House by the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry, who has since been to the House and made a rather limp apology, when will the right hon. Lady apologise to the House for her part in that deception?

Business of the House

3.47 pm

Mr. Neil Kinnock (Islwyn): May I ask the Leader of the House if he will state the business for next week?

The Lord Privy Seal and Leader of the House of Commons (Mr. John Biffen): Yes, Sir. The business for next week will be as follows:

MONDAY 20 JANUARY—Motions on the Rate Support Grant Report (England) 1986-87 (House of Commons Paper No. 140), the Rate Support Grant Supplementary Report (England) (No. 2) 1985-86 (House of Commons Paper No. 587) and the Rate Support Grant Supplementary Report (England) (No. 3) 1984-85 (House of Commons Paper No. 138).

Afterwards motion on the Welsh Rate Support Grant Report 1986-87 (House of Commons Paper No. 100).

TUESDAY 21 JANUARY—Until about seven o'clock, Second Reading of the Atomic Energy Authority Bill [Lords] followed by Second Reading of the Drug Trafficking Offences Bill.

WEDNESDAY 22 JANUARY—Remaining stages of the Local Government Bill.

Motions on the Rate Support Grant (Scotland) (No. 4) Order and the Revaluation Rate Rebates (Scotland) (No. 2) Order.

THURSDAY 23 JANUARY—Opposition day (4th Allotted Day). Until about seven o'clock there will be a debate entitled "The threatened closure of the Gartcosh steel mill". Afterwards there will be a debate entitled "Crisis in schools".

Both debates will arise on Opposition motions.

FRIDAY 24 JANUARY—Private Members' Bills.

MONDAY 27 JANUARY—Second Reading of the Airports Bill.

Mr. Kinnock: I thank the right hon. Gentleman. The hour and a half debate given to the Welsh rate support grant on Monday is a miserably short allocation of time considering the serious damage that Government public expenditure and economic policies are doing to communities in Wales. Even at this stage, will the right hon. Gentleman consider extending the time for that subject? When will the Roskill report on fraud trials be debated? When will the House have the opportunity to debate the public expenditure White Paper? May we know the date upon which the Chancellor of the Exchequer is to introduce his Budget?

Mr. Biffen: I shall respond to the final point first. My right hon. Friend the Chancellor expects to present his Budget on Tuesday 18 March. Perhaps we could discuss through the usual channels a question of the debate on the public expenditure White Paper. There will be, I hope, a debate on the Roskill recommendations on fraud in the reasonably near future. We could discuss through the usual channels how best to use our time on Monday on the rate support grant debates.

Mr. Patrick Cormack (Staffordshire, South): Can my right hon. Friend assure the House that there will be a statement on the Channel fixed link next week? Has the principle of it been endorsed by the full Cabinet?

Mr. Biffen: I am much touched and encouraged by the developing interest of my hon. Friend in the modalities of Cabinet government. I shall tell my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State for Transport of the interest that there should be a statement made as early as possible about developments concerning the Channel fixed link. I have no doubt that he will deal with the constitutional points made by my hon. Friend.

Mr. Jack Ashley (Stoke-on-Trent, South): Has the Leader of the House seen early-day motion 61?

[That this House notes that Crown immunity enables health authorities to flout the Health and Safety at Work Act and the Food Hygiene Regulations; is deeply concerned at growing evidence that hospital patients are suffering unnecessarily; believes that it is wrong in principle and deplorable in practice for Crown authorities to be above the law relating to welfare provision; and calls upon the Government to remove Crown immunity from all premises covered by the Health and Safety at Work Act and the Food Hygiene Regulations.]

It calls for the abolition of Crown immunity, which protects negligent health authorities. Is he aware that there has been yet another outbreak of salmonella poisoning in a hospital which has caused great damage to patients? Is he also aware that, unless Crown immunity is abolished, more hospital patients will be poisoned and some will die? May we have an early debate?

Mr. Biffen: I know that hon. Members on both sides of the House have been receiving a number of representations from local authorities on the point raised by the right hon. Gentleman; his long-standing interest in this matter is well known. I shall draw his remarks to the attention of my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State for the Environment.

Sir Dudley Smith (Warwick and Leamington): At last business question time my right hon. Friend invited me to repeat now the question that I put to him then. Has he a rough idea as to when we are likely to have the Second Readings of the Shops Bill and the Animal (Scientific Procedures) Bill? Can my right hon. Friend go any further today?

Mr. Biffen: Just one week further into the unknown, I am afraid. We are in need at this juncture of a little diversion, so I hope that my hon. Friend will not be too pessimistic about this.

Mr. David Steel (Tweeddale, Ettrick and Lauderdale): After the debate last night, the Leader of the House said on television not that there could be but that there would be an inquiry into the events discussed yesterday. Will he make a further statement on that next week, or can he tell us now what form the inquiry will take and when it will start?

Mr. Biffen: These matters are the responsibility of those involved in the departmental Select Committee. When I made that remark, I did so in the context of what had already been said by my right hon. Friend the Chairman of the Select Committee on Defence and also of the aspirations shown by my right hon. Friend the Chairman of the Select Committee on Trade and Industry.

Sir Kenneth Lewis (Stamford and Spalding): Will my right hon. Friend consider persuading my right hon. Friend the Chancellor of the Exchequer and the Cabinet to bring forward the Budget date by a fortnight, because it might bring us into calmer waters and give us some good news for a change? It would also be refreshing to deal with the Treasury instead of with the Ministry of Defence and the Department of Trade and Industry.

Mr. Biffen: And it would give us a fortnight's earlier revenue. The more that I reflect upon the suggestion of my hon. Friend, the more I fear that it will be thought that his suggestion was planted. However, although I regard it as imaginative, I believe it to be unlikely.

Mr. Don Dixon (Jarrow): Since 1979 the Prime Minister and her Cabinet have advised trade unionists in Britain not to be dictated to by their leaders and that the silent majority should stand up and be counted. Will the Leader of the House arrange a debate so that the House can give the same advice to the silent majority in the Cabinet?

Mr. Biffen: I am part of the constructive, progressive and forward-looking silent majority of the Cabinet.

Mr. John Stokes (Halesowen and Stourbridge): Is my right hon. Friend aware that in the real England, far away from the media-riddled area of Westminster and Whitehall, Her Majesty's Government continue to enjoy great support? Many ordinary people cannot understand why such an appalling fuss has been made about such a small item. Would it help if Ministers could reduce the present large legislative programme and spend more time putting the Government's message across to the country and also seeing a bit more of us here?

Mr. Biffen: As I had the experience of some years of industrial work in the midlands, I realise that the heart of England is truly in Halesowen. [HON. MEMBERS: "What about Oswestry?"] Oswestry is the rural axis with Halesowen that gives balance to our national life.

I take account of the exhortation that we should spend less time legislating in this Chamber and spend more time discussing the underlying political realities outside. I must say to my hon. Friend that that is a tempting offer, but every hon. Member knows that the fortunes of the Government are related also to the formidable legislative programme upon which we have embarked, and whatever happens, day by day or week by week, we intend to finish it.

Mr. Harry Ewing (Falkirk, East): Will the Leader of the House or the Minister with responsibility for the Civil Service come to the House as soon as possible next week to make a statement outlining the position of civil servants who work directly for Ministers? Does the Leader of the House accept that, because of the statement made at the Dispatch Box last night by the Secretary of State for Trade ad Industry in which he prayed in aid in support of his case three civil servants who work in his office, those civil servants are now placed in an impossible position to confirm or deny that the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry was telling the truth on their behalf? It is intolerable that the British Civil Service should be placed in such a position by incompetent Ministers.

Mr. Biffen: That is an unfair comment upon the difficulty that exists with civil servants. Civil servants, having made statements in good faith proximate to the time of the events, are now being castigated as having been suborned because their statements happen to validate the remarks made by my right hon. and learned Friend the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry, who has become the centre of a major political controversy. That is the difficulty in this matter for civil servants. I will of course consider the points made by the hon. Member and refer them to the relevant Minister.

Mr. Tony Marlow (Northampton, North): When the Select Committee considers the position of Westland plc and the history of that company, will it be appropriate for it to scrutinise not only the actions of the Government, but the actions of the former Secretary of State for Defence and, in particular, the nature and type of correspondence that he has had with foreign Governments and EC Commissioners subsequent to Government decisions that the Westland affair would be treated in an even-handed way? Will the Select Committee also scrutinise how it was that he or, if not him, my hon. Friend the Member for Birmingham, Selly Oak (Mr. Beaumont-Dark) knew on Monday morning at 11 o'clock that a letter had gone from British Aerospace to the Government and why, knowing that that letter had gone, did the former Secretary of State ask whether it had been received and not what was in it?

Mr. Biffen: I tread carefully in such matters. It is, of course, a matter for the departmental Select Committees involved to decide how they will proceed with investigations, but my right hon. and learned Friend the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry has said that he is most anxious to give evidence before such an inquiry. I have no doubt that my right hon. Friend the Member for Henley (Mr. Heseltine) will be likewise disposed.

Dr. Jeremy Bray (Motherwell, South): Is the Leader of the House aware that in anticipation of next Thursday's debate on the proposed closure of the Gartcosh steelworks the British Steel Corporation today gave notice to its employees there and announced the timetable for the cessation of production in advance of any report to the House of the Department of Trade and Industry's reply to the Select Committee's report? Is that not to treat the House with contempt? Will the Leader of the House undertake to draw the attention of the Department of Trade and Industry to that matter and ask BSC to desist until after the debate on Thursday?

Mr. Biffen: I certainly give an undertaking to refer the matter to my right hon. and learned Friend.

Mr. Roger Freeman (Kettering): Will my right hon. Friend bear in mind the fact that considerable interest is felt by Conservative Members in the future of the water industry — not just its possible privatisation but the introduction of universal metering? Will he bear in mind the fact that a debate in Government time on the future of that industry before the House rises for the Easter recess will be welcomed by many of my hon. Friends?

Mr. Biffen: I understand what my hon. Friend says. I am sure that he is right to say that his request is widely shared. I cannot be certain that Government time can be made available for that important topic. I shall of course continue to take account of what he has said and to inform my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State for the Environment.

Mr. Bryan Gould (Dagenham): Will the Leader of the House arrange for an early debate on the decision announced by the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry that he intends to convert the Patent Office into a non-departmental body, a decision which has caused great anxiety to its staff and clients?

Mr. Biffen: I note what the hon. Gentleman says. I understand, with his responsibilities in those matters, that he should raise the point. It could perhaps be considered through the usual channels.

Mr. James Hill (Southampton, Test): Will my right hon. Friend arrange a debate on the future of the United Kingdom's six free ports? They are being placed in some jeopardy by the draconian rules of the Collector of Customs and Excise. VAT imposts with the free ports are restricting trade and could well mean that what was an imaginative project will die through lack of Government support.

Mr. Biffen: My hon. Friend has made that subject very much his own. I admire the skill and pertinacity with which he pursues it. I cannot immediately offer any Government time for a debate. As it relates to the Government's fiscal behaviour, the Budget and its aftermath may provide him with his opportunity.

Mr. Roland Boyes (Houghton and Washington): Has the Leader of the House had an opportunity to read the book by John Walker entitled "The Queen has been pleased" in which Mr. Walker, to my satisfaction and that of many of my hon. Friends, has proved a relationship between the number of knighthoods and peerages awarded by the Prime Minister to industrialists and the size of the donation to the Conservative party of the industries with which they are involved. As the Prime Minister may have committed a serious crime under the terms of the Honours (Prevention of Abuses) Act 1925, will he ask the Attorney-General to tell the House when he will report the matter to the Director of Public Prosecutions with a view to the Prime Minister being arrested for it?

Mr. Biffen: I must confess that I have not read the book. As a good many of the contributions in the House proceed upon the basis of good-natured ignorance rather than detailed knowledge, I shall of course draw the matter to the attention of my right hon. and learned Friend the Attorney-General. I do not hold out much hope of the dramatic consequences mentioned by the hon. Gentleman.

Mr. John Carlisle (Luton, North): In view of today's publication of Mr. Justice Popplewell's report on crowd safety, football hooliganism and other related football matters, and the wide interest felt by Members on both sides of the House about those matters, will my right hon. Friend assure the House that there will be an early debate on that report and other attendant interests?

Mr. Biffen: In this uncertain and at times unhappy world, it is best to settle for the statement and then to see whether the conditions have been created thereafter which result in a popular request for a debate.

Mr. Dick Douglas (Dunfermline, West): May I refer the Leader of the House to early-day motions 302 and 306 about the position of Scottish miners who have been dismissed and who have gone before industrial tribunals?

[That this House notes the statements of the Secretary of State for Energy, and the Chairman of the National Coal Board, in which they encouraged dismissed miners to take their cases to industrial tribunals; notes also the recent decisions of the tribunals in which they have either ordered the reinstatement of dismissed miners or asked the National Coal Board to exercise clemency by reinstatement; deplores the failure of the National Coal Board to abide by the decisions of the industrial tribunals and specifically the deliberate decision of the Coal Board in Scotland not to reinstate any miners whose reinstatement has been ordered; condemns the failure of a public corporation responsible to the Government to abide by the decisions of industrial tribunals; and calls on the National Coal Board to enter into immediate negotiations with the National Union of Mineworkers with a view to securing a solution to the dispute over this matter which is endangering good industrial relations in the mining industry and prolonging bitterness within the coalfield communities.]

[That this House condemns the National Coal Board for its refusal to reinstate four dismissed miners in Scotland, having in mind that an industrial tribunal found that they were unfairly dismissed and recommended that the National Coal Board reinstate them in their employment in the coal industry; and calls upon Her Majesty's Government to remind the National Coal Board that it is a creature of Parliamentary Statute and that its attitude to these cases is an affront to Parliament.]

May I plead in aid some of the words that the Leader of the House used on television last night when he said that perhaps the only way to test the veracity of reports about some meetings would be to have a taped recording. With great presence of mind, one of my constituents took that to heart, because in discussions with the pit manager and other National Coal Board officials about his dismissal he took a tape recorder and recorded the proceedings. He was then able to prove to the tribunal that the coal board was maligning him and lying about him——

Mr. Speaker: Order. Will the hon. Member please ask a question?

Mr. Douglas: I am sorry, Mr. Speaker. Because of the importance of this matter and the great sense of unfairness, will the Leader of the House arrange for an early debate in Government time on this important issue?

Mr. Biffen: I cannot make any promise of an early debate in Government time, although I realise that this is an issue which is of considerable import to a number of people. I will draw the attention of my relevant right hon. Friends to the point that the hon. Gentleman makes. He may be able to take his cause a little further during employment Question Time next week.

Mr. Jonathan Aitken (Thanet, South): Will my right hon. Friend be kind enough to arrange an early debate on the latest Cabinet disagreement—the row between the French and British Cabinets over the Channel fixed link? Is my right hon. Friend aware that the latest state of play on the Channel, far from cordiale, project is that there is a complete impasse between a road and rail tunnel or a rail-only tunnel? Are not those matters which should not be left to Ministers alone but which should be given a fair ventilation in Parliament as soon as possible?

Mr. Biffen: I gave a cautious but carefully researched answer to my hon. Friend the Member for Stafordshire, South (Mr. Cormack) on that point. I cannot go beyond that.

Mr. Andrew Faulds (Warley, East): When will the right hon. Gentleman provide an opportunity for the House to debate the loss to the heritage of objects being disposed of by semi-public bodies such as universities and the churches upon which there is no restraint of export, a matter which is now much concerning those who work in the heritage world in Britain and who have those matters very much at heart?

Mr. Biffen: I thank the hon. Gentleman for the point that he made and I shall, of course, draw it to the attention of my right hon. Friend the Minister for the Arts.

Viscount Cranborne (Dorset, South): Is my right hon. Friend sympathetic to the idea of the Government introducing a motion in the House to set up a Northern Ireland Grand Committee on the Scottish model?

Mr. Biffen: As my hon. Friend will be aware, the recent agreement concluded with the Irish Government refers to some development of a parliamentary character involving the Irish Republic and the United Kingdom. In all such matters timing is probably almost as important as anything. A certain amount of measured procrastination is not necessarily bad.

Mr. Peter Hardy (Wentworth): The Leader of the House may be aware of the almost astonishing progress which has been made in the Gas Bill Standing Committee. Is he aware that his colleague, the Minister of State, courteously suggested to the Committee this morning that a sittings motion may be necessary? It would occupy the Committee on Tuesday. As the Leader of the House has announced a debate on the Second Reading of an energy Bill on Tuesday next week, which could well clash with the Standing Committee's extra sitting, does he realise that that would prevent those Opposition and Conservative Members who have a general energy interest from taking part in or attending the debate in the Chamber on Tuesday evening?

Mr. Biffen: I think the convention is that I am precluded from making observations about the business of Standing Committees. I will obviously take note of what the hon. Gentleman says.

Dr. Alan Glyn (Windsor and Maidenhead): Will the Leader of the House give some indication about when a resolution of the House might be made about shorter speeches? He assured me some time ago that it would be fairly soon.

Mr. Biffen: I certainly hope that it will be within the next few weeks.

Mr. Dave Nellist (Coventry, South-East): Will the Leader of the House tell us when he envisages the Government providing time to debate star wars so that not only the general opposition of the Labour party can be expressed, but so that we may also examine the suggestion floated this morning in The Times editorial? It may or may not have been the result of some sort of leak from this colander Cabinet and Government. It is that the Prime Minister backed the Sikorsky deal because of some sort of pay-off, some sort of kick-back, for continuation or promotion of star wars work in Britain.

Mr. Biffen: It is interesting to hear the hon. Gentleman refer to the editorial in The Times newspaper. I notice that he featured in the editorial columns of The Times this morning. It is gentrification before our very eyes. I take note of the importance of SDI. This is the time of year when the three individual Services debates take place, and

I am certain that there will be opportunities within the ambit of those debates to make the points that the hon. Gentleman has in mind.

Mr. Peter Bruinvels (Leicester, East): Will my right hon. Friend provide time for an early debate on twinning arrangements between local authorities and foreign countries? Is he aware that in Leicester, which is at the heart of England, already there is an arrangement to pair with Nicaragua and that a new plan is being arranged now that the African National Congress should be invited to Leicester on Palm Sunday to dedicate the Welford road recreation ground with its new name, the Nelson Mandela park? That is grossly offensive to all electors and ratepayers in Leicester.

Mr. Biffen: I am surprised they are not publishing an edition of postage stamps. The matters raised by my hon. Friend are important, but I cannot hold out the hope of early Government time for such a debate. He might wish to pursue such opportunity as is available to him as a private Member or, indeed, to discuss some of the fiscal aspects of this in the context of the rate support grant.

Dr. Norman A. Godman (Greenock and Port Glasgow): Will the right hon. Gentleman give sympathetic consideration to an early debate about the decision made at the beginning of this month by the then Secretary of State for Defence to award an order to Vickers Engineering and Shipbuilding Limited for the construction of three diesel electric submarines? That decision clearly reveals the confusion in the Government's defence and industrial policies, particularly in the light of impending privatisation of the warship yards.

Mr. Biffen: The hon. Gentleman brings to the attention of the House the points that he argued earlier this year and which have a direct constituency interest. I can best help by repeating what I pointed out to the hon. Member for Coventry, South-East (Mr. Nellist), which is that shortly we will have the Services debates and they will enable such points to be made.

Mr. Christopher Murphy (Welwyn Hatfield): May I draw to my right hon. Friend's attention early-day motion 220 standing in my name and that of many of my hon. Friends, about the abolition of standing charges?
[That this House would welcome early action to abolish the levying of public utility standing charges.]
Given the amount of understandable anxiety about the continuation of standing charges, will the right hon. Gentleman find time between now and Easter to enable the House to give its opinion on this subject?

Mr. Biffen: I will be absolutely candid with my hon. Friend. I see no likelihood of Government time being made available, but I will, of course, draw to the attention of my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State for Energy and to others the points he has just made.

Several Hon. Members rose——

Mr. Speaker: I will call those hon. Members who have been standing, but I ask for brief questions because two important debates and another statement are still to come.

Mr. Geoffrey Lofthouse (Pontefract and Castleford): I should like to ask about the public inquiry into the outbreak of salmonella poisoning at Stanley road hospital in which 19 people unfortunately lost their lives. People in my constituency and relatives, too, are becoming greatly concerned at the delay in making public the report. I understand the report is in the possession of the Government. Will the Leader of the House arrange for the report to be presented to the House and for a statement to be made by the appropriate Secretary of State?

Mr. Biffen: The hon. Gentleman raises a good and accurate point. I hope it will not be long before he is satisfied about the matter.

Mr. Tam Dalyell (Linlithgow): In response to the answer the right hon. Gentleman gave to the hon. Member for Luton, North (Mr. Carlisle), as one who gave written evidence and was called upon to give evidence to the Popplewell committee, may I ask whether the right hon. Gentleman accepts that these issues do not simply lend themselves to necessarily brief questions and answers from the Home Secretary's statement? Is it not important that the House should look at this complicated and, heaven knows, urgent subject? The right hon. Gentleman should arrange a debate during the next month or two.

Mr. Biffen: I take that point. I was merely trying to suggest to my hon. Friend that it is at least encouraging to have a statement and the possibility of questions arising. That does not, of course, preclude the consideration of a debate, But I must point out that we are moving towards the time when the affairs of the House are substantially devoted to the Budget and its subsequent legislation.

Mr. John Ryman (Blyth Valley): May I ask the Leader of the House to give attention as a matter of great urgency to the continuing farce of the independent colliery review which begins work next week hearing an appeal about a colliery in my constituency? Is he aware that officials from the National Coal Board have said, surprising as it might seem, that whatever the decision of the tribunal they reserve the right to refuse to accept the decision if it is unfavourable to the National Coal Board? Is it not extraordinary that, in a form of arbitration presided over by a senior and distinguished judge, one of the parties to the dispute says four days in advance of the hearing that if it does not like the decision it will refuse to abide by it? It is a scandalous state of affairs. On at least four occasions I have asked the Leader of the House to make a statement about this and on each occasion, with great ingenuity, he has skilfully avoided committing himself or the Government to any policy.

Mr. Biffen: I did not think my fumbling and inept performance on this topic hitherto deserved quite the accolade that it has just received, but it is bound to continue much in the same vein. I will refer the point to my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State for Energy, who has prime responsibility for these matters. I will also look elsewhere to see whether there is any other appropriate Government Department which should be charged with making a statement on the matter.

Mr. David Winnick (Walsall, North): Arising out of what the right hon. Member for Henley (Mr. Heseltine) said yesterday, will we have a statement next week on who it was from the Prime Minister's office that contacted the BBC to stop the interview with the right hon. Gentleman when he was Secretary of State for Defence? Was it the press secretary at No. 10? Is this not another example of the way in which the Prime Minister abuses her position?

Mr. Speaker: Order. We are dealing with business questions.

Mr. Winnick: Can we have a statement about whether this was done? If it was, was it the press secretary, and does the Leader of the House agree that it is important for us to have a statement. Putting such unfair pressure from No. 10 on the broadcasting authorities is quite clearly an abuse of the Prime Minister's authority.

Mr. Biffen: I have to say quite clearly that I have no plans for a statement on this subject being made next week. Of course, the House has plenty of other parliamentary opportunities, including questions.

Mr. Gavin Strang (Edinburgh, East): While recognising the importance of the debate on Gartcosh next Thursday in Opposition time, is the right hon. Gentleman aware of the sense of outrage in Scotland at the Government's attitude to the campaign to save Gartcosh? That attitude includes the Prime Minister's contemptuous refusal to meet the Gartcosh marchers and the refusal of the Secretary of State for Scotland to allow a debate in the Scottish Grand Committee in Edinburgh on Monday. Because Gartcosh is crucial to Ravenscraig which is crucial to Scotland's future as an industrial nation, may we have the assurance that there will be a proper debate in Government time on this whole issue, including the Government's response to the Select Committee report?

Mr. Biffen: I appreciate the very strong and genuine feelings that have been aroused over the proposed closure of Gartcosh, but there is the other side of the argument: the question of bringing about greater viability in the industrial structures of the United Kingdom, including Scotland. I am sure that those matters will be covered in next week's debate. I hope that that debate will enable the House to take account of the hon. Gentleman's points.

Mr. Max Madden (Bradford, West): Will the Leader of the House arrange for a Foreign Office statement next week? I ask for this statement because the Parliamentary Under-Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs, the hon. Member for Enfield, North (Mr. Eggar), recently made an important statement in Bangladesh concerning the requirement of Her Majesty's Government that the children of British citizens who intend to seek entry into this country should undergo genetic testing. There is considerable concern about this matter, including the cost, and whether these tests will be entirely voluntary. A statement would enable answers to these important questions to be given. It would also allow the Foreign Office to explain why it introduced in secret on 19 December a new entry clearance charge of £25 for those seeking settlement in this country and a fee of £12 for those seeking entry clearance as visitors to this country.

Mr. Biffen: I shall refer those points of substance to my right hon. and learned Friend the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs.

Mr. Dennis Skinner (Bolsover): Is the Leader of the House aware that the Prime Minister, in particular, among other Government Ministers, is adopting the growing practice of answering questions by saying that information cannot be given because of the disproportionate cost involved. Does the Leader of the House not think, because of all the talk about open government, especially in view of the furore that is taking place on another front, that it is the Government's duty to explain precisely their answers to simple questions? Is he aware, for instance, that this week there was an appalling situation when I asked the Prime Minister how many gifts she had received as Prime Minister and how many of those over the value of £75 she had retained, taking into account the allegation made in a national newspaper that she had received a bracelet costing several thousand pounds from the Sultan of Brunei, but she refused to explain how many gifts she had received.

Mr. Speaker: Order. I thought that the hon. Gentleman said that he would ask a short question.

Mr. Skinner: Well, it is a little bracelet.

Mr. Speaker: Will the hon. Gentleman at least ask the Leader of the House whether we can have a statement about the bracelet?

Mr. Skinner: In view of the fact that the Prime Minister will not answer these questions, will the Leader of the House bring her to the Dispatch Box and ask her to answer questions about what happened about the diamond-studded bracelet and all the other gifts that she will not disclose? There is, as the right hon. Gentleman knows, a rule that anything over £75 should not be retained by the Minister concerned.

Mr. Biffen: One of the most dangerous things in this House is the hon. Member for Bolsover in a fit of innocence or simplicity or in a fit of trying to get just a plain, honest, working man's answer to what otherwise is thought to be a tangled and exotic problem. I take note of what he says and I shall make the appropriate references. But I shall also reflect upon a point of real substance: the growing cost of questions in this House that are not necessarily related to the pursuit of open government, but are related to the existence of whole squadrons of research assistants. We have to ask ourselves whether this really is pursuing the investigative role of Parliament. On the whole, the hon. Member for Bolsover is not a great cost to the public purse as far as his questions are concerned. That is why I shall take his point with the seriousness that it merits.

Mr. Dalyell: On a point of order, Mr. Speaker. The easiest way to cut the cost of questions is to give truthful answers.

Mr. Speaker: Order. I do not think that that is a point of order for me.

Sports Grounds (Popplewell Report)

4.24 pm

The Secretary of State for the Home Department (Mr. Douglas Hurd): With permission, Mr. Speaker, I should like to make a statement on the final report of the inquiry into safety and control at sports grounds under the chairmanship of Mr. Justice Popplewell, which was published today. The statement is a little longer than I would have wished. It consists of 14 paragraphs. The inquiry was established following the fire at Bradford City football ground and the events at Birmingham City on 11 May 1985.

Now that the inquiry's work is completed, my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State for Scotland and I would like to renew the Government's gratitude to the chairman and his two assessors for the speed and conscientiousness with which they have discharged their difficult task. In addition to dealing with the events at the Heysel stadium in Brussels on 29 May and discussing the causes of hooliganism, the final report makes 15 recommendations on crowd safety and crowd control.

On crowd control, there are a number of recommendations about the maintenance of order at football grounds: wider powers of police search and arrest; a new offence of disorderly conduct at sports grounds, and a review of the recent alcohol legislation as it applies to executive boxes. Continued progress with membership schemes is also recommended.

The Police and Criminal Evidence Act which came into force on 1 January has already extended the police powers of search and of arrest in ways which will help them deal with troublemakers at football grounds. I shall examine Mr. Justice Popplewell's recommendations for further powers when we see how the new Act works in practice.

On disorderly conduct, the Public Order Bill, to which the House gave a Second Reading on Monday, seeks to create a new offence which will cover hooliganism in football grounds, as elsewhere. I shall consider the recommendation for a wider offence when we see how the offence in the Bill — disorderly conduct — works in practice.

The Government have already taken a number of steps to deal with forms of misconduct about which Mr. Justice Popplewell expresses particular concern. The Public Order Bill seeks to implement a recommendation in his interim report that the possession of smoke bombs and similar devices at sports grounds be made an offence. We have taken action to ban some other items which may be used as missiles. The alcohol legislation which was passed last summer makes it an offence to be in possession of a drinks can or bottle in any area of the grounds from which the pitch may be viewed direct.

During the proceedings in the House, representations were made about the effect on the revenue which clubs derive from executive boxes. The Government undertook to monitor the situation, and I have received some information from the Football League and representations from a number of right hon. and hon. Members. I have asked for more information from the football authorities and will wish to consider that carefully, in the light of what Mr. Justice Popplewell says, before deciding whether to allow some relaxation of the controls on alcohol in executive boxes. I shall report my conclusions to the House while the Public Order Bill is before Parliament.

On membership cards, we fully endorse Mr. Justice Popplewell's recommendation. The Public Order Bill contains provisions to enable the courts to ban convicted football hooligans from attending matches. This shows our determination to do what we can to keep troublemakers away from football grounds and to restore the good name of British football. It needs to be matched, in our view, by equally determined action by the football clubs and the football authorities. My right hon. Friend the Prime Minister has emphasised to them the value of an effective membership card system. The football authorities have made some progress on this. In the light of the exclusion order scheme in the Public Order Bill, I hope that they will now redouble their efforts.

I deal now with crowd safety. We accept the need to strengthen urgently the measures already announced by and taken following my predecessor's statements on 13 May and 24 July.

We accept the recommendation that all sports grounds and sports stadiums in England and Wales with accommodation for more than 10,000 spectators and where association football, rugby league, rugby union and cricket are played which are not already designated under the Safety of Sports Grounds Act 1975 should be so designated. Consultations will begin immediately with the sports authorities and organisations concerned with a view to introducing the necessary orders as quickly as possible, and certainly by the summer of this year.

In Scotland, my right hon. Friend intends to introduce similarly, as soon as he can, an order designating stadiums of clubs with accommodation for more than 10,000 spectators in the first and second divisions of the Scottish Football League.

We also accept the principle of the recommendations that safety controls should be extended to all sports grounds and stadiums with stands for over 500 spectators and to indoor sports facilities with accommodation for over 500 spectators where adequate controls do not already exist. We need more facts about this. The present information that we hold at the centre is limited to stadiums and grounds with accommodation for 5,000 or more, and indoor premises with an overall capacity of more than 1,000.

The first step will be to establish the full practical effects of these recommendations. All the relevant local and fire authorities in England, Wales and Scotland are to be invited to inspect all such stands and premises not previously inspected, and to report on them to my right hon. Friend and myself. Powers are already immediately available under both the Safety of Sports Grounds Act 1975 and the Fire Precautions Act 1971 to deal with any exceptional hazard which might be found in the course of these inspections. Similarly, chief fire officers and firemasters will be invited to keep under review the places that they inspected under previous initiatives last year, with the object of maintaining safety standards at those places.

When we have considered these inspections we shall quickly issue a consultative document and propose ways of achieving the objectives of the inquiry's final report, fitting this into the review already under way on the future of the Fire Precautions Act. Further legislation may well prove necessary. There will be no avoidable risk meanwhile, because any necessary emergency action can be taken under existing powers.

So far, happily, the figures this season show an improvement in the number of arrests and ejections from football grounds. Our measures against hooliganism should have a cumulative effect, but it is too soon to be satisfied. We have to deal not only with hooliganism, but with safety; not only with football grounds, but with sports grounds in general. Thanks in large part to Mr. Justice Popplewell and his colleagues, I believe that we are on the right track.

Mr. Gerald Kaufman (Manchester, Gorton): I congratulate Mr. Justice Popplewell on his second report. His recommendations for the improvement of fire safety precautions and the plugging of gaps in them and in the legislation are both welcome and necessary, and I trust that the Government will lose no time in implementing them. Where legislation is necessary, we will facilitate it. The new and highly unsatisfactory building regulations of November 1985 must be changed as a matter of urgency, and I ask for an assurance that this will be done.

The Home Secretary is prudent in his approach to the proposed new criminal offences, but I am sorry that he said nothing about the proposal in the interim report for a specific offence of chanting racist abuse. The football authorities and the overwhelming majority of fans agree that racism is an obscenity that must be expunged from football and from other sports. I ask the Home Secretary whether this is covered by clause 19 of the Public Order Bill. It is is not, will he amend the Bill to include it?

Is the Home Secretary really satisfied with the position under the Public Order Bill under which the Government have decided not to exclude convicted hooligans from matches played abroad, including World Cup matches? The Home Secretary spoke of the need to restore the good name of British football. Surely this is nowhere more necessary than when violent louts travel abroad and sully the reputation of British fans.

The Opposition are content with the recommendation for a review of section 3(3) of the Sporting Events (Control of Alcohol Etc.) Act, but we insist that it be carried out on the basis of the criteria laid down by my right hon. Friend the Member for Birmingham, Small Heath (Mr. Hattersley) last July, when he said:

"We want equity. There should be no difference between the working man on the terrace having his half pint with his pie and people in boxes having wine with their meals."—[Official Report, 3 July 1985; Vol. 82, c. 448.]

One curious gap in the Home Secretary's statement was his failure to mention closed circuit television, which Mr. Justice Popplewell firmly recommended last July and which the previous Home Secretary strongly endorsed. Far too little progress has been made, with only 21 per cent. of grounds being covered by closed circuit TV. One reason for this unsatisfactory progress is lack of money. Even the richest clubs face problems, and the less affluent have simply no chance of raising the revenue to comply with Mr. Justice Popplewell's recommendations. In his statement the Home Secretary made no mention of these financial obstacles, so I repeat the commitment of the Labour party to create a football levy board, which would return to the game some of the massive revenue that the Treasury extracts from it.

So far this season there has been a distinct improvement inside the grounds. I congratulate the football authorities and the police on what they have achieved in helping to rescue the reputation of a vital and popular national sport. As Mr. Justice Popplewell points out, however, the problems of violence and hooliganism are moving outside the grounds and are being seen ever more clearly as just one alarming and depressing manifestation of the sickness of violence that is afflicting Britain. We cannot be satisfied until we have set our hand to eradicating not only the violence itself but the underlying causes, which are far too deeply rooted in our society.

Mr. Hurd: I am grateful to the right hon. Gentleman for the general tone of what he said.

I understand that my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State for the Environment is looking carefully at the building regulations, and the right hon. Gentleman may want to pursue the matter elsewhere.

As the right hon. Gentleman would have wished, we gave very careful thought to the question of racist chanting. Part III of the Public Order Bill will extend the existing offence of incitement to stir up racial hatred to conduct intended to do so. I hope that that will be particularly significant when we come to the kind of shouting that mars football matches. We thought it more sensible to concentrate on that—the details of it will be discussed in Committee—than to create a wider offence which would be confined to football matches and would be very difficult to enforce.

I take the right hon. Gentleman's point about exclusion orders. He was a little sceptical about them on Monday, but he seems a little more enthusiastic about them today, because he wants them extended to foreign fields. There would be difficulty in implementing them, but it is a point that we can perfectly reasonably discuss in Committee.

From what I have heard—I come new to this subject—I am a little puzzled about the Opposition's attitude to executive boxes. There is quite strong pressure from the clubs for a relaxation. I have not announced a relaxation today, but the pressure for it has come from both sides of the House, and I am not quite clear where the Labour party stands on this issue. There will be opportunities to discuss this before we are much older.

The right hon. Gentleman, perfectly understandably, homed in on finance. The general principle that people who are offering the public entertainment or sport should be prepared to do so in conditions which are clearly and evidently safe is a general one which most people would accept. My hon. Friend the Under-Secretary of State for the Environment, the Minister with responsibility for sport, who is here, had a working group which looked into the financial implications for football. The Football Trust, as the right hon. Gentleman knows, has done valuable work and assumed valuable responsibilities in this context. I cannot go further than that.

Mr. Patrick Jenkin (Wanstead and Woodford): Will my right hon. Friend say more about the introduction of membership cards? Is he satisfied that the football authorities are determined to introduce a scheme, or are they still just going through the motions because they do not want to do it?

Mr. Hurd: As I said, they have made some progress in recent times. The latest figure that I have—I would not vouch for it being absolutely up to date—is that 15 clubs out of the 92 have introduced, or are about to introduce, membership schemes which cover at least 50 per cent. of their ground capacity. I know that my right hon. Friend has a close interest in this matter. We would like to see greater progress.

Mr. Michael Foot (Blaenau Gwent): I join my right hon. Friend the Member for Manchester, Gorton (Mr. Kaufman) in welcoming most of the proposals. I am especially glad to hear that the daft idea that people be prevented from attending away games of football, as a solution to the problem, has been dropped.

May I press the right hon. Gentleman on the financial question? If no money is coming in in one form or another —plenty of money is being made from football, as my right hon. Friend said — and if no money is to be provided for carrying through, at the necessary speed, the real safety programme, many clubs, particularly the small ones, will be hit again and again, and many will be driven out of business. I urge the Home Secretary to look at the whole of this matter again and come back with a proposal which will enable all clubs, large and small, to make their grounds safe in a measureable time—say two years.

Mr. Hurd: Before I answer the right hon. Gentleman, I apologise to the right hon. Member for Gorton for not answering his question about closed circuit television. The latest figures that I have show that of 42 clubs in the first and second divisions of the football league, 25 have closed circuit television, and that nine out of the 10 clubs in the Scottish premier division have it or are having it installed. In addition, there are the three, I hope by now famous, Home Office "hoolivans", which are doing valuable work. That is progress, although there is room for more.

I listened to the speech of the right hon. Member for Blaenau Gwent (Mr. Foot) in our debate on the Public Order Bill, and I understand how strongly he feels about the matter. I must refer back to the working group of my hon. Friend, which considered the financing of safety improvements at Football League grounds; that is, at the 92 grounds where the professional game is played. Its preliminary conclusions are that the clubs, together with the Football Grounds Improvement Trust, can fund the cost of the work over a five-year period. The FGIT is funded by the Football Trust, which in turn is funded by the Football Pools Promoters Association. My hon. Friend and the sports councils are open to representation and are willing to give advice on these matters, but so far progress has been reasonally good.

Sir Hector Monro (Dumfries): I congratulate Mr. Justice Popplewell on his report, and my right hon. Friend on his speedy response to it. Will he be careful not to make any change in the alcohol restriction until the end of the season, to see whether the much improved behaviour is continued through to the end of the World Cup? May I suggest that with the complexity of modern world sport there is a good case for the Minister with responsibility for sport having overall responsibility for crowd safety, sports and international events, rather than having his responsibilities spread over three Departments?

Mr. Hurd: I thought my hon. Friend was about to suggest that he should be responsible for these matters in Scotland. I am in difficulties about the alcohol restriction. If we are to have a relaxation, the natural vehicle for it is the Public Order Bill, which had its Second Reading on Monday. I said that I would give my conclusions to the House during its passage, so that if the House generally believed that the restriction should be relaxed, it could be relaxed without delay. That runs counter to the greater caution recommended by my hon. Friend, but it is a reasonable compromise between those who want immediate relaxation and those who hold my hon. Friend's view.

Mr. Clement Freud (Cambridge, North-East): Will the Minister accept that one cannot have safety on the cheap? Further to the statement of the right hon. Member for Blaenau Gwent (Mr. Foot), does the Minister accept that considerable sums are slushing around in football and that taxing transfer fees or finding the available money would be a more sensible way of ensuring safety than would hitting the dwindling numbers of supporters, and punishing small clubs which cannot afford the improvements? Will he give the House his statistics on the diminution of violence and ejections? Is it not simply the case that he has compared the beginning of this season with the end of last season?

Mr. Hurd: I note what the hon. Gentleman says about finance. I do not wish to repeat the reply that I have already given which shows that the machinery at work and the funds available seem capable of financing the safety work. If certain sports have particular problems, it seems reasonable that they should go to the sports councils or my hon. Friend the Minister for advice. The hon. Gentleman will accept that my figures are incomplete. According to the Metropolitan police department, until 11 January 1986 the number of ejections and arrests from football grounds in London was 1,470, compared with 2,652 last year—a reduction of 44 per cent. In Greater Manchester gates have increased by 6 per cent., and arrests and ejections have decreased by 56 per cent.—that is on a December comparison. The hon. Gentleman is right to be cautious, and I was cautious in my comments. Neverthless, so far the record this season has considerably improved.

Sir Dudley Smith (Warrington and Leamington): May I call my right hon. Friend's attention specifically to the fact that the biggest problem may be the number of people who arrive at a ground having consumed an excessive amount of alcohol? Is he aware of the great unfairness between clubs over the provision of alcohol? In some clubs it is available in hospitality suites and at certain bars of the grounds, whereas in others no drink is supplied, not even in the boardroom. As there have been no examples of trouble arising from the provision of alcohol in executive suites, will my right hon. Friend reconsider the matter, bearing in mind the income of clubs?

Mr. Hurd: That point was widely discussed during the passage of the Bill last Session. Parliament deliberately included in the Bill a wide measure of local options so that local magistrates could consider, on local criteria and arguments, the case for exemptions from the general rule. That has happened, with the result which my hon. Friend criticises. It is a reasonable principle that local magistrates should have that facility.

Mr. Tom Pendry (Stalybridge and Hyde): Does the Home Secretary accept that most football supporters are likely to accept the recommendations of Mr. Justice Popplewell? Does he further accept that most football clubs will be disappointed with his response, in particular to recommendation 14, which relates to the Sporting Events (Control of Alcohol Etc.) Act 1985, especially in view of the Minister of State's reply on 3 July? I asked the hon. Gentleman when he was likely to make a judgment after the monitoring of the Bill and he replied:

"It would be sensible if we saw the Bill in action over the most part of this coming season, or at least half of it . . . That might allow us, if we were so minded, and after discussion . . . to introduce amendments through other legislation . . . The hon. Gentleman can take it from me that we shall monitor this because we recognise that if football were to be starved of funds for its improvement and rehabilitation, that would be a worry."—[Official Report, 3 July 1985; Vol. 82, c. 458.]

Will the Home Secretary recognise that that evidence has been forthcoming from the all-party football committee, the Football League and many others, and that unless, before next season, clubs have the knowledge that the restriction will be amended by the Public Order Bill, many executive boxes will be unfilled, and many clubs will be starved of their funds?

Mr. Hurd: I understand the hon. Gentleman's point, which he has put strongly on many occasions. It is different from the view of the Labour Front Bench. We are doing precisely what my hon. Friend said we would do, which is monitoring how the position develops, and what effect the rule has primarily on grounds, and on clubs' finances. We have some information, but we are asking for more. I have already explained that we thought that a reasonable compromise was to give our conclusions while the Public Order Bill was still before the House so that if hon. Members felt that there should be a relaxation, we could proceed accordingly. We can give our views on that.

Mr. Geoff Lawler (Bradford, North): Although it has taken a major tragedy to bring it about, we have a report which, if all its recommendations are implemented, will mean that all spectators at sporting events in future can feel confident that all that can be done will be done to ensure their safety. The people of Bradford and elsewhere will be grateful to Mr. Justice Popplewell for that. Will my right hon. Friend review the point in the report that the same venue can be used for both sporting and entertainment purposes, but that different safety standards can apply? Will he review the necessary legislation to amend that anomaly?

Mr. Hurd: That point was not covered in my statement, and I shall certainly look further into the matter which my hon. Friend, who represents a Bradford constituency, raises.

Mr. Peter Snape (West Bromwich, East): May I, as one who watches professional soccer as often as possible, assure the Home Secretary that most of us welcome the recommendations of the Popplewell inquiry? One point that appears to have been overlooked in the report is the question of football supporters travelling by coach. Many coaches arrive at the destination town, although not necessarily the football ground, sometimes hours before the kick-off, and similarly on the way back many coaches stop short of their destination, thus enabling many supporters to consume perhaps a large amount of alcohol.

I support my hon. Friend the Member for Stalybridge and Hyde (Mr. Pendry) in his plea for the abolition of the illogical alcohol ban in executive boxes. Notwithstanding the voting propensities of those who use the boxes, the fact is that most of them do not rampage around the town in the way that some football supporters do. We ought to remember that this ban is penalising clubs, such as West Bromwich Albion, which have spent many hundreds of thousands of pounds in providing executive boxes.

Lastly, I ask the Home Secretary to look again at the question of a football betting levy board. Surely the game of working people ought to be treated in the same way as racing, the so-called sport of kings?

Mr. Hurd: There is obviously something in the hon. Gentleman's first point, but I do not think that it can be solved by changing the law again. It is surely mainly a matter for co-operation between the police and the coach operators, but let us look further into that.

I note what the hon. Gentleman said about executive boxes. He has to deal with the argument of equity; the argument which his right hon. Friend the Member for Gorton was putting. Indeed, the House too will have to deal with the point in due course. I do not think that a case has been made for a new system of the kind put forward by the Labour party and by the hon. Member for West Bromwich, East (Mr. Snape).

Several Hon. Members rose——

Mr. Speaker: Order. I propose to allow questions to continue for a further 15 minutes. I hope that in that time every hon. Member wishing to ask a question will be called. I ask for brief questions, as two important debates are to be held thereafter.

Mr. Max Madden (Bradford, West): Can the Home Secretary say when the promises made by the Prime Minister and the former Minister with responsibility for sport that Bradford City football club would receive additional financial assistance to rebuild its ground will be honoured?

Mr. Hurd: I shall have to look into that, and either my hon. Friend or I will let the hon. Gentleman know.

Mr. John Wheeler (Westminster, North): While warmly welcoming the Popplewell report, may I ask my hon. Friend to look in particular at recommendation 4 in the final report, about responsibility for safety going to one local authority; and, in the interim report, at the important recommendation that police radio systems be improved?

Mr. Hurd: I should like to reflect further on the first point. I fully agree with the second. We are following that up.

Mr. Toby Jessel (Twickenham): Can my right hon. Friend give any figures for disturbances in the current season? Will he take note of the contrast between the rather better standard of conduct that one might find at a rugby football ground, such as Twickenham, and the rather lower standard of behaviour at some soccer grounds?

Mr. Hurd: I would not dream of entering on the second comparison, because I think that I could not easily escape from it.

On the first point. I have given the House the figures that I have, which are in terms not so much of disturbances as of arrests and ejections. I think that that is the handiest way of giving the figures. I have done that in respect of both the Metropolitan police district and Greater Manchester. They show a welcome improvement.

Mr. Harry Ewing (Falkirk, East): I echo the word of caution that my right hon. Friend the Member for Blaenau Gwent (Mr. Foot) entered. There is a danger that we could impose conditions on clubs—be they football, rugby or cricket clubs—which the clubs simply could not meet financially, and we would not achieve anything by putting them out of existence. Is the Home Secretary seriously suggesting that we should designate clubs such as Stranraer, Cowdenbeath and Berwick Rangers in Scotland where there is never more than a total of 300 or 400 people at the game? Would it not be better to continue with the present arrangement in Scotland whereby the grounds that are not designated are subject to crowd control limits by police on occasions when there are larger than normal sporting events?

Mr. Hurd: I am not sure that the hon. Gentleman has grasped what I was announcing, and I do not blame him — it is complicated. Almost all the big football and rugby league fields are already designated. What I have announced today will cover about eight cricket grounds, about 20 rugby union grounds, about 18 football grounds outside the league in England and Wales, and I think about 25 in Scotland, but the test is a capacity of over 10,000. Most of these grounds are for designation, and all these grounds have been covered as a result of the inspections that took place after May last year. I imagine that in the great majority of them any necessary work is already in hand or is being planned. What I have announced about designation, and what Mr. Justice Popplewell recommended in this respect, is a completing and tidying up operation, rather than a large new development.

Mr. John Carlisle (Luton, North): Will my right hon. Friend accept the conclusion in paragraph 4.86 that the effect of the Sporting Events Control of Alcohol etc. Act 1985 — about which there has been a chorus this afternoon, quite rightly—on clubs will be "little short of disastrous"? Will he appreciate that this revenue which is not coming into the game could have been used for the improvement of grounds? Will he give urgent consideration to a review of the Act? If he does not act well before the end of the season, plans will be laid for next season which will have the same effect and that money will not be available for the clubs. May we please have an early debate on the whole subject?

Mr. Hurd: I understand the force of what my hon. Friend says. As he rightly points out, it was endorsed by Mr. Justice Popplewell and, indeed, by at least two Opposition Members, so we shall certainly have to come back to this. What I would ask is that the clubs give us more precise facts and figures to back up their argument.

My hon. Friend put the question of a debate to the Leader of the House during business questions, and I shall be in touch with my right hon. Friend about it. However, I should not like to make any definite promise, given that there will be other opportunities to discuss several aspects of the matter, including the one mentioned by my hon. Friend.

Mr. Terry Lewis (Worsley): Further to the reply to my hon. Friend the Member for Stalybridge and Hyde (Mr. Pendry), and touching upon the question asked by the hon. Member for Luton, North (Mr. Carlisle), there was a firm promise by the Minister of State that there would be a review and a report would be made halfway through the Session. We are now over halfway through the Session, people are making plans and revenue will be lost between now and the end of the season in advance bookings for executive boxes. The Minister of State and other Members have visited Manchester United and seen the problem. I believe that a firm promise was made to that club. I urge the Home Secretary to move rather faster than he is now indicating to the House he intends to do.

Mr. Hurd: I think that what I indicated to the House is on all fours with what my hon. Friend said previously. That is what he said we would do, and that is what we are doing. We will give our conclusions while the Public Order Bill is before the House. The hon. Gentleman should have a word with his right hon. Friend the Member for Gorton about the attitude of the Opposition Front Bench on this matter.

Mr. Nicholas Soames (Crawley): I draw my right hon. Friend's attention to page 60 at 5.90, where it says at sub-paragraph II (a):

"Thus those not particularly given to violence witness violence in others and see it being exercised, without let or hindrance."

Does my right hon. Friend agree that the conduct of the players in this case is regularly far from exemplary? They jump all over each other, they hug and kiss each other, and they fight each other. It is not conducive to good conduct on the terraces. Will he see what he can do, in consultation with the Football Association, to tighten discipline in this respect?

Mr. Hurd: I think that it would be a little difficult to draft a clause to cover all the activities to which my hon. Friend refers. This clearly must be a matter for those within the sport, and I am sure that they will have noticed what Mr. Justice Popplewell has said, and the way in which my hon. Friend has endorsed it.

Mr. Robert Maclennan (Caithness and Sutherland): Why has the Home Secretary not accepted Mr. Justice Popplewell's strongly expressed view that the safety of undesignated buildings and stadiums should be the responsibility of one authority? The right hon. Gentleman says that he has powers to deal with emergencies while inspections are being carried out, but Mr. Justice Popplewell doubted whether all indoor activities, in Scotland in particular, were covered by such powers, and he asked for a review of the powers. Has that review been set in train?

Mr. Hurd: We are reviewing that aspect. We are in a difficulty over timing, because there is a strong case for revising the 1971 Act in relation to fire safety and control. We are in the middle of doing that and we might ask the House to consider proposals during this Parliament. Mr. Justice Popplewell's proposal for further use of the 1971 Act comes in the middle of the review, so that an awkwardness is caused. If the hon. Gentleman studies my complicated statement he will see how we are trying, procedurally, to find a way through that awkwardness, which involves indoor sports as well as others. I have neither accepted nor rejected the proposal which the hon. Gentleman mentioned at the beginning of his question, so we shall come back to it.

Mr. James Couchman (Gillingham): I do not want to do the question of money to death, but the great aspiration of the club in my constituency is promotion from the third to the second division. It does not pay high wages, and it pays no large transfer fees. It is a responsible club, which has taken on many recommendations, but the Popplewell recommendations will put further severe financial restraints on its activities. Will my right hon. Friend and the Chancellor of the Exchequer consider the possibility of giving back to football more of the money that goes to the football pools?

Mr. Hurd: That is a long-standing suggestion, supported by aficionados of the game, but it does not seem to be making much headway. My hon. Friend should obtain the facts and figures for his club, to illustrate the difficulties which he foresees. The work that my hon. Friend the Under-Secretary of State has accomplished with his working group suggests that necessary work in the 92 areas on which he has been concentrating can be undertaken with existing resources, but the sports councils and my hon. Friend are available to advise on how necessary work can be done.

Mr. Tam Dalyell (Linlithgow): I praise the imaginative way in which the Popplewell inquiry went about its work. May I also draw attention to the sad story of the opaque glass panels mentioned in paragraph 4.88, because Scotland's leading club, Heart of Midlothian, has had to erect a panel so that people having a drink cannot watch the game. Is that not absurd? How much will clubs lose if something is not done about the stormy and difficult problem of executive eating places? What about the "casuals" mentioned in the report?

Mr. Hurd: The hon. Gentleman asks about loss of revenue because of the rules for executive boxes. I am asking for the figures. I have anecdotal figures, but we need more if we are to overcome the equity objection. We are being asked from several parts of the House to distinguish between people in executive boxes and people on the terraces. We do not want to create the impression that people in executive boxes are more law-abiding than the many thousands—the majority—on the terraces. I am not endorsing the argument, but summarising the argument that prevails, not least because of the advocacy of the right hon. Member for Gorton when the Bill was being discussed. We must examine the matter again when we have the necessary figures.

I had not heard of the "casuals" until my attention was drawn to the relevant paragraph in the report. I understand from Scottish colleagues that there is close co-operation between the police in Scotland and the clubs in dealing with that serious mischief.

Mr. Tony Favell (Stockport): A compulsory system under which one must produce a membership card before entering a ground is clearly impracticable, especially at large grounds. Does not the difficulty and expense of such a system demonstrate the desirability of having national identity cards for everyone? In view of hon. Members' interest in everything European, I remind the House that many countries in Europe operate a national identity card system.

Mr. Hurd: That suggestion is made in various contexts these days. Any Government would have great difficulty in persuading Parliament of the need for such a restriction. Limited but welcome progress has been made by the Football League and by clubs in introducing membership card systems which cover at least 50 per cent. of ground capacity. That is what the football authorities asked them to do. Particularly because of the proposal for exclusion orders which the football authorities have welcomed, and because we are doing our bit in the Public Order Bill to help, we hope that the clubs will do their bit to accelerate and perhaps take more seriously the membership card system proposal.

Mr. Gavin Strang (Edinburgh, East): Is the Home Secretary aware that the answers that he gave to my right hon. Friend the Member for Blaenau Gwent (Mr. Foot) and to other hon. Members on both sides of the House show a certain complacency towards the financial crises affecting clubs in England and Wales, and particularly those in Scotland? Does he accept the importance of the football game to our people? Does he recognise that it is not just a matter for the Chancellor of the Exchequer or the Secretary of State for the Environment, because he has responsibility for securing money, either through public subsidy or from the football pools, to help clubs to improve their grounds for safety and other reasons?

Mr. Hurd: The hon. Gentleman neglects an additional principle, which is that when any body offers entertainment or sport to the community its basic responsibility is to ensure that the entertainment or sport is conducted in safe conditions. That is a basic, underlying responsibility of those taking the initiative and organising the game or entertainment.

However, realising that there might be a problem, my hon. Friend the Under-Secretary took the initiative on football in his working group, which suggested that it would be wrong to exaggerate the scale of the problem. It would also be wrong to exaggerate the new requirements or impositions which I announced today. There may be a problem in some cases and that is why my hon. Friend and the sports councils are available for consultation.

Mr. Richard Hickmet (Glanford and Scunthorpe): May I draw my right hon. Friend's attention to paragraph 5.87 and Mr. Justice Popplewell's conclusion that the evidence does not support the proposition that unemployment and violence at football grounds are connected? People will expect the courts to hand out adequate sentences to violent offenders, so does not that proposition have significance when we discuss the problem of violence generally?

May I also put in a plea for small football clubs, such as Scunthorpe United, which is operated by people who are not after profit? That club's capacity might be over 10,000, but the gate is usually less than 2,000. Onerous financial obligations will be placed upon such clubs through having to take new fire and safety precautions.

Mr. Hurd: I am glad that my hon. Friend has drawn attention to paragraph 5.87 of the report. As regards the football club in his constituency, I repeat the advice that I have given to others. If the capacity at the ground is much greater than the numbers who go to the ground, the club may well have the option to restrict its capacity and so come below the level. That is the type of semi-technical problem on which the club may well need advice, and which it will receive.

Mr. John Ryman (Blyth Valley): As one of the leading football clubs in the country, Blyth Spartans, is in my constituency, may I ask the Secretary of State to consider one point which has not been dealt with? This is the question of enforcement. He no doubt appreciates from his earlier experience as Minister of State, Home Office the great difficulties that racecourses have in enforcing exclusions on people who have been warned off racecourses for nefarious reasons. What specific proposals does the Secretary of State have to ensure that football clubs are able to enforce entrance bans to their grounds?

Mr. Hurd: One will never achieve 100 per cent. enforcement. However, as the arrangements to deal with such problems grow—closed circuit television and the circulation of photographs—people will be increasingly detereed from the kind of hooliganism which mars the game.

Mr. Peter Bruinvels (Leicester, East): I welcome the national membership scheme, and Leicester City was one of the pioneers in instituting it.

May I draw my right hon. Friend's attention to paragraphs 4.77 and 4.84 of the report. Paragraph 4.77 refers to drink inside a spectator at a football ground. Is my right hon. Friend aware of the difficulties that face the grounds at the moment when so-called supporters stop off at the nearby garages and motorway service stations and tank up, not only with petrol, but with alcohol? Surely the way to deal with this problem is to withdraw the off-licence.

Paragraph 4.84 of the report refers to the closure of pubs. The police can request that a number of pubs round the football ground be closed. The police do not request the closure of supermarkets and off-licences, except in exceptional circumstances. Enforcement should be made to prevent any alcohol being available outside the ground.

Mr. Hurd: The Sporting Events (Control of Alcohol Etc.) Act 1985 gives local magistrates considerable powers in these matters. It is for the police and for the magistrates, in each locality, to study what happens there and to work out a system to use their powers effectively.

Mr. Mark Carlisle (Warrington, South): I apologise to my right hon. Friend for being absent when he made his statement. It is apparent from the questions that have been asked that Mr. Justice Popplewell's proposals will impose financial obligations on the football clubs. I hope my right hon. Friend will not close his mind to the proposals made by the hon. Member for West Bromwich, East (Mr. Snape) to widen the horserace betting levy to a general betting levy for the good of all sport. Many feel that there is merit in that proposal.

Mr. Hurd: That is an interesting proposal, which goes fairly wide. I hope that my right hon. and learned Friend and the House will not gallop away with the idea that there are no resources available for this purpose. I have already mentioned the Football Grounds Improvement Trust. I gather that the sum of £8 million has been made available to the trust for the purposes of which we have spoken. That is a substantial annual sum. The great bulk of the work of designation has been done, so there are limits to the scale of the problems that worry hon. Members.

Mr. Kaufman: I wish to deal with section 3(3) Sporting Events (Control of Alcohol Etc.) Act 1985. The Home Secretary says, fairly, that he comes fresh to these matters. When we were consulted by his predecessor on the draft Bill we insisted upon equity, and his right hon. and learned Friend, after considering the possibilities, chose the form of equity that is in the Bill. When other forms of equity were later broached with him he set his face against them and, as a result, we have the Bill in its present form. As I said in the later stages, the implication of that equity has been financially troubling to the football clubs.

I repeat the words of my right hon. Friend the Member for Birmingham, Small Heath (Mr. Howell). We continue to insist on equity, but we are content with the proposals of Mr. Justice Popplewell and I wish to say that specifically today. However, this matter should be reconsidered. It appears that the Secretary of State intends that changes in this matter will be in an amendment to the Public Order Bill as it travels through the House. I suggest that it would be appropriate, at a time that the Secretary of State considers suitable, to enter into discussions so that we can arrive at a form of equity that is of assistance to the football clubs.

Mr. Hurd: I am grateful for that helpful intervention. It certainly clarifies something which has hitherto been somewhat obscure. Let us discuss this when the time comes.

Official Report

Mr. Speaker: The hon. Member for Edinburgh, East (Mr. Strang) has been very patient. Would he like to put his point of order briefly? I think that I can help him.

Mr. Gavin Strang (Edinburgh, East): I am grateful, Mr. Speaker. Further to the point of order which I broached immediately after Prime Minister's Question Time. When I checked my speech in Hansard this morning I noticed the quotation, referred to in column 1150, which I quoted from the question put by my hon. Friend the Member for Bolsover (Mr. Skinner) on Monday. I am reported as having quoted from his quotation as follows:

"whether the Government had received a letter from" —[Official Report, 15 January 1986; Vol. 89, c. 1150.]

My recollection is that I quoted more extensively—

"whether the Government had received a letter from the chairman"— and went on to say,

"who is Sir Austin Pearce".

I want to draw the attention of the House to this because of its crucial significance. I believe that the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry was consciously deceiving the House, and it is important that——

Mr. Speaker: Order. I do not think the hon. Gentleman would wish to say "consciously"

Mr. Strang: I withdraw that. I do not wish to prolong this, Mr. Speaker, but I hope you will address yourself to what I think is an important correction to the substance of my speech.

Mr. Speaker: If I have this right the hon. Gentleman wishes Hansard to correct the quotation to read,

"whether the Government had received a letter from the chairman", and to add,

"who is Sir Austin Pearce."

I will arrange for that to be done.

BILL PRESENTED

[Bill 60].

European Community (Fisheries)

5.17 pm

The Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food (Mr. Michael Jopling): I beg to move,

That this House takes note of the Ministry of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food's unnumbered explanatory memoranda dated 10th December 1985 on 1986 total allowable catches and quotas, on modifications to the proposed 1986 total allowable catches and quotas and on the fisheries agreement for 1986 between the European Community and Norway, of European Community Documents Nos. 9284/85 on amendments to Regulation 2057/82 establishing certain control measures for fishing activities by vessels of Member States, 8562/85 on the allocation of flat rate quantities of hake, horse mackerel and blue whiting to Spain, and 10047/85 on 1986 fish guide prices; and welcomes and approves the provisional agreement reached on these arrangements for 1986 with the improvements obtained for the United Kingdom fishing industry.

The motion makes it clear that this afternoon's debate covers a number of documents on European Community fisheries legislation, most of which are concerned with fishing arrangements for 1986. These documents have been recommended for further consideration of the House by the Select Committee on European Legislation, for whose vigilant scrutiny we are all most grateful.

Though I will necessarily be going into a good deal of detail on some of the matters involved, the broad principles of the common fisheries policy are of course now well established following the first-class deal that the Government negotiated in 1983.

Since the House last debated the common fisheries policy on 10 January last, this deal has been consolidated by the successful conclusion of the accession arrangements with Spain and Portugal. Now, as my right hon. Friend the Minister of State has already reported to the House, we have once again been able to negotiate a satisfactory package of quotas and associated measures for 1986 in time for the beginning of the year, only this time it covers a Community of 12 nations, not just of 10. There can be no doubt that the common fisheries policy is, indeed, proving to be every bit as successful as we hoped.

The first group of unnumbered explanatory memoranda referred to in the motion concerns the Commission's proposals for the total allowable catches and quotas for 1986 and the associated fishing arrangements for 1986 under the European Community-Norway agreement. I should explain that these proposals were produced only 10 days before the Fisheries Council on 16-17 December. Following lengthy negotiations at that Council, and an additional meeting of the Council on 20 December, a compromise package emerged to which all the other member states were able to agree.

I considered the package very satisfactory for the United Kingdom but, in view of the recommendation of the Select Committee, I thought it right to enter a formal reservation on the adoption of the regulations on TACs and quotas and on Norway, pending a debate in the House. So that fishing should not be interrupted, I agreed, following the same procedure as last year, that the regulations should be adopted on an interim basis until 25 January only, pending clarification of the United Kingdom's position following completion of our parliamentary scrutiny procedures.

I shall now outline the main elements of interest to the United Kingdom, starting with the North sea joint stocks. As the House is aware, the TACs for these stocks are agreed with Norway in the light of the latest scientific evidence. For 1986, there are increases in the availability of haddock and saithe but decreases for cod, plaice and whiting. The higher United Kingdom quotas of haddock and saithe, representing increases of 12·8 and 25·2 per cent. respectively, will be welcomed by our fishermen, given the reduction in our North sea cod quota to 75,790 tonnes, brought about by the current situation of the cod stock on which I know that the House will share my concern.

The total allowable catch of 170,000 tonnes for North sea cod agreed with Norway reflects this and, although the reduction is naturally a considerable disappointment to those sectors of the industry involved, I believe that they recognise it as necessary and realistic to protect that fishery.

On North sea herring, I shall refer later to the Commission's negotiations with Norway on the share-out of the stock in 1986 between Norway and the Community. At this point, I should like only to draw attention to the fact that the combined TAC for the North sea has been increased yet again, this time to 570,000 tonnes with the possibility of further growth in future. The United Kingdom quota for the northern and central North sea, —IVA and IVB— which are the areas of main interest to our fishermen, is increased by more than 13,000 tonnes to 71,615 tonnes, on top of which we have secured a further 5,700 tonnes through quota swaps agreed in the margins of the Council.

Thus, we have obtained a substantial increase in our herring opportunities in the North sea.

As for stocks outside the north sea, the TACs for haddock and herring to the west of Scotland will be lower than in 1985, reflecting the clear scientific advice on the state of the stocks. Nonetheless, I am pleased to report that I was able to ensure that the reduction on herring, in particular, will not be as great as that originally proposed by the Commission, which is a matter of considerable importance for the west coast herring fishery.

For western mackerel, the Commission originally proposed a very substantial reduction in the TAC. This proposal was increased at the Council meeting, resulting in a TAC of 362,000 tonnes—a reduction of 11·6 per cent.—giving the United Kingdom a quota of 195,950 tonnes. This stock is of great importance to the United Kingdom fishing industry, and I am sure that the industry will appreciate the need for this reduction to maintain the longer-term viability of that stock.

For the whitefish stocks in area VII, which, I remind the House, includes the English channel, the Irish sea, the Bristol channel and the western approaches, there are several increases, which have been warmly welcomed by the industry. During 1985, these stocks continued to attract a considerable amount of attention, and, although we were able to negotiate a number of quota swaps with other member states, it was necessary to restrict fishing and, in some cases, to close fisheries before the end of the year. For 1986, our opportunities for most of these st··ks will be greater than last year. Our Council package gives us an overall increase of 250 tonnes in our sole quotas. In addition, we were able to obtain a further 380 tonnes, mainly in the Irish sea, through a swap with the Netherlands, giving us a total increase of about one third in our availability in area VII.

For plaice, I was able at last to obtain a considerable increase in the TAC for Bristol channel plaice, which will increase our quota by 90 tonnes. I know that this will be most welcome, especially to the local Welsh fishermen. We have also achieved an increase in our quota for English channel plaice.

The stocks included in the Commission's second TACs and quotas proposal are those which needed to be added or amended as a result of the accession of Spain and Portugal. For western hake, our quota is increased by 760 tonnes. For monkfish and megrim in areas VI and VII, the quotas for 1985 did not reflect the existing pattern of fishing by us or other member states. The United Kingdom's quotas for 1986 have been increased and redistributed between the areas to reflect more accurately the present pattern of fishing there.

In accordance with the accession treaty, TACs and quotas were set for Norway lobster, also known as nephrops, and pollock in areas VI and VII. The Commission's proposals for these stocks were, for member states other than Spain and Portugal, based largely on the available catch figures for previous years. However, the quotas allocated to the United Kingdom, especially for area VII, were below the level of some of the recent catches, but I was able to obtain highly satisfactory increases in some cases.

Nephrops is particularly important to fishermen in Scotland and Northern Ireland, and I know that there was some anxiety that our proposed quotas would not be sufficient. However, the quotas finally agreed are well above our recent catches and will, I hope, reassure those fishermen and processors concerned that their interests have been amply safeguarded. The quotas for pollock and Norway lobster were on an ad hoc basis for 1986 without prejudice to the allocation of the stocks in future years.

In addition to the package of TACs and quotas for Community fishermen in the waters of the member states, the Council had also to consider the reciprocal fishing arrangements for 1986 with third countries. The most important are the arrangements with Norway, which the Select Committee has recommended for the consideration of the House.

I have already dealt with the joint stocks in the North sea where the arrangements agreed reflect substantial transfers from Norway, but I must draw attention to the increased quotas for north-east Arctic cod and haddock, which should provide some alternative opportunities, especially for our larger vessels.

In addition, there are useful reductions in the allocations to Norway in Community waters of west of Scotland herring, down 900 tonnes, and of western mackerel, down 5,000 tonnes. These help to maintain the opportunities for our own fishermen, despite reductions in the TACs.

The main point of interest in the reciprocal arrangements negotiated with Norway is clearly the share-out of the North sea herring stock for 1986. I know that this has caused concern to our industry, and it is indeed difficult to resist the conclusion that the Commission, in its understandable eagerness to reach an early agreement with Norway, allowed itself to be pushed too far by Norway, despite the advice of the member states' representatives who were on the spot. I made it very clear at the Council on 16 and 17 December that we were not happy with how the Commission had conducted these negotiations, and we will continue to press for a more satisfactory negotiating procedure.

The House will wish to consider the agreement in its full context. Last year, no agreement was reached with Norway on North sea herring. As a result, each party managed its fishery in its own zone. The Community restricted its catches to 80 per cent. of a notional TAC of 410,000 tonnes for the North sea as a whole to protect the upturn in the herring stocks and to avoid prejudicing further negotiations. Norway, however, caught in its own zone in excess of 150,000 tonnes—well beyond what the Community could have agreed was appropriate.

There was clearly a danger that continued failure to agree on joint management of the stock would have led to competitive over-fishing by each party, to the detriment of the stock. That was one of the reasons why the Commission felt able to agree to an allocation of 200,000 tonnes to Norway for 1986 out of a TAC of 570,000 tonnes for the North sea as a whole, to be fished in the northern and central sectors of the North sea only, with 50,000 tonnes available to be taken in the Community's zone. That agreement is on a strictly ad hoc basis for 1986, and discussions are to continue on the basis for a longer term agreement on ownership shares.

The second main reason that the Commission was able to advance in support of its agreement with Norway was that the allocation to Norway of North sea herring explicitly represents a transfer from the Community to Norway to help redress the overall balance of the other arrangements for 1986, to which I have already referred. In order not to prejudice each party's position on the respective ownership shares of North sea herring, it was not possible to put a precise figure on the level of this transfer. However, our own calculation of the balance of the remainder of the agreement for 1986, taking into account elements of compensation carried forward from 1985, indicates that it favours the Community by the equivalent of about 35,000 tonnes of herring. That factor has to be kept in mind when considering the scale of the herring allocation to Norway. Likewise, although our pelagic fleet is concerned about the 50,000 tonnes of herring available for Norway to fish in the Community's zone, we must remember that in the case of all the other joint stocks, joint management implies an element of mutual access to each other's waters.

To sum up, we have to bear in mind that reopening the negotiations with Norway on herring would have led to delay in the fixing of TACs and quotas generally. Any reduction in the herring allocation to Norway would have had to be balanced by equivalent reductions in the transfers from Norway to the Community on whitefish stocks, for many of which the United Kingdom share is much higher than that for North sea herring. Our overall judgment was, and is, that the package of TACs, quotas and reciprocal fishing arrangements for 1986 is very satisfactory indeed from the United Kingdom point of view, and I have no hesitation in commending it to the House.

I should now like to remind the House of a further element in the package—or, rather, not in the package. The House will recall that last year we agreed to a temporary derogation for one season from the 10 per cent. by-catch limit on human consumption whitefish taken in the Danish industrial fishery for Norway pout in the North sea. Despite the limited and temporary nature of that derogation, considerable concern was expressed about it both by the British fishing industry and by hon. Members on a number of occasions. When the derogation expired on 31 May 1985, the Commission reviewed the data available on the quantities of whitefish taken under the derogation, which were admittedly small, and proposed an extension of the derogation for a further season.

We took the view that a temporary derogation was a temporary derogation and that no case had been made out for continuing to depart from the 10 per cent. by-catch limit laid down for the industrial fisheries as part of the basic 1983 common fisheries policy settlement. I am glad to say that, as a result of our firmness on this matter and the support we received from other member states, notably France, the Commission agreed as part of the package on 17 December to withdraw its proposal on Norway pout. It is common enough for a Commission proposal to be amended, but, as I think those who are experts in these matters will be aware, it is rare indeed for one to be withdrawn altogether. As a result of our successful campaign on this issue, with the support of the industry and the House, I am confident that the Norway pout can now return to the deserved obscurity from which it emerged last year.

I will now deal briefly with the other documents mentioned in the motion. In each case the Select Committee recommended that adoption of these proposals need not be delayed pending a debate, and I accordingly entered no reservation on these when they came to the Council for adoption, in two cases in a revised form.

Document No. 8662/85 covers the allocation of the flat rate quantities of hake, horse mackerel and blue whiting to Spain provided for in the treaty of accession. As the House will recall, the magnitude of Spain's hake quota in the waters of the then existing member states was a critical element in the long and difficult accession negotiations. In the end, Spain was granted for a three-year period up to 4,500 tonnes of hake in addition to the quota, to the extent necessary to give Spain a total allocation of 18,000 tonnes. The document divides that 4,500 tonnes into 3,000 tonnes for areas VI and VII, and 1,500 tonnes for the Bay of Biscay, broadly in proportion to the division of the TACs.

For horse mackerel and blue whiting, Spain receives flat rate quantities, outside the unallocated TACs of 31,000 tonnes of horse mackerel and 30,000 tonnes of blue whiting. In each case, the proposal allocates 10,000 tonnes to the waters of interest to the United Kingdom—areas VI and VII. That is somewhat less than we might have expected given the pattern of existing fisheries. I hope that the House will agree that the proposal which was adopted as it stands represents a sensible and practical application of the provisions of the accession treaty.

Document 9284/85 deals with a number of detailed amendments to the Community's control arrangements, designed particularly to tighten up control on TACs and quotas. The House will know the importance we attach to control. We were instrumental in establishing the Community's Inspectorate of Inspectorates and I am glad to report that, as a result of the Commission's inspectors' work over the last year or so, a great deal of progress has been made in ensuring that all member states take positive steps to respect their national quotas.

However, the Commission has identified several areas where further powers are needed, and a number of these were provided for in the revised regulation agreed by the

[Mr. Michael Jopling]

Council on 17 December. In particular, the Commission will be able to require additional catch information from member states.

Member states are also required to provide the Commission with a written report of any formal administrative inquiry instigated at the latter's request, so that the Commission can be satisfied that everything possible has been done to eliminate flaws in the control system.

In the member states themselves, it will now be possible to apply sanctions for all control offences to the owners or charterers of vessels as well as to skippers. There will be a formal obligation on the member states to ensure that the accuracy of logbooks is checked.

New controls have also been introduced for exercising tighter control over klondikers. These are already subject to tight control when receiving from United Kingdom fishing vessels in our waters. It will now be possible to ensure that the catches from other member states' vessels are also closely monitored.

I should draw the attention of the House to the fact that two of the proposals in document 9284/85 were withdrawn before the draft regulation was put to the Council. The first would have permitted the Commission to close a fishery when the Community's total allowable catch or quota had been exhausted, even though some member states might not have exhausted their individual quotas. The second would have empowered Commission inspectors to carry out investigations unaccompanied by national inspectors.

Both the proposals affect the relative competences of the Commission and of the member states and caused difficulty for nearly all member states. It was therefore not possible to reach agreement. The Commission has, however, at our request, promised the Council a report early this year on the state of control arrangements throughout the Community, and that report, when it appears, may provide a basis for reconsideration of these and any other desirable changes.

I turn to the Commission's proposals for guide prices in 1986, contained in document 10047/85. Guide prices are used to calculate the Community withdrawal prices for fish withdrawn from the human consumption market. It is of considerable importance to reach agreement on the guide prices sufficiently early in December to allow all the other prices derived from them to be applied from the start of the new fishing year, on 1 January.

As in previous years, the Commission's proposals are in three parts. The first of these is of great concern to the United Kingdom, as it covers the main species which are of interest to our fishermen. The proposed range of increases between nil and 6 per cent. seemed to us on the whole, to have been drawn up on a very sound basis. In the course of negotiation the balance was changed marginally, the increase for cod being set at 6 per cent. instead of the 5 per cent. originally proposed. That increase was, however, offset by a reduction of one percentage point to 5 per cent. and 4 per cent., respectively, in the Commission's proposals for haddock and whiting. Of slightly greater significance, however, was the three percentage point price reduction for herring, the price of which was to have been left unchanged. This reduction, for which we pressed, should help Community herring to sell in competition with supplies from third countries where prices are generally lower. Overall, therefore, I consider that the revised guide prices for 1986 provide the United Kingdom industry with a sound and realistic level of support.

I should like once again to sum up the overall message that emerges from these documents. In 1983 the Government negotiated a first-class deal for the United Kingdom on the common fisheries policy. Last year, we negotiated its extension to Spain and Portugal on a basis which fully preserves its advantages for the United Kingdom. Other countries have sought, on this point or that, to unpick or adjust the balance of the deal, but it is in fact secure for the rest of this century and beyond. There is clear evidence that the common fisheries policy is now working increasingly effectively. That is shown by the fact that TACs and quotas have again been agreed before the beginning of the year and that control arrangements are being tightened up.

During the relevant negotiations, the Government have shown how hard they are prepared to fight to defend the real interests of the United Kingdom fishing industry. This is demonstrated both by our success in securing the withdrawal of the Commission's proposal on Norway pout and by the list of valuable improvements that we secured in the final package of TACs and quotas and other arrangements for 1986. I have no hesitation in asking the House to approve these arrangements.

5.42 pm

Mr. Stuart Randall (Kingston upon Hull, West): I shall keep my speech as short as possible because a number of hon. Members want to speak about these EEC documents.

There was general satisfaction in the industry that the Government were able for the second time to complete the negotiations on TACs and quotas before the beginning of the fishing year. Clearly the negotiations were made much more difficult this year because of the accession of Spain and Portugal to the EEC. Advice from the marine scientists that there would need to be a substantial reduction in certain key species, such as North sea cod and west coast mackeral, accentuated the difficulties.

The industry, especially in Scotland, seemed satisfied with the way in which the Government handled the Norway pout whitefish by-catch. That by-catch had been increased for a transitional period from 10 per cent. to 18 per cent. As a result, the authorities appeared to turn a blind eye to the other young fish caught as a by-catch when pout was being fished in this area. I understand that the Danes were the main culprits. This was unsatisfactory and totally contrary to the Community's policy on conservation. I hope that the Minister will confirm that he is satisfied that this unacceptable behaviour will cease with the introduction of these new quotas. If control over this by-catch is regained, fish that is suitable for human consumption will not be used for industrial purposes and the depleted whitefish stocks in the North sea will be able to recover more quickly.

The reduction in the North sea cod quota is bad news for certain parts of the industry. Cod is the most valuable fish, especially for east coast fishermen who do not have access to haddock to compensate for the fall in the cod quota. Severe hardship for those fishermen is likely to ensue.

It is vital to base quotas on scientific advice, but the industry feels that a quota reduction of this magnitude will cause serious dislocation in the industry and believes that a more gentle reduction could have been achieved, say, over two or three years. Was that option considered? Would it have been viable from a conservation point of view?

The industry has to accept the sharply reduced North sea cod quota—it has no option. Nevertheless, it is important in debates such as this to reflect the industry's attitudes. The view widely held by the industry is that the reduction in the North sea cod quota arises mainly from the failure of the Government and the EEC Commission to enforce their policy rather than from the industry's performance and behaviour. It is not good enough for the Government to say that the quota cuts are necessary just because of the scientific advice and informaton given to them. The failure of Government policy has resulted in these severe cuts in cod quotas.

The industry would like the House to know that it was not the industry that created the so-called "paper fish" and allowed poor enforcement which resulted in certain stocks being over-exploited. The industry feels that it is having to carry the can for the maloperation of the common fisheries policy.

The North sea cod quota has been reduced in 1986 from about 107,000 tonnes to about 75,000 tonnes — a reduction of about 30,000 tonnes. It can be argued that in reality the reduction is appreciably less because our fishermen did not exploit the whole quota. The reasons are that the cod stocks have been depleted, and cod are therefore more difficult to catch, and the very bad weather. The Minister knows all about that bad weather. The industry has been compensated to an extent in that cod prices have generally remained firm.

Just before Christmas, the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food announced a £16 million package for hill farmers to compensate them for bad weather. Does the right hon. Gentleman intend compensating the fishing industry in similar fashion for bad weather?

The part of the 1986 quotas that has received the most intense opposition from British fishermen is the huge increase in the herring quota for Norway. The Minister commented on that. The feeling is that, during the negotiations, the EEC seemed to run riot. It appeared to ignore British officials and opinion. This has brought into question whether the Commissioner responsible for fishing should have the power to make what seemed to have been a unilateral and irrational decision on this matter. The EEC system of crisis management must surely now come into question.

The Minister showed his concern about the way in which the decision was arrived at. It would be wrong of me not to accept his comments. Norway, which is a non-EEC country, has been allocated 40 per cent. of the total EEC herring catch. The industry feels that there is no reasonable basis for allowing that to happen. Perhaps the Minister will say why it was necessary for the Norwegian demands to be fully met. Was it not possible to arrive at a more reasonable compromise?

The consequence of that decision is that Norway will be entitled to catch 200,000 tonnes out of a total of 500,000 tonnes for 1986. Does the Minister agree that that will be the starting point for Norway when it comes to negotiating the herring quota for 1987 and that it is likely to produce great difficulties in next year's negotiations and for British fishermen in the meantime? Surely the Minister will agree that this precipitous action over the quotas is bound to create problems later.

In last year's debate the right hon. Gentleman reported to the House on the state of negotiations with Norway on herring stocks. He said:

> "It has not yet proved possible to reach agreement with Norway on the problem of the allocation of North sea herring stock. But, without sacrificing our existing firm position on that issue, it has been agreed that negotiations will continue in the course of 1985."—[Official Report, 10 January 1985; Vol. 70, c. 969.]

How does the Minister square that so-called firm position with the fact that he has allowed 40 per cent. of the total stock to be given to the Norwegians? Clearly the Minister has sacrificed the interests of the British fishing industry in these crucial negotiations and has allowed himself to be dictated to by the Commission in Brussels. The Minister's performance was just not good enough.

Quotas are central to the common fisheries policy which came into operation in January 1983. For the policy to remain intact it is vital that the agreed quotas are enforced. The policy relies on member states to direct enforcement resources in their own sectors and to ensure that their quotas, mesh sizes and other factors are adhered to. So far the enforcement policy has left a lot to be desired, although improvements are being made in some areas.

One key problem has been the lack of political will in some EEC countries to ensure that enforcement works. To be fair, the United Kingdom has led the way in improving enforcement within the community. Also, satisfactory strides have been made nationally on enforcement. However, many people in the industry feel bitter at the way that other EEC countries have not stuck to the rules whereas the United Kingdom has. That has been costly to our industry in fishing opportunities and jobs.

As the right hon. Gentleman has pointed out, Spain and Portugal are now part of the common fisheries policy. Spain alone has a huge fleet of about 17,000 vessels. There is concern and doubt in the industry as to whether Spain will implement adequate control and enforcement regulations. There is still concern over the phasing out of the Nimrods and about whether the three smaller civilian planes, which are slower and less powerful, will be able to fulfil the same function as the Nimrods. Would it not have been better to review that change after experience with the Spanish and Portuguese fleets?

To date there has been a lot of abuse by the Spanish of the common fisheries policy. They have been using undersized nets and have been fishing in areas where they do not have quotas. The general impression in the industry is that the Spanish fleet is aggressive and undisciplined. Does the Minister believe that the EEC and the inspectorate are truly ready for this massive increase in the EEC fleet through the accession of Spain and Portugal to the Community?

The Minister of State, the right hon. Member for Suffolk, Coastal (Mr. Gummer), made great play in Fishing News on 3 January and in other publications of the way in which he intends to restrict the number of Spanish vessels in British waters to 150 at any given time. I do not dispute that the Minister is keen and enthusiastic to ensure that the Spanish adhere to the rules now that they are part of the common fisheries policy. Essentially, the system that the Minister of State has proposed involves monitoring the number of Spanish vessels in British waters and sending the information to the EEC Commission. I am not sure what the Commission will do with the information. I understand that Ireland and France will also participate in the scheme. That all seems laudable, but I do not think that the scheme goes nearly far enough for the whole common fisheries policy. There is considerable scepticism in the industry about the effectiveness of policing and enforcement in the various EEC countries.

Mr. Austin Mitchell (Great Grimsby): Does my hon. Friend accept that there is a need for action in another commercial area? British fishermen who are desperate for jobs are often employed by Spanish firms, many fishing from Spain, and do not get paid. If they protest about their conditions and lack of pay, they are often left to pay their own fares home and are in a desperate plight. There is a need for commercial discipline of Spanish fishing firms.

Mr. Randall: I am grateful to my hon. Friend for raising that matter. It all comes under the heading of flags of convenience and quota hopping. I do not want to develop it in my speech, but as a representative of Hull, which is a major fishing centre, as every hon. Member knows, I have had experience of fishermen who have been exploited by Spanish companies. They have been on vessels with inadequate safety equipment. Hatches have been sealed. The fishermen have not had food or medical equipment. Log books have not been kept up to date. Their accommodation has been infested by cockroaches. They have had to suffer appalling conditions. Unfortunately, the companies have been able to get away with it. I am glad that the right hon. Gentleman has introduced new measures which were reported in a written answer on, I think, 9 December and which will address the problem. I appreciate what the Minister has done, but I do not think it goes far enough. I hope that eventually we will have primary legislation on the matter.

More effective enforcement policies are required. We need to build up the confidence of fishermen in the various EEC countries in the enforcement arrangements which, above all, must be seen to be fair. At the moment people in the industry tell me that the Commission fails miserably to provide any feedback on how well the enforcement scheme is working. The Minister should tell us whether he knows in detail how well enforcement arrangements are working in other EEC countries.

Also, will the Minister tell us whether he formally—I stress the word "formally"—receives information from the Commission about the abuse of the common fisheries policy by other EEC countries? If so, will he arrange for copies of that information to be placed in the House of Commons Library?

Mr. Jopling: I appreciate what the hon. Gentleman has been saying on enforcement. Is he aware that, within the first 10 days of Spain's accession to the Community, our fishery protection officers arrested a Spanish vessel, which has been fined £15,000? Will he join me in congratulating our officers on their prompt action so soon after Spanish accession?

Mr. Randall: Of course I congratulate the authorities on achieving that. The point I am making is that, first, there is little confidence in the industry in the working of the scheme. Secondly, the Minister must provide feedback to the industry on how the scheme is working. That does not exist and it is an important point. I hope that the Minister will take it up when he has meetings with the Commission.

Is the question of specific details of abuse by various EEC countries always on the agenda for ministerial meetings on fishing matters, and, if not, why not? Surely the matter is worth serious and regular consideration by Ministers. I understand that the new EEC inspectorate has been successful in flushing out a number of cases of abuse, and the one to which the Minister referred is a good example. Why is that sort of information not made more public?

Is the Minister satisfied that sufficient penalties have been applied to those countries that have constantly abused the policy? Has he considered reminding the Commission of the range of penalties that might be applied to offenders, such as the withdrawal of FEOGA grants or even quota reductions?

As the industry feels that there is not sufficient feedback of information from the Commission on how well the common fisheries policy is working, will the Minister raise that matter with the Commission to see what improvements can be made?

I believe that it is important for this House to discuss the issues in the Community papers before us. The time available for this debate has been too short—due, as we all know, to the Home Secretary's statement. However, there is a broader range of more worrying issues to do with the operation of the common fisheries policy that need to be considered by the House. Accordingly, I hope that it will not be too long before we have a half-day debate on the general state of the fishing industry in this country.

6.2 pm

Sir Walter Clegg (Wyre): I listened with interest to the speech of the hon. Member for Kingston upon Hull, West (Mr. Randall). I believe that it is the first time that he has spoken from the Opposition Front Bench, and I welcome him to his new position. There have been all sorts, shapes and sizes of Opposition spokesmen——

Mr. John Home Robertson (East Lothian): And Ministers.

Sir Walter Clegg: Indeed. I hope that the hon. Member for Kingston upon Hull, West enjoys his new position.

This is a useful debate, although it is highly technical. Reading through the papers has been like threading through a minefield. There is certainly a great deal of gobbledegook per square inch. Perhaps for future debates we could consider producing a summary of the papers, which would be of great help in saving the time of hon. Members.

I was pleased to hear my right hon. Friend the Minister say that enforcement is to be improved. Many hon. Members have always maintained that enforcement is the key to a successful policy. Indeed, I am almost sorry about the arrangement that a Community inspector should not inspect a country without the participation of that country's inspectorate. Although there may be drawbacks on sovereignty, if an inspectorate could go where it wanted, when it wanted, that would have a salutary effect, especially if some of our fishing inspectors were allowed to inspect other countries.

I am pleased that klondiking is to be tackled to reduce the amount of fish being transferred in that way. I also think that the hon. Gentleman's suggestion about reports from the Commission on the effectiveness of enforcement would be helpful. After all, we cannot judge the success of the operation without that.

My right hon. Friend dealt with the quotas for the coming year. I am primarily concerned with area VI, which has had an increase in sole quotas that should prove helpful. Often fishermen think that the technical advice given by scientists is over-optimistic. Although there may be a quota, the fish may not be available to be caught. Perhaps the system should include taking account of what the fishermen say about the size of stocks as well as what the scientists say.

Since the common fisheries policy began, and especially since the withdrawal of Iceland, the English fleet has suffered severely. The picture in Fleetwood, Hull and Grimsby is one of almost total despair for the old, long-distance Icelandic trawlers. We are having to rely more on inshore fishermen to provide the markets with fish.

Although this matter is not entirely within the control of my right hon. Friend, the fishing communities in England are at some disadvantage compared with those in Scotland, who have the Highlands and Islands Development Board to help them. Perhaps the time has come for some regional help for the English fishing communities that have been so badly hit by the Icelandic withdrawal. Indeed, for Fleetwood the past year has been simply a matter of hanging on. I greatly admire those who are still operating the inshore fleet. They have faced enormous difficulties with quotas, the weather, increased overheads and many other problems.

Mr. Barry Henderson (Fife, North-East): The Minister who is to reply to the debate represents a constituency in the Highlands and Islands Development Board area. Those of us who are close to that area feel strongly about some of the unfortunate positions that arise as a result of the board's activities. I have heard rumours that the board and the Sea Fish Industry Authority are now beginning to get their act together. Until now, the two organisations appear to have been following different fishing policies.

Sir Walter Clegg: I had not realised that the southern Scots were as badly off as the northern English. I look forward to what the Minister has to say when he replies to the debate.

The documentation refers to a reduction in the size of the Spanish fleet, which we all agree is essential, and to decommissioning proposals. Decommissioning grants have been available in this country, and many owners have been able to recoup some of their losses. What worries me is that those who have suffered most from the diminution of our fishing areas because of the withdrawal of Iceland are not the owners but the men who sail in the vessels. Quite frankly, their redundancy payments system is a shambles. I know that that is not a direct responsibility of my right hon. Friend, but as a sponsoring Minister he should be aware that there is considerable bitterness and concern about that matter.

Dr. Norman A. Godman (Greenock and Port Glasgow): The hon. Gentleman said that the redundancy payments scheme is a shambles. My brother, who worked for a trawler firm in Hull for about 18 years, received as redundancy pay the princely sum of £385.

Mr. Austin Mitchell: That is better than most get.
